It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

IN COMMENCING another volume, it is only reasonable to suppose, that some few introductory observations will be looked for, either from the Editor, or from one of the contributors to its pages. Such remarks we find ready to hand, in the luminous exposition of Bro. A. CAMPBELL under similar circumstances—and, as they are appropriate to the times in which we live, when the definite and final consummation of all things is hastening forward, we most heartily adopt them.

“The church and the world never stand still—they are constantly in motion forward or backward, upward or downward. Everything in our universe is in motion. The pulse of life never stands still. Every living man is ascending or descending every moment of his existence. He is daily growing in virtue or in vice, in conformity to God or to Satan. His taste or his appetency for good or for evil, keeps pace with every beating pulse. These, to the thoughtful and reflecting, are stern realities, and suggest the necessity and the importance of an intimate communion with ourselves. Millions annually perish for not thinking at all, or for not thinking properly on these self-evident facts. Bankruptcy is often one of the fruits of not thinking at all, or of thinking erroneously on our financial operations and obligations. Eternal bankruptcy and ruin, in innumerable instances, will unquestionably be the legitimate consequence of either not thinking at all, or of thinking erroneously of our positions and relations to God, the universe, and the infinite future. One of the most profound of poets and sound thinkers wisely said,

‘Be wise to-day, ’tis madness to defer.’

And what is true wisdom? ‘The fear of the Lord is’ but ‘the beginning of wisdom,’ ‘and to depart from evil is understanding.’

We are, however, neither moralizing nor evangelizing, neither theorizing nor dogmatizing on human wisdom or human prudence, but preparing a preface to a new volume of the Harbinger.

We have now been thirty-five years before the community as an editor, and have not failed once a month to make a visit to our constant readers during that period. This is more than half our life. Many other volumes besides these have passed through our hands during this period. These all, more or less, have been pleading the cause of ancient original Christianity. We have not labored alone, nor have we labored in vain. Whatever evil has been done is ours—whatever good has been done is the Lord’s. We can, on review of all the past, say, that we have sincerely and conscientiously advocated what we have esteemed to be the truth of the Christian religion; and according to our conceptions, opposed only the doctrines and the commandments of men.

standing in contrast and in opposition to the doctrine and commandments of our Lord and his Apostles. We have, times without number, been misrepresented and defamed by those in favour with the people; and are, at this hour, misrepresented and defamed by many of those who claim an hereditary orthodoxy, and who have, from the days of their fathers, been teaching more or less the doctrines, commandments, and institutions of uninspired men—sometimes we fear knowingly, and sometimes we doubt not, conscientiously assuming for Divine Oracles the decisions of Synods and Councils of men like themselves. Yet, while assenting to the fact that all the Synods and Councils of men have, more or less, substituted their own reasonings, or those of their fathers, for the express teachings and oracles of the Holy Spirit, they have given to these traditions and to their own philosophies and reasonings, the authority of Divine oracles, exacting a conformity to those traditions of human oracles, on pain of excision and exclusion from the table of the Lord.

This is the crying sin of the popularized sects of the present century. For protesting against these and substituting for them a palpable 'thus saith the Lord,' in express precepts, or by the most legitimate precedents, we have been subjected to the unmitigated censure and reprobation of many of the spiritual lords and self-created rabbis and doctors of the present secularized forms and ceremonies of sectionised partisan Christendom.

The truce between these secular and sectarian institutions is based upon an agreement, either expressed or implied, in words to this effect:—think charitably and speak courteously of us, and we will think charitably and speak courteously of you. Hence, the charitable union between Calvinists and Arminians, between Papacy and Prelacy, Presbyterianism and Congregationalism, Episcopal and Protestant Methodism, Old School and New School orthodoxies of every type and genealogy on the colored chart of modern Christendom, down to the Foxite and Hicksite Quaker, and the Old School and New School Presbyterian—Covenanter, Unionist, or Seceder. This is no fancy sketch—no overwrought or discolored picture. It is no exaggeration. It is inside and not outside the factious distinctions of the speculative and political landmarks of secularized and sectionized Christendom.

Against all these enormities we have, more or less, remonstrated for more than forty years. And what have we substituted for them? Aye! This is the question. Have we introduced any new system? Have we presented a new theory or a new doctrine? No such thing has ever been intended! No such project has ever been submitted by us! If any one has the hardihood to affirm that we have—we call upon him for the day and date—the time when, and the place where. In which of our public and published discussions? In what essay? On what page? We challenge all our contemporaries.

We affirm they cannot, in any legitimate grammatical construction of one sentence from our pen, in any one of our more than forty volumes. We have, from our first published sermon on the law, A. D. 1816, before the Redstone Baptist Association, till this present hour, never offered one substitute for the New Testament as a church constitution, or as a term or terms of Christian union, communion and co-operation.

But while thus affirming, we would not say, that as a Christian community—composed of all the denominational forms of Protestantism—we have, as yet, attained to perfection in our views of church co-operation. We have, indeed, said something and thought much of a more-evangelical organization, with special respect to a more efficient promulgation of the gospel to those outside of our communion.

While the four Gospels, as they are now called, have no suggestions, direct and positive, on these prudential and executive matters, Christianity, not being then developed, the Acts of the Apostles and the Apostolic Epistles have in them much that is suggestive, as well as directive in the use of means and instrumentalities by which the Gospel is to be preached, sinners converted, and the churches or communities organized and confederated in the great work of converting the world outside of the existing communities that have received the faith, and preventing schisms, discords, and disorderly persons from bringing a reproach on the cause and kingdom over which the Lord Jesus presides.

Difficulties in churches are, indeed, anticipated, and provided for; and are, therefore, to be disposed of according to the teachings of the ambassadors of Christ. This subject is fully discussed and developed in the Acts, and in the Epistles of the Apostles, in explicit precepts and suggestions, and in practices of the churches set in order by the Apostles, and again in the seven Epistles addressed by the Lord himself to the seven Asiatic churches, named in his last communications to and through his beloved John to these communities. These documents growing out of the actual conditions and peculiarities of these communities, were written for our instruction and direction, in all the contingencies to which the churches of the Lord Jesus may be subjected, in all varieties of condition and circumstances through which they must pass in this present evil world. The things that happened to them are written for our edification, that by them we might learn what is indispensable to the union, harmony, and effectual coöperation of churches in extending the influence of the Gospel, and in protecting the churches from certain characters, and from the aggressions of certain spirits on the peace, prosperity, and happiness of the kingdom of our Divine Redeemer.

Christianity has no priesthood according to the flesh, no ritual, no ceremonial. Christians are all priests, and their high-priest is in heaven. He has no representative in Constantinople, Rome, or Westminster; much less in New York or Cincinnati. Our high-priest is omnipresent and immutable, as well as infallible and everlasting. He was no Levite. He is the prophet, the high-priest, and the King of his own Zion. According to the flesh he is a royal high-priest, upon the throne of David and upon the throne of God. He is a high-priest after the order of Melchisedeck, and has, therefore, an everlasting priesthood; and every citizen of his kingdom is both a priest and king! He has made us kings and priests to God.

But whither have we wandered in our preface? Variety is the spice of life, and we have a taste inherent that craves it with an insatiable intensity. We are, therefore, surveying the wants of our readers and their special and general cravings for certain topics and discussions. Their wants indicate our wishes, so far as we can ascertain and appreciate them.

The subject of a more effective organization is, and has been for some time past, pressed and been pressing upon our attention. We found it in our recent excursions in Illinois and Iowa, everywhere more or less in demand, and indeed, much needed. All societies in their incipiency, must be somewhat disciplined in the school of experience. There were some 'things wanting' and for some time craved on the part of the churches planted by the apostles and their contemporary labourers. Experience in wants in almost all cases, political and religious, is more or less necessarily requisite to a proper appreciation of the supply of them, and to a proper remedy for them.

The Christian kingdom could not have been established, and was not established, without the aid of the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers. When the Lord Jesus was enthroned in the heavens, he immediately sent down to Jerusalem the Holy Spirit, as the advocate of his cause and claims on the people of Israel. He being crowned Lord of all, and having received the promise of the Holy Spirit, sent him down to Jerusalem to give success to his cause and mission. We, therefore, date the origin of the Christian kingdom, not from the birth of Christ in Bethlehem, but from the coronation of Jesus Christ as Lord of All. Such was the view taken of it in the beginning of our public labours, in the cause of primitive Christianity. The birth, life, miracles, teachings, preachings, sufferings, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, and coronation of Jesus Christ as Lord of All, constitute the whole materials of Christianity.

Hence the annunciation of these facts by Peter, entrusted with the keys of the kingdom of heaven — or of the heavens — on the first Pentecost celebrated in Jerusalem after the Lord's ascension and coronation, were made the materials of the Christian Institution — and of the Gospel age or dispensation. They were, indeed, summarily exhibited in that speech, sustained by the Holy Spirit sent down by him to that city, and were first propounded by Simon Peter to the thousands then and there assembled, himself and the other Apostles who had been the companions and the pupils of the Lord Jesus Christ in convention assembled. He simply narrated the prominent facts and events of the life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, glorification, and coronation of Jesus Christ as THE LORD OF ALL. These are the seven pillars on which the Divine wisdom and grace founded the reign of Christ, and constituted the basis of his kingdom or church on earth.

Institution is overlooked or neglected in every denominational form of the present Christendom. We never heard one speech or sermon on it in modern Christendom, in Europe or America, outside of our own community. The Theologies of the present day, one and all, overlook it, and therefore, give it no conspicuity, no emphasis whatever in the church platforms. If any one doubt or deny this, we ask him for a book or a treatise, a homily or sermon on it, giving to it such conspicuity in the pulpit, or in the basis of their creeds or church institutions!

Outside of our community it occupies no prominence whatever. — We have never heard a speech on it, nor seen a book or pamphlet written upon it, outside of our own brotherhood!

The opening speech of the new dispensation of remedial grace and mercy was given to Peter, because he first uttered the oracle embracing the person, office, and mission of his Lord and Master, in the assertion and development of the past, that God the Father of the whole family in heaven and earth, had constituted the same Jesus whom they had crucified "both Lord and Christ;" or had christed him Lord — anointed him sovereign Lord of the universe. This was, indeed, but the consummation of all that John the Baptist and the Lord Jesus during his ministry had preached, pertinent to that petition which he dictated to his Disciples in what is frequently called the 'Lord's Prayer.'

A full and satisfactory development of the Christian Institution, or the kingdom of Jesus Christ, announced in the four Gospels, depends upon a clear conception and appreciation of one petition in this prayer. This we make preparatory not only to a new volume of the Millennial Harbinger, but essentially preparatory to a luminous and comprehensive view of the whole Christian Revelation and the Christian church.

THREE WORDS : TIME, INFLUENCE, TALENTS.

A GLANCE at that state of Christianity in our churches, seems to call for an increased devotion of the soul in labours for the salvation of others.

Now this remark may appear almost unnecessary, since the soul, by the law of its new life, and the nature of the Christian hope, ought to act almost spontaneously in behalf of its fellow-travellers to the spirit-land. This would indeed seem natural. But how is it in fact? The Christian hope is buried in the heart, and is not allowed an outward expression. The Christian joy is smothered in self, so that its possessor is sometimes led even to doubt its existence. Christian effort is abridged, so that the world discovers that the salt has truly lost its savor—if perchance it ever had any—and that the light of Christian influence is flickering in its socket, and seems ready to be quenched in darkness. Here, I apprehend, is the cause of so much sloth and apathy in the church. Men—good men, we hope—feel satisfied with their hope; their names are on the church record—and they have a consciousness that does appear dim at times, that they are inscribed in the Lamb's Book of Life. They feel all is well. They fold their arms, and feel satisfied to move on to heaven alone. Now, what is necessary for a change, is—

1. Such a view of life as will lead the soul to consecrate its TIME to Christian effort.

Before the soul was renewed, life appeared to it as if it were given for self-aggrandizement—for the fostering of all its baser passions. But now God has come nigh to the soul, a change has taken place, life assumes a new aspect, time is regarded as clothed with a greater importance; but, unfortunately, it is a portion of the time that is thus regarded. The Christian thinks he can afford to give the Sabbath, and an hour occasionally during the week, to God; but his business demands the rest of his time. His business! What is his business? Is it anything into which the Spirit of Jehovah cannot enter, and on which his blessing cannot be invoked? Then, my Christian friend, give it up—you have no business there. God frowns upon it, and he may visit you in his anger. You cannot, you cannot knowingly, divide your time between God and Mammon—God will have it all or none. And when you vowed before the altar to be the Lord's, unless you deceived yourself, your business was laid there, your time was all laid there; and God knows, and you know, how that matter stands to-day. How is it? But I observe again—

2. The soul must consecrate all its TALENTS to God in the salvation of others.

Here many find a great difficulty—or, rather, they make the difficulty for themselves. The human heart is ever ready to grasp at excuses under which it may take refuge from the pressure of present duty; and hence, if it has not the faculty, made all ready for use, and placed in its hands, to perform a certain kind of work in Christ's service, here it finds shelter and is silent.

The child does not become a man in a day. Neither does he reach manhood without many falls, without many tears and disappointments. This is a world of difficulty and trial. GABRIEL did not reach the high point he now occupies in heaven, without many arduous struggles in overcoming difficulties. Whenever, then, any duty is pressed home on your mind, let not the feeling, that you cannot perform it so beautifully as the neighbour at your side, deter you from its performance. All that God requires of you is just as much as you can do, and no more. Do you think you can do as much as that? We cannot all be missionaries, neither can we all preach the Gospel ; but we can all be living witnesses. I say living witnesses of the truth—not dead ones, nor even sickly ones—but living ones.

God does not require me to speak with the eloquence of a Demosthenes or a Webster, if I do not possess that power. Neither does he demand of you to exercise the talent of a Whitfield or an Edwards, if that be not your's. No ! but it is the talent which he has given you — be it one, or five, or ten — that he requires you to exercise, and that to the extent of your ability. If, then, you have an opportunity to speak for God, in heaven's name open your mouth, and let the world know that you are a living man—that you have a pair of lungs that can breathe, and a tongue that dares to utter forth the praises of your King. So, if you have an opportunity to put forth an effort in behalf of the wandering and the outcast—and have you not many such ? — O, linger not, servant of the Most High God ; but put forth thy hand, snatch them from danger, and gather them into the fold, or they perish for ever. I observe, again—

3. The soul must bring all its INFLUENCE to bear on the salvation of the souls of others.

There is perhaps nothing more secret—nothing that works more underground—than this imitative faculty in man ; and hence the great care and caution that ought to be observed in its exercise. The child is closely noting down every act and movement in the conduct of the parent, with as much accuracy as if everything were delineated in the most exquisite lines on the canvas ; and all this while the parent is wholly unconscious of everything without himself. Thus, you will observe, the parent, in his moments of least suspicion, is making impressions on the tablet of the child's memory, which the ravages of time cannot efface, but which will grow deeper and deeper, moulding the destiny of the soul through eternal ages.

And thus, as the parent is oftentimes—though unconsciously, moulding the destiny of his child, so are you, my friend, exerting an influence that is omnipotent for good or evil on the destiny of immortal spirits around you—leading them either to glory and God, or conducting them down to the pit.

Ought not, then, such an influence, my Christian friend, to be guarded most closely, so that the vast assemblage of spectators seated on the great amphitheatre, looking down on the arena of life, and witnessing the gradual triumph of the Christian faith in the soul while it struggles on for immortal honors, be incited, wooed, constrained, by every movement of the body, every change of expression in the countenance, every utterance from the lips, to rise and tread the earth beneath their feet ; and, shaking from them the shackles of sensual desire, stand up in the freedom of the sons of the Lord God Almighty ? O, what a responsibility is here ! Have you, my Christian reader, thought of it ? By a single look, by a single expression, you may be daily, hourly influencing souls for heaven or hell ! By a single word, in an unguarded moment, you reverse the destiny of a soul, from a flaming spirit around the throne above, to a fiend of darkness.

This influence, then, dear reader—this time—those talents—given to the soul by the Almighty on credit, are required by him to be employed in advancing the cause of truth and righteousness in the earth. And, as He has an indisputable right to their exercise, He hath declared that He will come and reckon with his servants, and reward each according to his work.

Blessed is he who, when his Lord cometh, shall be found working ! Yea, I say unto you, he shall make him ruler over all that he hath ! J. C.

AN ADDRESS TO THE CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY AT ITS ANNUAL MEETING, A.D. 1858.

BY A. CAMPBELL.

WHEN we lift our eyes to the starry heavens in a clear and cloudless sky, and take a midnight view of the galaxy sometimes called "the milky-way," that girdles the heavens — which modern science, in some latitudes, contemplates as a sort of pavement of suns or stars, the size and boundaries of which no telescope has yet satisfactorily revealed to the most inquisitive astronomer — with the Shepherd King of Israel we exclaim — "Lord, what is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou regardest him? Thou madest him for a time, a short time, somewhat lower than the angels, but thou hast crowned him with glory and honour, and hast placed him over all the hosts of intelligences in the person of Immanuel — the Lord of lords, the King of kings, the son of Mary and the Son of God."

Hence, the missionary idea, office, and glory are dateless in the annals of earth, and in the annals of heaven so far as known to mortal man. But this much we have learned, that in the drama of humanity God has two classes of missionaries. These we denominate commissioned and non-commissioned officers, or ministers of state. Day and night, seed time and harvest, Summer and Winter, are the fruits or effects, of their respective and united ministrations.

But in the developments of the universe, as far as reported to us in God's own Book of Records, there are now existing three states or conditions of things, as respects humanity. These are usually denominated the natural, the preternatural, and the supernatural. As respects the natural, in our portion of the universe, it was of short continuance. "Man being in honor" continued not long in that state. But how long Moses says not.

Nature is the state of things, or the course of things, which God himself has established. It was, and is, and must for ever be, perfectly good. Man fell into an unnatural state the moment he violated the charter, or constitution of things, which God himself had for him created and ordained. This rendered, on the part of our Father and our God, a supernatural interposition essential to the rescue and recovery of man. But for this there never had been what is usually called a religious institution. There is no religion in heaven or in hell. Reconciliation is not necessary in heaven, and it is impossible in hell. Hence he that dies unreconciled to God through Jesus Christ, can never be reconciled to God by the penal sufferings of an everlasting punishment.

The missionary institution, therefore, commenced in the immediate family of Adam. There was a promise of a great missionary given to humanity in the person of Adam and Eve. The sum of which was, an offspring of woman shall bruise his heel in bruising the serpent's head. This missionary was announced four thousand years before his birth. He is gradually developed by Adam, Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Israel, Judah, David, Solomon, and the Jewish prophets down to Malachi, and by his contemporary, John, his immediate herald. Each and every one of these, more or less, acted out the prominent characteristics of a true missionary in his day and among his contemporaries.

But the primordial missionary of the Remedial Institution was himself the prophet who, when he was thirty years old, founded the first evangelical mis-

Jesus himself in person assures the eleven disciples of his own school, that he was then invested with all authority in heaven and earth; and, based on this fact, he immediately commissions them to go into all the world and to make disciples of all nations, "immersing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," "teaching and charging them to observe all things whatsoever he had commanded them."

Such was the order of things instituted by the Lord himself in person. This grand missionary institution, in all its radical or rudimental elements, is the beau ideal of all Christian missions, properly so called. As the constitution of the United States is the basis, the sub-basis of all the institutions or constitutions of the several States of this great American confederacy, so this grand institution and commission of the Lord Messiah in person, is the immutable basis of Christ's kingdom, till the final consummation of all things earthly and temporal.

The commission has always been regarded as one of the most important and most authoritative documents in the records of primitive apostolic Christianity. It is as broad as the field of humanity. It is as authoritative as the throne of the universe. It is commensurate with all the spiritual wants of a fallen, ignorant, alienated, guilty, and ruined world. It meets every rational, moral, spiritual, and religious craving of humanity in its most comprehensive conception. It furnishes the materials of a faith, a hope, and a love incomparably superior to any system of philosophy, mythology, or religion ever discovered by reason, or inculcated in virtue of any tradition, however hoary, however venerated, however popularized it may have been.

Its internal evidences and excellencies are above all comparison superior to those of any system of moral philosophy, or to any pretensions or claims of deism, theism, polytheism, atheism, however speculative, refined, and plausible they may be made to appear; or however patronized by those of the highest pretensions to learning and science. Not one of these has had patriotism, humanity, philanthropy adequate to institute and sustain a single school or college, to educate and sustain a Missionary Institution.

We cannot, therefore, regard a Missionary Institution as a human expedient and device, but as an ordinance of the author and founder of the Christian church, and as a development of the true spirit of Christian philanthropy. Indeed, the true Christian church is itself naturally and necessarily a Missionary Institution, and therefore, a missionary spirit is the first fruit of the Holy Spirit. Let us hear Paul's classification of the fruits of the Holy Spirit in the Christian's heart. Gal. v. 22, he says, the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance, against any of these there is no law. But the first of this cluster of graces—is love—benevolence—in one word philanthropy. And to the Ephesians he says, "The fruit of the Spirit is *in all goodness,** and righteousness, and truth."

Philanthropy is the most apposite term, and being only Greek transferred not translated, most appositely indicates the root and reason of the missionary spirit and the missionary institution. It is, in truth, the heart and soul of the church. A church, without philanthropy, without a missionary spirit, is virtually dead. The more philanthropy, the more life, the more health, the more strength, the more prosperity, the more happiness she enjoys.

Divine philanthropy was never developed till the Lord Jesus Christ suffered the accursed death of the cross to expiate and take away the sin of the world. So Paul to Titus writes (chap. iii. 4)—"When the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared; he saved us, not by works of righteousness which we had done, but according to his mercy, by the washing of regeneration—even the renewing of the Holy Spirit, which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour, that being counted righteous by his grace, we might be made heirs as to the hope of eternal life."* Such was Paul's appreciation of the term philanthropy, or of the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man.

This one word, or the grand idea contained in it and expressed by it, is the Son and the shield, the heart and the spirit, the life and the power of the mystical body of the Lord Jesus Christ, the church which he has redeemed by his own blood. No man, then, can be like the Lord Jesus Christ, who, if not a missionary himself, is not by word only, but, by word and deed, sustaining the cause of our Redeemer in the persons and through the labors, the toils, and the sacrifices of those who, at home and abroad, are the evangelists or missionaries preaching his Gospel, and founding churches or societies where they do not exist.

The Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Son of Man and the Son of God, is specifically the spirit of every truthful and honorable member of his body—the church. It is the spirit of love, and of a sound and healthful mind. It is the spirit of a genuine and heaven-begotten and born Son of God. Every Christian, so far as Christianity has spread its influence, is a cosmopolite. He is a citizen of Christ's kingdom, and therefore, wherever there is a family of God he finds a home.

An evangelical missionary, in its full conception, is no ordinary personage. His bean ideal is the Master himself, who continually went to and fro doing good. He had a healing balm for every wound, a cordial for every aching heart. He sympathized with every child of sorrow—and gladdened the hearts of the disconsolate. He became a man of sorrows, and made himself acquainted with the griefs and agonies of the forlorn and wretched outcasts of humanity, that he might dispense to them every comfort that might allure them to himself and to his mission.

But we have, as our specific theme, the missionary of the 19th century. The missionary at home and the missionary abroad, have very different fields of labor. To contend against obsolete Judaism and obsolete Gentileism, was a different work and labor, compared with that of contending against the sectarianism of modern scepticism, and the philosophic deisms, theisms, and atheisms of our own age and country. We have, therefore, the home mission and the foreign mission in our horizon—and both are providentially at this hour calling loudly upon us for our prayers, our sympathies, and our contributions.

The sectarianisms of the 19th century are the greatest obstacles to all Christian missionary enterprises and operations. Schisms and sects, and their policies and operations, are the greatest impediments in our path—the greatest hindrances to the success of either domestic or foreign missions. I am here reminded of an incident that occurred more than forty years ago. It is illustrative to this almost insuperable difficulty which we have in our horizon. To the Senecas, or some other tribe in the West, missionaries were sent. On their arrival a council was held. After much deliberation on the part of a number of the Indian chiefs, to whom application had been made by the missionaries for leave to address them, they called the missionaries to appear before them. Whereupon one of the chiefs propounded to them the three following questions:—

1. "Is not your religion all written in a book?" "Yes," was the response.

2. "Do not you white men all read that book?" "Yes," was again the response.

3. "Do you all agree in what that book says, or what it means?"

Here was a long pause, and a look of consternation on the part of the missionaries. Finally, one of them responded,—"Not exactly." We differ in some points of doctrine. A still more considerable pause ensued. Whereupon a chief arose and said:—"Go home you white men and call a council—and when all you white men agree in what your book says, then come and tell us poor red men, and we will listen to you."

The moral of this response is voluminous and pungent in good sense. And indeed, the history of a large majority of missionary movements has, time and again, indicated—nay, demonstrated, how exceedingly impotent and unavailable have been the rival missions of the by-law established churches of the Old World ; and very much like them have been the voluntary, and not by-law, human or Divine, establishments of the New World.

The history of missions, so far as I have read it, both of the most and the least successful, has established one view, I might say one fact, beyond all reasonable debate. It is this :—that the union of Christians, on the apostolic basis, is an essential pre-requisite to any greatly successful effort to Christianize Pagandom, or to convert the world. And so long as our present Protestant and Romanist Missionary Institutions are engaged in merely recruiting for their own rank and file, instead of building upon the one only Divinely instituted platform—of one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one body, one Spirit, one hope, and one God and Father of all, who is above all, and in them all, they never can truly succeed.

These are the seven finely wrought and polished columns, upon which wisdom has builded her house and ornamented and garnished it. This, however, is not mere architectual wisdom, nor mere architectural taste. It is only type not antitype.

But with Paul at our elbow, we figuratively say to the true evangelical converts—"you are no more aliens or sojourners, but fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God ; having been built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets—Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone. By which, the whole structure being fitly framed together, groweth into a temple to the Lord ; by which you also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit."

To accomplish this is the sum and the substance, the Alpha and the Omega of the Christian missionary, and also of the whole Christian dispensation.

It is no fancy sketch. It is a Divinely ordained and authenticated reality. It is no schismatical, sectional, partizan or politico-ecclesiastical association or institution. It is like the Gospel, the wisdom and the power, the grace and the mercy of God abounding through faith, and hope, and love, to the glory of God, and to the glory, honour, and felicity of man for ever and ever.

We, too, as a community, have a large field opened to us, and very pressing calls, invitations, and indeed, importunities to cultivate it. We hear something like the Macedonian cry, the cry which Paul heard some eighteen hundred years ago—"come over and help us."

We have brethren in Asia, in Europe, in America, and if rightly informed, sometime since, in Africa, crying—"come over" or send over "and help us." I have before me a copy of the Christian Advocate and Southern Observer, printed and published in Adelaide, South Australia—under date of July 1st, 1858. In its programme we read, "The above paper is intended for the advocacy and promulgation of pure Christianity." From its internal evidence, I opine the Editor of it was baptized in Bethany, some years since. This monthly promises that "Questions and replies emanating from Christians of any denomination, provided the same are written in a Christian spirit, shall be received and responded to in its columns." This is as it ought to be on the part of those who inquire for the good old paths, that they may walk in them.

We have also good tidings from the Jamaica mission ; our most estimable Bro. J. O. BEARDSLEE is doing a good work there, and is much encouraged in his work of faith and labours of love.*

It is seldom, very seldom, that the Gospel, the apostolic Gospel, is clearly, forcibly, and earnestly pressed on any ordinary community, without alluring, captivating, or subduing some candid and inquisitive hearts, that were never before enamoured with its charms, nor constrained by its motives, to vow allegiance and fealty to the admirable and adorable author and founder of the Christian faith, hope, and love; whom to appreciate, honour, and obey, is the climax of reason, and the basis of all true piety and humanity.

* At home, in our own United States, the cause we plead, judging from our files, has not, for many years, been so generally successful, prosperous, and triumphant. We have not had reported in any preceding year, for a quarter of a century, so large accessions by baptism as during the last and the current year. Many thousands within these United States, have been immersed this year.—Large accessions also are reported in the Canadas, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward's Island. Indeed, wherever the Gospel—the original Gospel, and its institutions—are scripturally stated, developed, and earnestly pressed upon the attention of the community, it more or less obtains a hold, a strong hold, on the understanding, the conscience, and the affections of the thinking and discriminating portion of the auditories addressed.

But we have not yet named our long cherished missionary field. The old field around the temple, the hill of Calvary, Gethsemane, the City of the Great King, and its environs.

Our Bro. BARCLAY and family sailed from Boston in May last, and in July safely arrived at Bierout. From a letter received from Sister WILLIAMS, dated August 4th, we learn that the public affairs were rather in an unpropitious attitude; but not discouraged, they resolved to remain in that country and to await and to follow the openings of the Divine Providence.

The Episcopal and the Presbyterian missions in Jerusalem still hold on their way. And why should not the Christian mission? Many years ago we repudiated sectarian missions and missionaries. So much was written and spoken some thirty-three years ago in the Christian Baptist against sectarian missions, that many of our contemporaries, then and since, have misrepresented us and our position on the whole subject of missions and missionary operations. From all the developments of the "City of the Great King," from the eloquent pen of Brother Dr. Barclay, and from all that has been published from his pen and that of Sister Williams, on the past and present attitudes of Jerusalem, to the Christian nations so called, and to all nations, and peoples, and languages that visit it from any and every nation, its claims upon our special regard as a peculiar people, are paramount to the claims of any other people beyond our own national precincts.

"There once stood the thrones of judgment,
The thrones of the house of David.
Pray for the peace of Jerusalem,
They shall prosper that love thee.
Peace be within thy walls,
And prosperity within thy palaces.
For our brethren and companions' sakes,
I will now say peace be within thee.
Because of the house of Jehovah our God,
I will ever seek thy prosperity."
(PSALM CXXII.)

So sang the sweet Psalmist of Israel some three thousand years ago. The greatest events that have transpired on earth occurred in Jerusalem. The Remedial System was consummated there—the human race was ransomed there—the sin of the world was expiated there. Life and immortality were brought to light there, in the resurrection of Jesus the Christ. Thence he ascended to the right hand of his Father and our Father. Thither he dispatched the Holy Spirit to consecrate, sanctify, and bless his people, and to attest the mission of the holy twelve. And thus the model church of Christ was erected and magnified in all the earth. The commission was formally signed, sealed, and delivered there; and there were the Apostles to commence their operations.

We have never doubted the prosperity, the utility, the indispensability of Christian missions. We have, indeed, so far back as our memory reaches, approved and advocated the cause of evangelical missions; and for this reason we must always disapprove sectarian and schismatic missions and missionaries. The Lord Jesus Christ was himself emphatically the missionary of Jehovah absolute, in the person of the Father, and is so called Malachi iii. 1: "Behold I will send my (angel) messenger, (missionary)

And he shall prepare the way before me;
And the Lord whom you seek,
Shall suddenly come to his temple,
The angel, the messenger, the missionary of the covenant in whom you delight."
"Behold he is about to come," says Jehovah of hosts.

So we translate the version of Tremellius and Junius, London ed. A.D. 1581; and this, too, with the approbation of their most approved interpreters.

We have a great field—one of the largest missionary fields ever assigned to any people. I do not mean the literal terra firma, or continent of these United States. But I mean the millions—the unreported myriads and millions living amongst us, in our houses, in our vicinities—that have no more faith in God, faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, faith in an everlasting life—no more hope of heaven, of immortality, of eternal life—than if there never had been such words uttered, such ideas entertained, such hopes cherished by mortal man.

We, too, as a people, favored as we are with more simple, more rational, more intelligible, consequently with more appreciable arguments and motives, ought to be more diligent, more enterprising, and more devoted to the grand work of proclaiming the Gospel, and sending out missionaries of the cross in our own country, in Jamaica, Asia, Australia, as far as the Lord opens the door and affords us the men and the means. I might have said as far as He has already opened the door and conferred on us the means of glorifying our Redeemer, His cause and kingdom, and blessing our own neighbours, with all the behests, and promises, and hopes of the Gospel.

What live we for, my Christian brethren, my fellow-citizens? I say, what live we for? Do we live to eat and labor, that we may be able to labor and eat? This would appear to be the philosophy of quite a respectable class of our contemporaries. But we profess to live for the God who created us, for the Saviour who redeemed us by his own blood, for the good, the honor, and the happiness of our offspring and that of our fellow-men. And how do we carry out and exhibit our profession? This, of course, is to be answered by every man for himself. And, in truth, it is a question which reason deposes, ought almost daily to be propounded by every rational man to himself, and for his own eternal interest, honor, and happiness.

Funds are necessary for every individual and social purpose of life. So Solomon discovered, when he said that "money answereth all things:" or, perhaps more properly rendered, "money supplies all these things"—of which he had been speaking—"a feast and all its luxuries." With us it is a legal representative of all things needful for man, and it can procure them. It is philosophically no more than the legal or imaginary representative of human labor in its whole import. What costs no labor, cannot be purchased or paid for. Hence the most essential of all things to life temporal, was never in the market, was never purchased by money. Neither the Holy Spirit nor atmospheric air were ever bought or sold by man. We have bought light, heat, water, bread, and all the necessities of life, save this one. Air or Spirit has never been in any market.

But God be thanked that we, as Christians, may be rich in good works, and have souls for hire; the best wages in the universe. Therefore, "he that winneth souls is wise."

I fear this bank is 'not at par with some of us. I have heard that one of our missionaries has had to contract a debt on his own personal responsibility. It was, I think, on all the premises, an involuntary neglect. I mention it merely to prevent the possibility of its recurrence. Let provisions always be in advance, the supply not only greater than the demand, but in advance of the demand. We want system, I presume to say, more than liberality. It behoves that system and punctuality, which are, indeed, the essential elements in every system of finance, be never lost sight of, never forgotten, never neglected. Punctuality, if not system, was sometimes neglected even in the case of Paul and some of his co-occupants, and for our admonition it is written and recorded by Paul himself.

Some of our missionaries are, it may be, now in Paul's school.—If they are, and if they should perchance ever see this, I will remind them of a part of a part of Paul's experience. "Not that I speak in respect of want," says he, "for I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound; everywhere and in all things I am instructed, both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer want. I can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth me. However you have done well that you have jointly contributed to relieve my affliction. Now, ye Philippians, know also that in the beginning of the Gospel, when I departed for Macedonia, no church had intercourse with me, as concerning giving and receiving, but you only; for in Thessalonica you sent once and again to my necessity. Not that I desire a gift, but I desire fruit that may abound to your account." This, however, is not the best of it. He adds, "But I have everything and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent by you — an odor of a delicious fragrance, a sacrifice acceptable and well-pleasing to God."

He that is not charmed, with the eloquence, the thrilling eloquence, of Paul's encomium upon the liberality of the Philippians, is not susceptible of refined enjoyment, possesses not that fine feeling—that exquisite sensibility whose symphony, in consonance with every emotion of the heart, so enrapturing, transports it for a moment, beyond and above all the pleasures of earth and sense. He alone can comprehend this, who has comprehended, and who has realized the meaning of one of the traditional sayings of the Lord Jesus,—“It is more blessed to give than to receive.”

But we must close. We have a large field. Five hundred evangelical missionaries would not supply the demand. Think of Texas. Think of the Valley of the Mississippi. Think of New England. Think of California. Think of Oregon. Think of Canada. Think of Nova Scotia, to say nothing of a hundred fields in Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Missouri, Kansas, and even in New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, &c.

The cause we plead demands the best energies of the best men in the world. It is misrepresented, caricatured, defamed by a large portion of the religious press.

They are creating monsters and killing them. They are manufacturing bugbears, and hobgoblins, and telling ghost stories, as perfect figments of human creation, as the Arabian Nights, or the Knight-errandries of the feudal times.

But the King's commandment was, and is, “answer them not.” We have for a considerable time past paid little or no attention to such outlandish defamers. There is a better way.

Let us by good behaviour, by good words, and good works, put to silence the idle slanders of deceived and deluded men. We have a large field at home and abroad. The harvest is truly great. Let us earnestly pray to the Lord of the harvest that he may greatly increase the number of our reapers. Our labours have been greatly blessed. We should be a very humble and very grateful people. We need to cultivate a higher spirituality, more heavenly mindedness, more consecration of heart and life to the Lord our Redeemer, his cause, and his people. This is the canonical way to put to silence the cunning craftiness, and the mischievous devices of our opponents. Let us not revile against their reviling. By good words and good works let us put to silence the ignorance of foolish men. They cannot injure us personally. Our hearers and our readers know that they are unwarrantably impeaching our teachings, and very generally misrepresenting them. They ascribe to us tenets that we never held, views that we never entertained, measures that we have never adopted.

The mind of the Holy Spirit is grammatically and logically communicated to us in the Greek and Hebrew Scriptures; and so it ought to be in our mother tongue. It can be so in every living tongue of the civilized nations of the earth. And when this is done, fairly, and fully, and perspicuously done, the humble and inquisitive way-faring man may find the way to the bosom of his Father and his God, if there were not a priest or a prelate within a thousand miles of him.

But the living voice of the living missionary was the Lord's election, ere the art of printing was conceived. It is still the Lord's means; indeed, in most cases, an indispensable means. There is no equivalent substitute for the living voice of a living man—a man in earnest, a man whose heart and tongue the Lord has touched with a live coal from his own altar.

There never has been found an equivalent substitute for the voice of a living man, whose heart has been penetrated with the philanthropy of God—whose soul has been touched with the sympathies of the Lord Jesus, developed in his sorrows and sufferings—and whose spirit has been baptized into the Holy Spirit, in all its fulness of grace and truth, and in all its potency of light and love.

But the missionary cause, in its immense area and paramount claims, is too large a theme for any one address, attempted or consummated by mortal man. Every angel in heaven, and every pure and holy spirit in God's universe, is a missionary. And such is, and such ought to be, every Christian man and woman.

But it is an adage amongst the wise politicians of earth, that “what is every man's business is no man's business.”

There is, indeed, much apparent, and some sound wisdom and discretion in the adage, "How shall they preach unless they be sent?" And they must feel that they are sent — and sent to labor in word and in prayer, in preaching and in teaching the Lord Jesus, in all his divine personality, in all his peerless grandeur, as "God manifest in the flesh," "attended by angels," "the one only Mediator," "justified by the Holy Spirit," "crowned Lord of all," and "ordained to be the judge of the living and of the dead."

All this evangelical work and labor is to be performed, not as a mere duty, but as a privilege, an honor, a glory ineffably superior to any office, or duty, or service, or glory, awarded to man in any of the ranks and dignities of earth and time. So we understand it—so we appreciate it—so we commend it to the church, and to every Christian man who can qualify himself for it, and devote to it all the energies of his nature—of body, soul, and spirit. Cheered, too, in his work of faith and labors of love with such oracles as these—"He that winneth souls is wise" (Solomon)—"Those who have wisely taught shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and those that have turned many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever" (Daniel)—"He that turneth a sinner back from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death, and cover his multitude of sins" (James). What the honors of an Alexander, a Cæsar, or a Napoleon, compared with those of a Paul, a Peter, or a John! When the books of God's remembrance are opened, and every man judged according to what is written there, who would not rather be the humblest Christian that ever lived, than the greatest monarch that ever reigned?

ELI AND THE ARK.

POOR old man! The dark lines of age are upon thy brow. The waves of sorrow have beaten up against thy soul. Hopes have deceived thee, and doubts and fears have encompassed thee. And what is worse than all, He whom thou lovest is angry with thee—not for any wrong which thou hast done, but for something which thou hast not done. Thy sons have made themselves vile, and thou hast not restrained them; and therefore God hath sworn that thy house shall not be purged of its iniquity by sacrifice nor by offerings. Yes, Eli, though thou art a judge in Israel, the oath of the Lord is against thee. Thou mightest have restrained thy children, but thou didst not. Hadst thou fully exercised the power with which God had endowed thee, thy sons might have been obedient, their lives honorable, their end peace. When God frowns, the symbols of His love are devoid of light and power. The dark cloud hides their glory, and the spirit bows in sorrow. His presence can only make us glad; His truth must be in our midst, or we cannot be happy, nor ensure success. The Israelites possessed the ark, but there was none of the sunshine of God's love upon it. There was the substance, but not the power—the matter, but not the spirit. Man had sinned,

God was angry—the people were scattered, and the ark was taken. Eli's heart trembled for the ark of the Lord. He knew it was the symbol of the divine presence, he knew it contained the pledges of God, and he feared lest it should fall into the hands of the enemy. But Eli was a father, and he loved his rebellious sons; he knew they would be in the battle, and how they would be exposed to danger, and in addition to this he knew also that the anger of the Lord was kindled against them. Under other circumstances, a remembrance of the ark of the Lord would have cheered the old man's heart, and with holy confidence he would have asked, "Who shall fight against God and prosper?" But his children had sinned, and Israel had separated from the ways of the Lord; and a knowledge of this filled his heart with fear. He could not remain at home; the couch gave neither comfort nor rest. His spirit is heavy and anxious—he trembles for the issue of the fearful conflict, and for the future he dare not hope. The battle is now raging, the angel of darkness and discord hath outspread her wings, and thirty thousand are slain. There, on the road side, sits that aged, loving, fearful, trembling judge. He must be near to the scene of conflict, and he is found by the wayside watching. While there a man of the tribe of Benjamin ran with his clothes rent, and earth upon his head; he had fled from the army to convey the news of defeat and death; the men of Israel were slain, and the enemies of God victorious. The citizens sent up a wail of lamentation and woe, and soon the unwelcome news fell upon the ears of Eli. Where are my sons, and how has it fared with them? And the answer given was, Hophni and Phineas are dead. He was partly prepared for the solemn tidings, and retaining his position, complained not at the loss he had sustained. But again the messenger speaks, and he is told that the ark of the Lord was taken. Now all hope was gone; this was fatal news, and he who had judged Israel forty years, fell back from his seat and broke his neck. Proof this, beyond all disputation, how sincerely Eli loved God. He knew what the ark contained, and he forgot not the covenant of Jehovah. He knew that the light of Heaven rested upon the mercy seat, and that the glorious presence of God was there. He knew that its being taken was an evidence that the glory had departed; he knew that the worshippers of Dagon had captured the Divine symbol, his heart failed him, and he died. Here, in his last moments, he showed his superlative love for God. He heard the sad tidings of the death of his children with firmness and fortitude; but he was so smitten by the news that the ark was taken, that he died. His love to God was supreme—his death was sudden—but we doubt not that his pardoned spirit ascended to God. We know he did wrong in not restraining his children, but we delight to feel how strongly attached he was to the Lord of hosts. Eli loved God better than he loved his children. Near and dear as they were to him, God was nearer and dearer. He felt the presence and the power of God; and thus, while we deplore his short comings, we cannot but admire his religious devotedness. He teaches us to love God with all our hearts, and to fix our thoughts on heaven. In that sudden paralysis which seized the old man's soul, which collapsed all its energies and destroyed its power, we can clearly see how deep and pure was his love. Eli loved the ark of the Lord; it was connected with the old dispensation, and was highly suggestive and instructive to his mind. And now, dear friends, we are assembled on the first day of the week, in the great name of Him who is the Head of the church, we will not be unmindful of Him who is the author of a new and better covenant. These are the symbols of his body and his blood. Here we can sit as in the garden of the Lord, and behold our beloved one as the "rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley," for "he has brought us into his banquetting house, and his banner over us is love." And here, in obedience to his command, we partake of the significant and precious memorials, "until the day break, and the shadows flee away." This is the sacred inclosure of the church. Here are the trees of God's right-hand planting. This is the place of "green pastures" through which run "the streams of the water of life." Here we sing the songs of Zion—here, by the exercise of faith, we catch a glimpse of Calvary's cross and the holy hill of Zion—here we are waiting for the coming of our Lord, and through the medium of the ever-blessed Word we can read the signs of the times, and they are portentous, that the period is not far distant, when our Great Deliverer will descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God. Here are sentiments which are set to the music of the skies. Here is a divine influx of the truth of God. Here is the angel of the New Covenant. Here are the type and the antitype. Here is a meeting of the past and the future. Passing athwart the light and glory of the church can be seen the rays of divine prediction, which tell of the downfall and complete overthrow of the power of sin; at the same time they give assurance to Zion that her end shall be glorious and her happiness complete. Here converge all the rays of the Sun of Righteousness, and they reveal to us this heavenly truth, that "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Here the star of Bethlehem is in the ascendant. And here, in the broken bread and the fruit of the vine, we see the love and the mercy of God more clearly shadowed forth than did Eli, when he looked upon the ark of the Lord. For these emblems remind us of the body and the blood, and ignoring as we do for ever the dogma of Rome as to the real presence, we would not detract one iota from the deep spiritual blessings which flow to us through this holy and divine institution, for we feel that the presence of Christ is here. These symbols enable us to remember him, and by so doing they draw us nearer to God. Here the bleeding, suffering, dying man of Calvary is set before us, and we behold him who was stricken and smitten for the sins of the world. This is sacred ground. Here are no sounds of war and contention. Here is no sinful weakness depending upon carnal weapons. Here no angry expressions are cherished, and sin cannot find a home. Here the world is held at a distance, and all its glory fades away. Here we listen to him whose words are spirit and life. Here we feel the holy and quickening impulses of that faith which worketh by love; and here we will remain, under the shadow of Thy wing, for Thou, O Lord, art our help, our hope, and our deliverer. There is another affecting circumstance in connection with the narrative. When the wife of Phineas heard that her father-in-law and husband were dead, and that the ark of the Lord was taken, she bowed herself in sorrow, and could not rejoice at the birth of a son. Her hope fled, and in the pains of death she called him Ichabod, saying, the glory is departed from Israel, for the ark of the Lord is taken. And over all the systems of error, whether taught by the priests or believed by the people, Ichabod is written. Nothing under the old dispensation could atone for the loss of the ark of the Lord, and nothing under the present dispensation can be substituted for the institutions of the church, for they are divinely appointed. Take these precious symbols away, and upon the door of our forsaken temple Ichabod will be inscribed. These are the pledges of the new covenant, and they are full of power, spirit, and life. They are the chosen emblems of Him who was touched with our infirmities. We read in them the mind of the Father and the Son. They speak of better things than the blood of Abel. They connect us with the solemnities of Calvary, and they speak to us in a language which the world cannot hear. And what than such emblems could be more appropriate? Bread is the primary sustenance of our natural life. It is our common, daily, necessary food. Under ordinary circumstances it tells us of the mercy and love of God, and we read of Him who is the bread of life. But here it reminds us of the body of our Lord, and we eat in remembrance of that body which was nailed to the cross. And when our Divine Master commanded us so to do, he knew what a great blessing and spiritual feast it would be. And how strikingly significant is the pure, the precious, the life-giving, and unadulterated fruit of the vine, which is the blood of the grape. This is the new wine which is found in the cluster, and is not to be destroyed because a blessing is in it, and is properly emblematical of the new wine in the kingdom of God. Fit emblem, this, to represent the blood of Christ. Here is no lurking, evil, insidious spirit; it is a blessing from heaven, and the wine of God. And as heaven is a prepared place for a prepared people, so is the church of God. Here we recognize no earthly potentate as defender of the faith — here we have no mitred lordly bishop — here we have no privileged and presuming officials — here we require no worldly credentials — here we have no need of officiating priests — here, on this holy hill of Zion, we stand to recognize the divine authority and holy kingship of Him who is the Captain of our salvation and the Head of the church. We have tasted of the world, and its rivers of pleasure are bitter as gall, its glories are a curse, and its riches a snare. In it there is no resting-place for the soul. Its demands are imperious, its promises are false, its denizens are sinners, its laws are unjust, and the nations are foolishly trusting in the triumphs and power of the sword. Some put their trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will put our trust in the Lord: for in his house, and at his table, all the requirements of the soul are met, and there is not a spiritual want which cannot be supplied. Here the Saviour and the sinner meet. Here the light of truth reveals the excellent glory. The world is without, and Christ is within. He is now with us in spirit and in truth. Brethren, we are now assembled in the lower chamber, where we are commanded to be faithful and to wait, until we shall be called up to the heavenly mansion, to be the honored guests of Him who is the sinner's friend, and the King of Glory.

SAMSON.

CHAPTER III.

AGAIN the Sun is sinking low upon Mount Hermon, and tracking its slender palms and noble olives in lengthening shadows upon the ground. The day, whose dawn was so brightly beautiful, whose morning beams were hailed with joy by so many, is fast passing away. How quickly its golden hours have winged their round! And yet, how much has been done therein, how much left undone! How much done, that must bring a repentance eternity may not measure! How much left undone, in those few short hours, whose neglect eternity is too short to repair!

Yea, the bright day is almost gone, almost ready to bid the earth adieu, and float away to join the mighty throng of days that have gone before it; bearing with it its sealed record of good and evil works there, with them, to await the judgment. Its labours past, it has joy to the weary, for it brings them needed rest. The strong men who went forth with the Sun to toil in the broad wheat fields of the wealthy Gideon, are even now wiping the early dew from their sickles, and turning in the direction of their homes. The gleaners, light-handed, or laden, as the day has prospered them, are beating out the ears they have gathered, that they may bear the precious bounty with them to their poor abodes. At the entrance to the fields stands the steward of the master of the harvest, dispensing to each of the hot-browed reapers their hire as they pass.

Among them is Manoah. But for the homeliness of his attire, and the dust and sweat that disfigure his brow and hands, he might well be thought the lord of those broad lands, so stately in his gait, so unsubdued by toil is his proud bearing. He walks silent and sad, as a man who has known sorrow and misfortune, without being broken by the one, or made reckless by the other.

Yet, as with a courteous adieu he leaves his fellow-laborers at the gate of the fields, and turns down the quiet path that leads to the home so dear to his heart, his eye brightens, and his step is quicker, for the thought of the serene joys that await him there. He thinks of the evening meal, plain and frugal, as befits their slender means, yet seasoned with loving smiles and pleasant converse. He thinks of the evening's rest beneath the sheltering trees before his door, sweetened by previous toil and soothed by music's holy spell. How blest are those, who, like Manoah, find home the dearest spot of earth! For years these have been his only pleasures, but they have not yet palled upon his taste. For years the same patient, gentle face has met him on his return from the toil those years have not yet rendered unnecessary, but it is still fair to his loving gaze; nay, though those same years have pilfered its roses, and in their steady flight graven many lines, it is even fairer than when of yore it won his first young love.

A quick step fell upon his ear, and raising his eyes, before fixed in thought upon the ground, Manoah saw Zillah standing before him. There was a bright smile upon her face, and an eager light in her dark eyes. And more than usually warm was the accustomed embrace.

"What has happened thee, my Zillah?" he asked, while a look of pleased surprise brightened his own grave face; "for, that something hath, thine eyes tell me with speech which, though silent, is none the less eloquent."

The smile fled, and a shade of solemnity gathered on her brow; but the eager look was still in her eyes as she replied:

"A wonderful thing hath happened me, Manoah; so strange, so wonderful, that I half fear thou wilt think me mad when I tell it thee."

"Fear not that, my Zillah," he exclaimed earnestly, "but rather make the thing known to me. And let it be even now, as we walk homeward, for I have a strange longing to know what hath thus moved thee."

"Oh, Manoah!" and she seized his hand, and withheld him as he would have gone on his way ; how shall I find words to tell thee what I have this day seen and heard ? How wilt thou believe that the LORD hath had so great mercy on me—on us both ?

"Zillah," said her husband, tenderly, "but for the almost agonized earnestness that tells me something hath greatly moved thee, I should marvel at thy thus speaking. Thou knowest I could not lightly regard any speech of thine. Fear not, then, my beloved, to tell me all. Is it joy, or grief, or fear, that moves thee thus ?"

"Oh, Manoah, joy, joy ! Spake I not unto thee but yesternight, how all my life I had besought the LORD for a great boon, even for a child that should be the deliverer of His people, the chosen instrument of the Most High, mighty to work His will ? Thou wottest how my weak heart staggered through unbelief—how, because the LORD delayed to answer my prayer, I thought it might never be. I forgot that His ear is not heavy that he cannot hear, neither His arm shortened that He cannot save. Ah, Manoah, His ear hath heard my cry—His arm hath been outstretched to save me. To-day, at noon, as I sat beside the brook and mused upon these things, having but finished my noontide meal, a man of God came unto me—and his countenance was like an angel of God, very terrible—but I asked him not whence he was, neither told me he his name. But he said unto me : 'Behold, thou shalt conceive and bear a son ! And now, drink no wine, nor strong drink ; neither eat any unclean thing : for the child shall be a Nazarite of God, from the womb to the day of his death.' And when he had thus spoken unto me, he was gone, I know not whence or how. I only knew all this was not a beauteous dream—that it was a blest reality. I only knew that, sinful as my prayer was, He had granted it—that henceforth He had taken away my reproach—that the longing of my heart was given me !"

"My Zillah ! is this indeed so ?" exclaimed Manoah, after a pause, during which joy and wonder had held him dumb ; "were these gracious words spoken thee, of a truth ?"

"Even so, Manoah ; I have told thee all my heart."

"I doubted not, my beloved," he replied ; "in this I know thou dealest truly with me. But, art thou sure thou thyself hast not been deceived ? How looked the messenger, who, thou believest, came from the presence of the Most High ?"

"No speech of mortal tongue, my husband, can describe the glorious beauty, the awful majesty of his presence ; how, then, can I ? I know not how mine eyes were strengthened to behold him. The thought of his majesty even now fills me with awe."

"And said he no more unto thee ?" questioned Manoah. "Spake he nothing of what manner of child this should be ?"

"He said the child should be a Nazarite to God, even unto the day of his death. He said, moreover, that he should deliver Israel from the Philistines."

"Said he so ?" demanded Manoah, eagerly. "Then we are blest, indeed ! Oh, does the day draw nigh when this land shall be released from the slavish tyranny of these proud Philistines ? When the worship of the Most High shall again be established ! When His people, now scattered like sheep without a shepherd, shall have a leader like the mighty Joshua, or even the Holy Moses ! When the liberty that now leaves every man to do that which is right in his own eyes, shall be taken away, and a righteous government instituted ! For, what hath this freedom been ? The freedom of vice and wrong ! The freedom of rapine and robbery ! The freedom of lust and violence ! The freedom of the worst passions of a depraved nature ! Oh, blessed day, when all this shall cease, and the chosen people again be the people of God ! Truly, the LORD is loving unto Israel ! Even when he seemed wroth with us, and we counted ourselves forsaken of Him, He thought upon mercy, He devised a great deliverance. Blessed be the Lord, even the God of Israel, who hath not cast off His rebellious people ! But yet I can scarcely believe this. It hath been long since God hath thus visited His people—since His messengers have thus visibly appeared unto men."

"But it is even so, my husband," said Zillah eagerly, and clasping his hand in both hers ; "surely, thou knowest——"

"Think not, my own Zillah, I would doubt thy truth," he said, earnestly and solemnly. "In all that thou hast told me, I know thou hast dealt faithfully. And thou knowest how earnestly I desire this thing. It may be that the very intensity of my longing makes me doubtful. And yet, how couldst thou be deceived? Thou sawest the man of God plainly, and heardest his speech. Was it no mere vision, my Zillah? Is it not possible, that, overpowered by the heat and fatigue of the day, thou didst sleep unaware, and in a dream didst see this so vividly as to think it a reality? Thou sayest thou wast musing upon this thing as thou didst repose thyself at the brookside, having finished thy repast. Thou knowest how readily our waking thoughts weave themselves into dreams when we sleep. And if we greatly desire a thing, the dream is prone to picture its fulfilment. Thou sayest, moreover, that the man of God did depart from thee, thou knowest not when or how. May not the time when thou didst miss him from thy sight have been the moment of thine awakening out of sleep?"

"Thy reasoning is plausible, Manoah," replied Zillah, sorrowfully, "and may deceive thee; but it cannot convince me. I would I could make the assurance I feel of the truth of this, thine own."

"I would thou couldst!" he answered, sadly. "But why camest thou not to me at once as I wrought in the field? Peradventure the man of God would have tarried thy return, and I too might have heard his words, and perchance inquired somewhat more perfectly of him concerning the child."

"Thou sawest him not," said she, half reproachfully, "else thou wouldst not ask this. How could I think to leave his awful presence? No, Manoah! I could only tremble, and be still. And when mine eyes saw him no more, I essayed to come to thee, but desisted, lest I should seem unto thee as one that mocked. So I tarried even until now."

"It may be that I sin in doubting this," said Manoah, in a tone of sad musing. "Why should it seem a thing impossible unto me, that God should do this? Thou art pained, my beloved, at my unbelief; yet, how gladly would I believe—how fully and unreservedly

—if I could! Oh, that the LORD would send His messenger again unto us, that we might know the certainty of this matter—that we might know what we shall do unto the child!"

"Hearken unto me, my husband," said Zillah, after a moment of silent thought. "The LORD is merciful. Let us beseech Him that His messenger may come again unto us, and show us more clearly of this thing."

"Thou hast well said. Peradventure it will not displease Him." He lifted his eyes to the heaven, now studded with myriad stars, whose twinkling light paled before the radiance of the full moon, which like a shield of silver was riding majestically up the sky. "Oh, Thou that dwellest in the heavens, let not the prayer of Thy servant displease thee! Oh, my LORD, let the man of God, whom thou didst send at the first, come again unto us, and teach us what we shall do unto the child that shall be born! Hear us of Thy mercy, and according unto the prayer of Thy servants, so let it be done unto them."

"And now, dear Zillah, let us seek our homes. In the interest of our converse, time hath fled away unaware. The last lingering tinge of day hath quite faded from the West. Our little flock, too, will be strayed away ere long, if we fold them not."

"And thou must need refreshment, my husband," said Zillah, tenderly; "for the day hath been long and the heat oppressive. But the evening meal awaits our return, for I prepared it ere I left the cottage. There are the hearth-cakes thou lovest best, with honey of Lebanon. Our neighbour, the wife of Benjamin the Levite, received a gift of some but this day noon, and she hastened to send me a cruse for our own bread. And there is parched corn, with raisins, and a cake of figs of mine own preparing, which, thou knowest, hath much repute. I have likewise drawn wine from the oldest vintage of our store."

"Thou art ever careful of my comfort, my own Zillah; but I half marvel thou shouldst have thought to do it while thy mind was so full of other things. But I fear lest I shall do injustice to the dainties thou hast so temptingly described. Thy marvellous story hath dissipated my appetite. Thou hadst been more politic, hadst thou kept thy feast of wonders till the other was despatched," he added, playfully.

"Art thou still sceptical?" she asked, timidly.

"Nay, dear Zillah," he replied. "Let us wait the answer of our prayer. I will not doubt, but leave it to the LORD. Thou knowest the words in the Book :

'How hast Thou helped him
That is without power!

How savest Thou the arm
That hath no strength!

How hast Thou counselled him
That hath no wisdom!

And how hast Thou plentifully Declared the thing as it is!

Lo! these are a part of His ways;
But, how little a portion is heard of Him!
But the thunder of His power,
Who can understand?" J. S. S.

DISCIPLES versus BAPTISTS.—PROPOSAL FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION.

PASSING, as I have recently done, through the fields most frequented by Elder Ford, of Louisville, Ky. and learning from most reliable sources his standing in the Baptist community and out of it, I could not, with a due degree of self-respect, and a proper regard for the cause which I plead, condescend to meet him in any discussion, oral or written, on any Christian theme in issue between our brethren and the Baptist community.

There are, however, Christian gentlemen in Kentucky and out of it, of literary, scientific, and Christian attainments, with whom I would, indeed, much desire to have a calm and courteous oral discussion before the public, on any or on all the issues they may please to form on any of the prominent points in which they may differ from us. To name one whose character, education, and position are quite respectable—and, to me, altogether acceptable—I will, at a proper time and place, agree to meet Dr. D. R. Campbell, President of Georgetown College, Ky. on all the issues between us and the Baptists; and, to accommodate him, I will meet him in his own town, and amidst his own community, at any time on which we may agree. I most unfeignedly desire union and communion with all Christian people who will unite on the apostolic platform, of "one body, one spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one immersion, one God and Father of all." These are the seven pillars which Divine wisdom has hewn out, and on which it has builded its peaceful house of refuge for a tempest-tossed and a sin-polluted world. It is for Christian union, communion, and coöperation, on an apostolic basis, we have been pleading for more than forty years. Candid, face to face discussion is desired and approved by all Christian men. It was mainly by it that the Protestant Reformation gained its triumphs over the Popedom.

It is sanctioned by the Founder of the Christian kingdom, and was practiced by the great Apostle to the Gentiles. The labors of the Lord himself and of his Apostle to the Gentiles have abundantly justified it. And have we not a standing precept on the subject, "Contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints?" Who can hesitate on its legitimacy, seeing that Michael the archangel is, by Jude, represented as having had a debate or dispute with the Devil about the body of Moses.

Discussions may be conducted most amicably, I was about to say, by Christian gentlemen. But are not all Christians gentlemen? They ought most certainly to be gentlemen, seeing that gentleness is one of the fruits of the Holy Spirit. But, alas! my experience has taught me that even all preachers and editors of weeklies and monthlies devoted to schismatic religions are not gentlemen. My high estimate, however, of Dr. D. R. Campbell, as a scholar, a gentleman, and a Christian, is such as to authorize and justify me in preferring him to any other man, especially as I have reason, good and valid, to regard him as opposing the platform on which I conceive the Lord Jesus said he would build his church. If he do, he can give reason for it, and we shall weigh and candidly consider all his reasons. If he do not, then we are joint laborers.

1. We preach no theory of faith, repentance, and baptism for the remission of sins; but simply faith in Christ, re- penitance towards God, and baptism for the remission of sins.

2 Hence we reprobate a relation of what is usually called "Christian experience" on the part of a candidate for Christian baptism, instead of a formal and sincere declaration of his faith in Christ.

3 We also believe and teach, that unless a man be born of water and Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God as preached by Jesus Christ.

4 We also believe and teach, that any baptism dispensed "in the name" of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, is not Christian, but Papal baptism.

5 We also believe and teach that the Holy Spirit operates upon the understanding, conscience, and affections of men, not by mere impact or contact, but through the Law and the Gospel.

6 We believe and teach that there is neither Law nor Gospel authority for monthly, quarterly, semi-annually, or annually celebrating the Lord's Supper. Weekly communion is the only communion recognized and approved in the Christian Scriptures.

Contemplating these as positive issues, and most cordially desiring Christian union, communion, and coöperation with all the children of God, I benevolently desire to see them obtain amongst all truthful professors of the Christian faith, because they are indispensable not only for their own good and growth in grace, but for the progress of the Gospel at home and abroad in Pagandom.

Do not all true and sincere Christians pray for the union of the church, as a divinely-ordained preliminary to the spread of his empire and the conversion of the world? And why pray for it, unless we work for it? The Great Teacher, familiar with the Cabinet of Heaven and its purposes and instrumentalities, prayed thus — "Neither pray I for these only," the consecrated apostles, "but for all them that shall believe on me through their word" or testimony, "that they (too) all may be one, that the world" — Jews and Gentiles — "may know that Thou hast sent me, and hast loved them as Thou hast loved me."

Schisms cannot but be most odious in His sight who conceived and uttered these words. We all know, or may know, and ought to know, that in the reason and argument of this prayer, schisms amongst Christians are the only assignable and valid reasons why the missionary operations, with a few and feeble exceptions, have hitherto been an awful failure.

Discussions are favorably reported of in the progress of the Protestant Reformation. They were frequent in the times of the Messiah and his Apostles. Truth never lost anything, but always gained by them. Debate has generally been favorable to the cause of truth and justice. "Thrice is he armed who has his quarrel just." I think it is due to truth and justice, that the special and prominent issues between us and the Baptists should, face to face, be candidly, kindly, and religiously discussed. What do you say, Dr. Campbell? I hope soon to hear from you on all the premises. A. C.

SEMI-CONVERTED CHARACTER OF PROTESTANTS.

Is Protestantism a dépôt of negative Christianity — of semi-converted men given to the Disciples as a reward for their fidelity to the Scriptures, and by them to be transferred and made positive by the Gospel of Christ?

In the revealed system there is progress—one advance succeeds another. The affairs of Abraham, for instance, were first in promise, then in covenant, then confirmed by an oath, and finally the memory of the whole was perpetuated by the right of circumcision. Hence, also, one thing is subservient to another—the Law to the Gospel. The former was a schoolmaster till Christ—the people were in a state of involuntary servitude to God and the Law—bondmen—that they might the better appreciate the adoption of sons by Christ Jesus.

John's order of things was evidently provisional—a stepping-stone from the Law to the Gospel, or from Moses to Jesus our Lord—for this grand man enjoined it upon his disciples that they should believe on him by whom he was to be immediately succeeded.

Even our Lord's disciples—and he made and baptized more than John—were in a state of negative Christianity during Christ's sojourn on earth, and consequently formed but a dépôt for the Apostles to draw upon, so soon as our religion was made positive by the descent of the Spirit. Hence our Lord said to them, "I have sent you to reap that on which ye bestowed no labor; others (John and Jesus) have labored, and ye have entered into their labors" (John iv.)

Is not, then, Protestantism a dépôt—a mass of converted, semi-converted, and unconverted men, who have the faith of the gospel without the spirit of the gospel—created in the lapse of three centuries, but utterly unable, by any truth it possesses, to emerge from the confusion into which its party sensitiveness has precipitated it; and therefore, its aim being division, can never attain to unity, but must be superseded: that is, transferred into a state of spiritual Christianity, and reduced to one body in Christ?

It were very improbable that Divine Providence should raise up a great people, such as they are become, filled with excellent knowledge and enlightened zeal, except for some great and wise purpose. Now, out of the many sects to make one church, is their purpose.

We have just returned from a visit of fifteen days, to a point where there has heretofore been "all sorts of preaching by all sorts of men," from the Universalist downward, and where were made, during that brief space, to the good cause, seventy accessions. At a former visit about thirty persons were added. The excitement startled into life the sister churches, and our brethren during the interval reaped a goodly harvest of about fifty. Thus there have been added to the good cause, in that direction, upwards of one hundred and fifty souls.

Of the 'one hundred that presented themselves during my visits, there could not have been less than between sixty and seventy male persons, either in the flower of their age, or on the verge of manhood, offering to the eye—which, however, looketh only to appearances—the most signal promise of good to the cause. O that the Lord, in his infinite goodness, would raise up shepherds to feed his flock, lest they perish for lack of knowledge!

During our "fight against sin," we delivered, at our two visits, about fifty discourses, and upwards of one hundred and fifty exhortations, rode two hundred and fifty miles, encountering two floods, three thunder storms, and gusts of wind and showers without number. Thanks to the Father of mercies, no evil accrued to any one.

Universalism, that most impudent of heresies, had nearly destroyed one of the churches; but after a thorough confutation of the system, the head of the party was brought to his senses, and with his sister wife, reorganized with the church. The insolence of this heresy is seen chiefly in its speaking of the question of eternal rewards and punishments, as if it were not a closed question (See Mat. xxv.)

Protestantism, in all its extent, is before us—a grand dépôt of semi-converted men, ready to be "translated" from the world, and made positive elements of the kingdom of God. In this great work, mind must act on mind omnipotently, till the understanding is enlightened and the will subdued.

TIMOTHY AND TITUS—THEIR OFFICIAL DUTIES.

FROM the various views published in our religious periodicals, and from the strange position assumed by some of our most gifted scribes, I have been driven to re-examine the subject of Evangelists, their office and duties.

I believe that both Timothy and Titus were Evangelists, or preachers of the Word; but I deny that Paul's instructions in his letters were given to them as evangelists; but that they were given to them as his "sons in the faith," as ministers or deacons: for, in other words, as deputies of the apostle, left in Ephesus and in Crete to do precisely what Paul, as an apostle, would have done had he been present.

It is true that Paul commanded Timothy to do the work of an evangelist; and it is also true that he gave him more than fifty other commands, which are not, and cannot, be comprehended in the command, "Do the work of an evangelist:" for, says Bro. Campbell, "the etymology of the word (evangelist) simply means a proclaimer of the gospel"—"one that declares good news." "And if it did not import anything more then, it cannot now." Now if Timothy had a right to the official title of evangelist because he was commanded to "do the work of an evangelist," then he is entitled to fifty other official titles growing out of commands not comprehended in the work of an evangelist.

Why, then, select one official title out of fifty? Why not call Timothy the deacon, the exhorter, the non-heeder, bishop-ordainer, commander, wine-bibber, fighter, soldier, committer, and so on through all the fifty titles which must grow out of the nature of the fifty commands? Besides, we were taught by Brother Campbell, at the commencement of the current Reformation, to "call Bible things by Bible names." Now it is a fact, that no inspired writer ever called Timothy or Titus an evangelist. In the face of these facts, we must conclude that the charges or commands to Timothy and Titus, "to set in order the things wanting," "to ordain elders," "to lay hands suddenly on no man," "to charge some that they teach no other doctrine," were not given them as evangelists, but as deputies of the apostle, or as ministers of Jesus Christ.

Looking at the letters to Timothy and Titus from this stand-point, they seem plain and intelligible; but from any other stand-point in our horizon, they seem wholly unintelligible. Bro. Campbell seems to have stood on this eminence when he wrote the following—"After churches or communities had been organized and set in order, with their bishops and deacons, their proper work as evangelists ceased. They had no official authority over them."

But, says an objector, we are taught now-a-days, that evangelists "were to ordain elders by the imposition of hands, and to see that they were provided for and sustained in the discharge of their duties." The objector ought to reflect, that these naked assertions, destitute of foundation or even shadow of proof, either in the etymology of the word, or in reason or revelation, will not satisfy the honest inquirer after truth. Indeed, some of our ablest, most profound thinkers, and most accomplished scholars, have doubted whether there ever was such an act as ordination, peculiarly so called. In the sense of all proof on this subject, F. Campbell, some twenty-five or thirty years ago, wrote the following:—"to the act called ordination or inauguration, if ever there were such an act peculiarly so called, it consisted in the imposition of the hands of the senior or elders of the congregation." Again, "With the history of the world, with the pages of Jewish and Christian history before me, I would contend that any congregation has a right to call, appoint, or ordain any person to an office laid down in the Volume, and do all the acts and deeds thereto appertaining, without calling to their aid the assistance of any foreign deacon, bishop or officer."—Christian Baptist, p. 26.

But the objector asks, "Are not evangelists properly located by Paul in Eph. iv. 11, and is not the office of evangelist a permanent office in the church?" In answer, we were taught twenty-eight or thirty years ago, that "the ancients called those who wrote, as well as those who spoke, the facts constituting Gospel history by this name" (evangelists.) "Besides, the office of evangelist, as a proclaimer, was always contingent. He was needed only in some places, and at some times, and was a permanent officer of the Christian church. His office now answers to prophets of old. The prophets, as temporaneous and occasional teachers, became necessary. When, then, a congregation has a brother well qualified to proclaim the Gospel, and where there is, in the vicinity, a people in need of such service, let the person sent by them be called an evangelist. Perhaps the present distress requires such person as much as in any former period. But when Christian congregations cover the country, and walk in the instituted order of the new constitution, such persons will not be necessary, any more than a standing army in times of peace."—Christian Baptist, page 586.

The honest inquirer still asks, If evangelist be a violator of the law of God, is it not the duty of his fellow evangelists to assemble together, for a quorum, and try the offender? In answer, that there is neither precedent nor example in the New Testament, such a quorum of evangelists for such purpose, and in the absence of Scripture authority, I concur with Brother Campbell in his Christian Baptist, page 231—"I cannot give my voice in favor of appeals to any tribunal, but to the congregation of which the offended is a member, neither to a council of churches specially called, nor to an association. The Old Book written by the apostles, has compelled me to hold fast this dogma. And I can, I know, show that it is superior to every other course. I will grant, however, that this plan will not suit a denomination or a sect; but it will suit the kingdom over which Immanuel reigns."

Our interrogator still inquires, May not evangelists, as such, assemble in a missionary society or meeting, form a quorum, and decide church difficulties? We again answer, in the entire absence of Scripture authority, No! While I object to all meetings for such purposes, I must say, in the language of our venerable and beloved Brother Campbell—"I have no objections to congregations meeting in hundreds, at stated times, to sing God's praise and to unite their prayers and exhortations for the social good. But whenever they form a quorum, and call form the business of the churches, they are a Popish calf, or a muley, or a hornless stag, or something akin to the old grand Beast, with seven heads and ten horns." Again, "Every Christian community must settle its own troubles." See Christian Baptist, page 231. Again, speaking of the church he says—"That every such society, with its bishops and deacons, is the highest tribunal on earth to which an individual Christian can appeal; that whosoever will not hear it, has no other tribunal to which he can look for redress. To suppose that two churches have more power than one, that one hundred have more power than one, or that the bishops of one hundred churches, with any other delegates sent from the churches, have more power than one church, is to place the power or authority in men, and not in the one king or head. For if numbers create greater power, it is the power of men—it is human authority, and not the authority of God."—Christian Baptist, page 26-27.

Once more, Brother Campbell, in speaking of the New Testament, says—"It teaches us that the association, called the church of Jesus Christ, is, in propria forma, the only institution of God left on earth, to illuminate and reform the world."

If this be true, then all our modern young evangelists will have to come down from their lofty pretensions to the rank of archbishops, under the title of evangelists, to the humble devout servants of the church. If they desire to be evangelists, let them be called to that work by the church, and then let them give themselves "wholly to it." Then they will be saved all this trouble of home hunting, position seeking, and all the envy and jealousy growing out of them. Then we shall not have some of our most prominent and able evangelists at the head of free-schools, academies, colleges, and universities. We shall then know the difference between Sunday sermonizing and evangelizing. We shall then see that evangelists will have work enough to do to "preach the word," and not the old musty dogmas of Calvin and Coleridge concerning the depravity of man and the "inner light." Then shall we get rid of our Sunday dogmatizings to a handfull of disciples by metaphysicians, calling themselves evangelists. Then will the bishops feel that it is their duty to feed the flock over which the Holy Spirit has constituted them overseers; and they will not look to young, inexperienced evangelists, to see that they "were provided for, and sustained in the discharge of their duties." Then will the church rise in the might and majesty of her Divine Head and Lord. Then will she look to her bishops for food, under her Great Head, and not to those Sunday dogmatizing evangelists. God left one grand missionary society on earth—a grand quorum of evangelists—one grand association—a general assembly—THE CHURCH of the first-born, whose names are enrolled in the heavens. This society, this quorum, this association, is the congregation or church of Jesus Christ, the King of kings, and Lord of lords.

These thoughts and reflections may probably induce our more able scribes and more experienced thinkers and speakers, to investigate this subject more fully for our whole brotherhood.

CHRIST'S CHURCH IDENTIFIED.—No. I.

"Upon this rock will I build my church" (Matt. xvi 19.)

ARE not all churches Christ's? Even the charity of those who style their churches "evangelical sects," will not admit that all churches are Christ's. A number of sects have agreed to call their own churches Christ's, and to stigmatize all others as heretical. It becomes us, therefore, to look very closely into this subject.

We are taught by Jesus that he would build but one church. This he denominates "MY CHURCH." The work, then, that lies immediately before us, is to ascertain, if possible, what sort of a church he did build; for when this shall be done, Christ's church will be identified; and it will follow with the conclusiveness of demonstration, that all churches not built after this model, are heretical;—in other words, are mere sects, and not the churches of Christ.

If we would obtain a clear and satisfactory view of the church which Christ built, we must, in imagination, pass up the stream of time, eighteen centuries, and visit Jerusalem on that eventful Pentecost which first occurred after the coronation of the King of Saints. There we must listen with an unbiassed mind to the preaching of Peter. We must be attentive to every testimony, command, promise, threatening. We must remember that he speaks as "the spirit gives him utterance,"—and that, consequently, he is infallible, and makes no mistakes. We must also listen to the anxious inquiry of the convicted multitudes:—"Men and brethren what shall we do?" And to Peter's answer: "Repent and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of your sins," &c. Then we must attend to the putting up of the materials—the living stones—into the building—"As many as gladly received the word were baptized; and the same day there were added about three thousand souls." Then to the order of the house. "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers." Behold the model church! See this beautiful spiritual temple, as it rises under the heaven-directed hands of the master builders, the apostles of Jesus! Is there any portion of this symmetrical and perfect workmanship unworthy of our imitation? Can we make an improvement on that which is the production of one "in whom dwelt all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge?" As well might the glow-worm attempt to illumine the Sun! As well might man reach forth his puny hand, to direct, in their predestined courses, the unnumbered orbs of heaven!

The reader will perceive, by an attentive reading of the second chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, that Christ built his church, by the Spirit, through his apostles; and that he propounded terms of admission into his church, as well as the things to be done by the members, after admission. In order, therefore, to have our work fairly before us, it will be necessary that we render some attention to each of these particulars.

The terms of admission.—The apostles preached under a divine commission. Their preaching must neither transcend, nor fall short of this commission. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned." Hence, on the day of Pentecost, in perfect accordance with this commission, the gospel was preached that Jesus had died as a sin-offering—had been buried—was Lord and Messiah, to give faith to the hearers, and a multitude of them believed, and were pierced to the heart. Next, after they had enquired what they should do, repentance and baptism were enjoined—the preaching tallying precisely with the commission: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Even the phrase, "in the name of Jesus Christ," is pregnant with meaning. It means by the authority of Jesus—authority delegated in the commission. For Jesus had said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," which means shall be pardoned—shall receive remission of sins. Hence, the meaning of Peter's language is, by the authority —the command of Jesus—I command you to be baptized, for pardon or remission. The terms of the remission of sins, and of admission into Christ's church having been complied with, the gospel was magnified, sinners were saved, and the King Immortal honored. Thus we identify Christ's church, in the first place, by pointing out the terms of admission into it. Reader, do you know of any church that receives members on these principles? That church, other things being equal, is Christ's church!

But what should these converts do after admission into the church? "They continued steadfastly in the Apostle's teaching." Jesus had commanded the apostles to teach the converts all things that he had commanded them. Hence, they became regular attendants on the ministry of the apostles. They believe and obey from the heart. These, the apostles' fellowship—they constitute an apostle's fellowship, communion, or community. To this community was given the Lord's table, and it has never been given to any other community. This community, or communion, is Christ's church; he has never had any other church. On the members of this divine organization the apostles invoked the benediction of heaven. Reader! do you know of any church that has no system of church doctrine but the apostles' doctrine, and whose order is to continue in this doctrine? That church, other things being equal, is Christ's church.

Suppose that Peter, the apostle, were to arrive in this country, what church would he join? Is it not the most probable thing in the world, that, if he could find a church, the terms of admission into which should be precisely the same as those upon which, in obedience to his own preaching, members were admitted on the day of Pentecost, and which was governed by the same law, he would join that church? But, suppose he would not? Several difficulties would follow! Were he to join any of the "evangelical sects," he would put himself under human ecclesiastical law; and uninspired men would become rulers over an inspired apostle! Just think of it!—Peter a Methodist, or a Baptist, or a Presbyterian! For I presume that he could not be a member with all at once and the same time—and subject to the Discipline, or the Philadelphia, or the Westminster! O, for shame! But this is not the only difficulty. Suppose this apostle to have joined a sect, and that he is not known to be Peter, the apostle. A great revival meeting, with all the modern mourner's bench machinery, approaches. Peter is asked to preach—and he preaches precisely the same doctrine that he did on the day of Pentecost. Sinners are pierced to the heart, and cry, "What shall I do?" Peter tells them, as at Pentecost, "Repent and be baptized for remission." What a panic would it create! What frowns! What going down of heads! What groans! What a murmur of discordant voices in the yard, after dismissal! "Peter, you must account for this heretical preaching. This is Campbellism all the world over." "Well," says Peter, "I know that I said repent and be baptized for remission, but I mean repent and be baptized NOT for remission!" Would not this be delightful! Whatever may be the reader's view, it is certain that Peter would be turned out of the church, unless he made some sort of acknowledgment for preaching as the Spirit gave him utterance. And if we may be permitted to use a little boldness and point, we would declare, plainly, that we know of no church in the world, in which Peter the apostle would be an acceptable preacher, but that vulgarly nicknamed, by our very gentlemanly opponents, Campbellite!

INNOCENCE

INNOCENCE — sweetest of words! How much of joy, peace and Heaven is associated with that word! Without it, humanity were never blessed, angels were not happy, and the harmonies of the heavens were broken into jarring discord. It is pleasant to think that there is so much of innocence in objects around and above us. Not only is it characteristic of the tender lamb, the plaintive dove, and the infant that smiles upon its mother's bosom, but of all inferior animated nature—beast, bird, insect, fish, all are innocent. The earth and all that compose its scenery—rugged mountains, flowing rivers, rippling streams and waving forests, are innocent. “Restless ocean groans under no weight of guilt, and the breezes of heaven are free from moral taint. The thousands of orbs in the star-lit vault above us are innocent as they are beautiful. The Sun, the king of day, the centre of a mighty system, dispenses its rays of light and life to the numerous worlds around it, in innocency. “The pale-faced moon, with milder rays,” smiles onward, and ever as conscious of purity. Beyond natural vision, there are an “innumerable company of angels and the spirits of the just,” all spotless in innocence.

All are innocent that are obedient. Nature violates no law, and all nature is sinless. Worlds and systems, to the utmost extent of Jehovah's vast empire, move and subsist in harmony with the will of an Almighty Lawgiver.

When the contemplative mind takes a view of creation, studies the order and harmony of the spheres—when it reflects that heaven abounds in innocency, that earth is innocent, that inanimate creation, and all inferior animate creation, are innocent—and then reflects that man, thinking, feeling man, the last and crowning work of the lower sphere—made but a little lower than the angels, so capable of deep enjoyment—that he alone is divested of innocency—that he alone knows the pangs of guilt, and the extreme bitterness of moral defilement—that he alone refuses to move in harmony with the Divine will—the mind, thus reflecting, is humbled to the dust, and let me ask, May not man be pure? Is there nothing to remove guilt from his conscience—nothing to make the spirit glow and smile under the approval of his God? Thank heaven!

Poured from Immanuel's veins,
And sinners, plunged beneath that flood,
Lose all their guilty stains.”

Jesus, the Lamb of God, has been manifested to take away sins, and to restore guilty man to pristine innocence. While there was no power in the offender to restore himself—no atonement that the creature could make

—“He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows. — He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed.” There is virtue in his sin-atonement blood to reconcile, purify, and happy an intelligent but sin-ruined race. His coming is heralded by “Peace on earth, and good-will toward men.”

He comes! and amid the barren wastes of lost humanity, he “makes the wilderness and the solitary place to be glad, and the desert to rejoice and blossom as the rose.” He comes! and the sceptre of mercy is extended wherever sin has reigned and ruined. To the weeping, obedient penitent, he pronounces forgiven, and the thralldom of sin is broken.

“Forgiveness! ‘tis a joyful sound
To malefactors doomed to die!
Publish the bliss the world around;
You seraphs shout it from the sky.”

O! the sweets of pardoning mercy!
the bliss of an hour under the approving smiles of a Holy Redeemer!

There are hours when the disquieted spirit, burdened with thoughts of errors committed, of duty neglected, of mind alienated, and of ingratitude to the best Friend, turns to those innocent days, ere the ways of sin were learned, and reflects, how good it were, once more, to be sinless as a child! But now childhood's purity returns, and more than childhood's bliss; for in the knowledge of sins forgiven, there is an ecstasy of joy beyond human expression. Fountains of pleasure, refined by the touch of heaven, spring up in the inmost soul. Love, fervent love, a plant of heavenly origin, now can flourish in the soil of purity. The soul is in sweet harmony with its Creator, and with all that subsist and move in harmony with the Divine will. Earth, sea, and sky, present new beauties and scenes of delight. “For ye shall go out with joy and be led forth with peace; the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands.” Thus sang the bard of Israel, in reference to the blessings of Messiah's reign.

But, ah! to live harmless and pure; to live above the ways of this sinful world ; to live all absorbed in love's best enjoyments—who is sufficient for these things ! My soul, how stands the account before high Heaven ? Look back upon the meanderings of a past pilgrimage. How often has zeal grown languid—how often has there been a lack of child-like submission and holy devotion—how often have the love of the world, the cares of life, murmuring, discontent, vain thoughts and conversation crushed out the life within, and borne away the purest enjoyments ! Fall prostrate and confess—Father, I have sinned ; forgive thou my wanderings, my coldness, my ingratitude ! Give me freely of thy love—enlarge my best desires, and impart wisdom and strength to maintain a pure integrity before thee ! Help me to be holy, for thou art holy !

THE UNSPEAKABLE GIFT.

THE doctrines of the incarnation and atonement, so infinitely dear to the church, are not mere bodiless abstractions of the schools. They are the nutriment of the closet, and the sanctuary, and the death-bed. It is in them that a God of awful and ineffable purity becomes accessible to a race revolted and corrupt. It is in the gift of his Son that God commended his love to the world—and heaven itself, on the bestowment of a Redeemer, left in its own infinite and exhaustless exchequer no richer boon. He is the "unspeakable gift," as Paul entitles it. And the argument, that above all others cheers the desponding heart, is, that God, having freely given Christ, the greatest and richest benefit, shall he not with him "freely give us all things ?" In him, the embodied and incarnate Deity has humanized itself, and made itself, so to speak, tangible and intelligible, and approvable to humanity. We have, in the high-priest, one who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities.

And in this Christ, this divine embodiment of infinite love within a mortal tabernacle, the philosophy of the skies makes its direct and palpable appeal to the dulllest and feeblest intellect. The child and the savage may not have the grasp of mind and patience of attention to follow out any long chain of argumentation ; but bring the story of Calvary before them, and every dormant power of the soul is aroused. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he first loved us." And stooping thus low, and coming thus near, why should he be refused the heart he claims, only that he may flood it with peace—"the peace of God that passeth all understanding ?" And if we scorn and repel such tenderness and benignity, pluck we not down on our own heads all the storms of a just and implacable vengeance. "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema Maranatha."

MUSINGS ON LORD'S DAY MORNING.

WRITTEN IN THE BERTH OF A STEAMER, MARCH 28, 1858, BY A. CAMPBELL.

SERENE the morn, and bright the sky,
I walked the deck alone,
The morning star with silvery rays
In all its splendour shone.

Some golden streaks of brightest hue,
Were trembling on the sky :
The forest leaves with drops of dew
Gave hope that Spring was nigh.

It was, indeed, the Lord's day morn,
And soon my thoughts were turned,
To those bright scenes of hope and joy
With which our hearts have burned.

How soon shall all the toils of earth
Give place to heavenly rest ;
And those who live for God and Christ
Shall be for ever blest !

Hold on thy way, my Sister Wife,
In faith, and hope, and love ;
And when our toils of earth are past,
We'll meet in heaven above.

Be this our aim, our happy choice,
Till all our toils are o'er,
Then we shall meet among the blest,
And part again no more.

DR. TRENCH ON THE REVISION OF THE 'AUTHORISED VERSION' OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

DR. TRENCH, in his work on this subject just published, says — "However we may be disposed to let the question alone, it will not let us alone. It has been too effectually stirred ever again to go to sleep, and the difficulties, be they few or many, will have one day to be encountered. The time will come when the inconveniences of remaining where we are will be so manifestly greater than the inconveniences of action, that this last will become inevitable" (page 137.)

As to the manner in which the revision should be undertaken, he says — "Let come together, and if possible not of self-will, but with some authorization, royal or ecclesiastical, or both, such a body of scholars and divines, as would deserve and would obtain the confidence of the whole church." By "the whole church" he seems to mean the whole Church of England. He continues — "Fortunately no points at issue among ourselves threaten to come into discussion or debate; so that the unhappy divisions of our time would not here add any additional embarrassment to a matter embarrassed enough already." This is surely too sanguine an expectation, in the present divided state of the Church of England.

But what share in the work would he allot to Dissenters? "Nay," he adds, "of such immense importance would it be to carry with us, in whatever might be done, the whole Christian people of England, that it would be desirable to invite all scholars, all who represent any important portion of the Biblical scholarship in the land, to assist with their suggestions here, even though they might not belong to the church. Of course they would be asked as scholars, not as Dissenters." But is leave to make suggestions, without a single voice in the council of revisers, to be all that Dr. Trench proposes to grant them? Are Dissenters to admit, that a body which Dr. Trench calls "the church" — as if no other body of Christians had a right to be called a church at all — are they to admit that the church has exclusive authority to revise the English Scriptures, and be content with making to it suggestions merely? Dr. Trench says, that "it would be so hopeless, indeed so unreasonable, to expect that they should accept our revision, having themselves had no voice in it, that we ought not to stand on any punctilios here, but should be prepared rather to sacrifice every non-essential for the averting of such a catastrophe — that is, such a one as that Dissenters should make a revision of their own, distinctly from the Church of England."

But what might Dissenters do without injury to what Dr. Trench thinks essential to the proper execution of the work? From the remarks which follow, he seems to imply that all points affecting church order and discipline must and would be taken out of the province of scholars. The bishops of the Church of England would no doubt expect to decide on all these, without permitting even discussion. This is perhaps the meaning of Dr. Trench when he says, "There are no matters of doctrine or even of discipline likely to come into debate, which should render it impossible for such Dissenters as accept our doctrinal articles, to take a share in this work,—as regarded, not from its ecclesiastical, but its scholarly point of view." What is this but an intimation, that nothing would be left to mere scholars, even though members of the Church of England, which would affect ecclesiastical questions? This impression is confirmed by what follows:—"All points likely to come under discussion would be points of pure scholarship, or would only involve that universal Christianity common to them (Dissenters) and us; or, if more than this, they would be points about which there is equally a difference of opinion within the church, as in the bodies without it — for instance, as between Arminian and Calvinist, which difference would not be avoided by their absence" (page 138.)

Is it likely that Dissenters at large will be content to receive a revised version, in making which their only share has been the offering of "suggestions" for approval or rejection by scholars and bishops of the Church of England?

To the Baptists Dr. Trench would not even concede the privilege of ma-wonder at this. There are many collegiate students, who are familiar with splendid passages from heathen writings—as the Iliad—they are at home in that—but here is the Book of God—and the language and scope of one of its writings is, by the confession of such ignorance, wrapt up in seemingly impenetrable darkness. Now, the Book of Nahum is a wondrous production; and yet it is not alone among the library of books, so perfectly uniting the divinity of their authorship with the perfection of their style. And it thus perfect, because found so associated, what good reason can be given why they should not constitute the literary and intellectual food of families? A professor in one of our universities, told me that he found himself unable to read a chapter of the minor prophets with advantage, because to him the connection of thought, from point to point, seemed so obscure, accustomed as he was to interpret the heathen authors to his classes. He confessed his satisfaction that the Bible Union had taken this work in hand—the removal of obscurities from the sacred books.

I think I have observed a growing neglect of the Book of God for many years past. Forty years ago the young were differently educated. There is so much to be read now, in order to keep up with the existing pace of knowledge, that people have not time to read voluminous commentaries. Much of these is taken up in telling what the translation ought to be. Then, as has been well said, why not make the translation what it ought to be, and so end the matter? Why not throw away the commentary? There would be good sense in that. True, there would remain opportunity for the explanation of geographical and other similar allusions, references to antiquities, and habits that no longer exist. That kind of reference may be always needed. But the book, its connection, its process of thought, ought to be made just as intelligible to the mass of mankind, as it is to scholars who read it in the Hebrew and Greek.

Allusions have been made to our means of revision. All this is very encouraging. Certainly, there is learning enough accumulated in the books which are at our command, if it alone were the only element to be employed. The stores of learning are indeed ample. But there is much false learning, and that is worse than none. There is much superficial learning, that is not much better. Look at the accumulation answering to this varied description during the past eighteen hundred years. It is treasured up—we may use it. But it requires no small labor to select, to analyse, to combine these treasures for use in our revision. While from their amount they give increased certainty to results, they greatly increase our labor. At no time was the work of revision more laborious than now, because the means are so abundant. If well employed, another revision ought to be needed during the next century.

Looking over the history of Bible Revision in connection with the history of the English race, it has been obvious that there was never a period so marked with vitality in the history of the church, as that which may be denominated the age of translators, marked by the efforts of TYNDALE, COVERDALE, CRANMER, TAVERNER, the authors of the Genevan and Bishops' versions, and culminating with the authorized version of King James. During that period arose the puritan element—it arose from love to the Word of God—from a feeling which led men to prize his Word above and beyond all that was of human invention and authority, and it led to those frequent revisions which left it as we have it. In one century, six revisions were effected, besides three that might be called minor revisions; and this century was the era of the development of a greater amount of spiritual power than either previously or since the church has ever witnessed. Now, if our object be to revive the interest in the Divine Word, how can we effect this object better than by imitating the history of the past, and making that word more distinct and intelligible?

There are some, I know, who are horror-stricken at the idea of a new Bible. My answer is: "Friend, we aim at the presentation of no new Bible, but merely to make the Word of God—the sacred originals—clear and intelligible to all." And what objection can there be to this? Surely, none that will bear examination.

As to the progress of the work, I share the impatience of my brethren.

But let it be understood, that in an undertaking of this nature, the preliminary work is always the most difficult and protracted. When this is satisfactorily adjusted, the work proceeds more rapidly. But if the model be imperfect, a faulty plan affects the whole work. I know well the nature of the difficulties that beset the most intelligent and faithful translator—the task of expressing the mind of the Spirit in suitable English—of giving proper, just, and pertinent expression to the thoughts of the Divine mind. Often have I paused over the precious gems of the original—over their divine simplicity and energy—the grace and charm of thought and expression—and have thought, “Is it possible to match this perfection of beauty in any other language?” I have laboured to present the idea bright and beautiful to others, as it appeared to my own conception. Yes, while brethren who I know are praying that our work may be prospered by the good Spirit of our God, while they are enjoying repose on their beds, often am I toiling at my midnight work, in labours exhausting to health and spirits, seeking to catch the full import of the divine utterances, and give them adequate expression in our own loved tongue.

This is not the work of lexicons and grammars, though these have their place and use. It must be the contact of the word with the mind through the influences of the Holy Spirit. Without this, nothing will be accomplished.

I have one constant encouragement. The task you have assigned to me and my colleagues is to give to men God's Word as he has given it. If you required me to be dishonest to God's truth, then I should have no heart or courage for this work. But in following out the rules given me, I can lie down at night with the consciousness, that I have not knowingly suppressed or obscured one divine thought, during the labours of the day. And should I live to see the completion of this work, I can then joyfully close my earthly account, and say, “I have not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God.” And faithfully following the rules, each of your revisers can say to the Judge of all, “I have given Thy truth to others, as Thou in Thy Word hast given it to me.”

Brethren, pray for us—for all those to whom you have entrusted this work—that God would give them fidelity to His truth, firmness, unflinching courage, untiring diligence, and above all, light from above.

MARTYRDOM OF THE MISSIONARY, FREDERICK CROWE.

WE have been favored with a copy of the address delivered by the pastor of the First Baptist Church, New York, (A. K. NORR) on the 8th of November last, on the occasion of the funeral of the above indefatigable missionary, who who fell a victim to the persecutions of the Roman Catholic priests of Central Spanish America, whilst engaged in the distribution of the recently-published Spanish version of the New Testament, recently issued by the American Bible Union. The coffin bore on its plate this inscription—“Frederick Crowe, a martyr missionary, banished from Central Spanish America, for circulating the Holy Scriptures. Died in New York, November 7, aged 39 years 8 months.” The address of Pastor Nott conveys, in a condensed form, a sketch of the deeply-interesting career of this devoted servant of Jesus Christ.

MY FRIENDS:—You have gathered here for the burial of a martyr. I thought that the martyrs were dead and buried before my day. I did not suppose that I should ever be called upon, and that standing upon the soil of my own free country, to make an address over the body of a martyr, one who just as really laid down his life for the truth, as did any of the heroes of the early church. This feeling oppresses me, and absorbs almost every emotion. I hardly have patience to dwell upon the fine qualities, the intelligence, the Christian virtues of the man, to recount the work in which he was engaged, to remark upon the loss which the church has sustained, or even to speak words of consolation to the few kindred who are here to mourn him, because every other consideration is swallowed up in the one thought—that I look upon a martyr. But, since it is demanded of me, I must turn away from such considerations, and as you are strangers, tell you who and what he was, who now lies in death before you, and what brought him here.

The Rev. Frederick CROWE was the son of a British subject, and was born in Belgium, in 1818. His father afterward removed to Bordeaux in France. We first hear of the son as a youth of seventeen, when he embarked in England as an emigrant to Spanish America. But by the remarkable providence of God the ship was turned from her destination, and he was landed at Belize, a city of Honduras, the only place within thousands of miles where there was a Christian teacher. Here this youth, Christless as yet, met Mr. HENDERSON, the Baptist missionary, and was converted to God. For four years he gave himself to labour in the gospel in that city, in connection with school-teaching. Then he repaired to Vera Paz, to the colony to which he had originally embarked. He came to them as a Christian and a teacher. Here he acquired the Spanish tongue, and so long as the colony endured was safe in distributing the Word of God. When, three years later, the colony failed, abandoned to the ignorant fanaticism of the native priesthood, he maintained his post amidst a storm of persecution. Proceeding to Salama, the chief town of Vera Paz, at the public fair, he sold or gave away the Scriptures to the crowds who eagerly pressed upon him from the villages and from the mountains. Of these adventures, he gave a graphic account in a speech before the American Bible Union at the Anniversary of 1853. Amid denunciation from every pulpit, and privations of every sort, he bravely pursued his work, to the peril of his life. Once he was rescued from death only by the breaking out of a revolution. In 1846 forced from the country to Belize, there imprisoned, he returned to Europe, both to obtain protection, and to secure, if possible, a truer Spanish version of the Scriptures. The only one then in circulation was a translation of the Vulgate, and of course was greatly imperfect.

His mission was crowned with the highest success. The Rev. W. Norton, Senor Don Jose Calderon, (a Spanish professor of high repute) and another Spanish scholar, a member of the Royal Academy, gave themselves ardently to the task, and achieved a work which has won the unqualified admiration of the elite of Castilian scholars. Mr. Crowe visited this country, where he was warmly received. The Rev. Dr. Storrs, A. S. Barnes, Esq. and others, became especially interested in his endeavors. The "Nuevo Pacto" was issued by the American Bible Union. Laden with this rich treasure, and supplied with funds from their treasury to defray his expenses, he returned to Spanish America in 1853, and engaged with new ardor in distributing the pure Word of God. To that work he gave his property, his health, and his life.

We hasten to the closing scenes. In May last he went to San Miguel, and in attempting to procure a booth or place for the sale of his Scriptures, he encountered a great deal of opposition from the curate of the Roman Catholic church. However, he found a suitable locality, and under the protection of the law stood up to distribute the Word of God. He raised no tumult, but simply distributed the Word of God to those citizens who, of their own voluntary will, would purchase or accept a copy.

At the instigation of the priests a furious mob was raised against him. Dragged before the local magistrates, he appealed to the Gobernador at San Salvador. On his journey thither, he stopped, exhausted by hardships, at the house of a friend, and utterly unable to proceed, fell upon a sick bed. From this he was dragged by officers under warrant of the Governor, despite the intercessions of his friend, and assured beforehand that an appeal to the British Consul would be scorned. Nevertheless, for the honor of his country, he made an appeal for protection, as a British subject. The Consul, Henry Grant Foote, Pontius Pilate, denied it, repudiated his claim to British citizenship, notwithstanding he had himself previously acknowledged it by an official act. More than this, he mocked at it, and himself denounced the persecuted missionary for the alleged crime of distributing a Protestant Bible in a Catholic country. This correspondence brings back to me the heroic Paul. Mr. Crowe, in a spirited reply, reminded the recreant Consul of his duty. For the authority of his own course, he refers him to the Saviour's last commission, he bids him recal the history of England when Tyndale did for her what he now tried to do for Spanish America, and concludes by a solemn appeal to his Queen, and lastly to his God, before whom both will shortly give account for their respective acts. To that bar the one has already gone. There the other will meet him one day face to face. We can well afford, therefore, to dismiss him from ourselves.

The last scene in this painful tragedy is brief. The sufferer was taken by force to Acajutla, a seaport, whose name will henceforth be consecrated in the history of martyrdom. He is cast into a sickly dungeon, his young Spanish wife a sharer of his wretchedness. There they are abandoned to die. From the horrors of starvation they are saved only by the secret interference of a kind Frenchman. After a week of confinement, he is forced on board ship. A dreary voyage lands the helpless exiles at Panama. In the Providence of God, yet merciful, some boxes of Testaments detained at Panama on their way to him from this city, served to identify him to Christian people, who procured him a passage to New York. The exile sought a refuge here. He found it—in a grave.

Mr. Nott then described the arrival of Mr. Crowe in New York, and the closing scenes of his life; and then, by the aid of an interpreter, addressed a few words of consolation to the young widow. The members of the American Bible Union were next addressed in a few stirring words of encouragement and hope, that in this instance the blood of the martyr should prove the seed of the church.

And now we bid thee farewell! Thy spirit is in glory! Thy dust we return to dust until the resurrection! Rest thee! Rest with our beloved Judson—with Tyndale and Wycliffe, thy countrymen—with Peter and Paul. Thou martyr missionary, farewell! Many tears drop into thy grave. Farewell!

CORRESPONDENCE.

HAS THE HOLY SPIRIT CEASED WORKING?

IN an article in the November number of the Harbinger, entitled "The Holy Spirit and its Power," I am given to believe that the working of the Spirit, as an agent in man's salvation, was fully complimented in the fact, that the Apostles were baptized with the Spirit; that all the truth necessary to be known, has been communicated and authenticated in their writings; and at another part of said article, as if in seeming contradiction, the writer says, "God's Spirit we deny not, we confide in it, we rejoice in it, we desire to bring forth much fruit by it, and we pray to be filled with it." Now while I allow that the Bible contains the whole truth of God, yet in the writings of the New Testament, I am nowhere given to understand, that the baptism, or gift of the Holy Spirit, was specially confined to the first age of Christianity. John the Baptist gave the Jews to expect, that He who came after him, who was mightier and greater than himself—"He, that is Christ, would baptize them, not with water only, but with the Holy Spirit;" and the promise quoted from the Prophet Joel, and applied by Peter on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii. 39) was given not to them only, but to their children, and to as many as the Lord our God shall call, including us Gentiles.

Now I am persuaded that we should guard ourselves against extremes, in the opposition we give to the popular views on this subject, more especially in reference to the times of revival which have overtaken professed Christians in other churches, which originated in America, to which the writer makes reference in the article referred to. My reasons for thinking so, I shall state as shortly as possible.

1. By apostolic teaching we are given to understand, that the Spirit of God in the church was the source and mainspring of everything that concerned the Christian life, and that the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal—this dispensation under which we are living being emphatically denominated by way of preeminence, "The Dispensation of the Spirit" (1 Cor. xii. 7, 2 Cor. iii. 8-9.)

2. That the Holy Spirit, as a means of spiritual life, holds the same position as that which the spirit of a man sustains to his body, as the vital and energizing principle; and in reference to the collective and schism. Its principles of personal responsibility, liberty (not perfect)—its approaches to equality—its frequent assertion of the right of free inquiry, which, however, it sometimes strangles by its human creeds—are of God, and by enlargement will save it from itself.

In its constitution and modes of warfare the apostolic church differed both from the Papacy and Protestantism. Let the latter return to the divine faith and order, and the destruction of the former will be hastened.

CHURCH INEFFICIENCY.

SOME of our readers are aware, that in July last a circular was issued in Birmingham calling a public conference, for the purpose of enquiring as to the cause or causes of the inefficiency of churches to convert the world, and with a view to a subsequent statement of remedial measures. For over three months was every Monday evening devoted to the enquiry, a considerable number attended, there was much freedom of speech, and persons of various denominations and of no denomination were heard at length, and even disbelievers in the Bible found two or three representatives. Six meetings were devoted to the stating of opinions, in which each speaker gave his own views without attempting to discuss those previously presented. The next step was to form the leading items, thus brought out, into propositions, in order to a full discussion thereof—this done, nine other public meetings were held, and the resolutions given under were adopted, with only two or three hands held up against some of them, and were handed over for the purpose of being brought more fully, by means of the press and public meetings, under the notice of the churches in Birmingham :—

Resolved—

I. Christianity, as instituted by Christ and His Apostles, is of Divine origin, supported by ample evidence, and worthy of all acceptance.

II. That preachers and churches do not sufficiently present the evidences of Christianity to the people.

III. That now, as in the days of the Apostles, many hold back from church-membership on account of the purity of the Doctrine of Christ.

IV. That the evident worldliness of churches, consequent upon neglect of New Testament discipline, tends to keep from membership many who otherwise would become worthy members.

V. That churches by their homage to wealth repel many, and also by their appeals to non-members for money, and that such churches must abolish such appeals, seat rents, &c. before they can considerably enlarge their influence for good, or place themselves in harmony with the apostolic teachings and example.

VI. That the comparative inefficiency of churches to convert sinners is, to a considerable extent, caused by those departures from apostolic practice by which priestly orders are instituted, and the teaching and preaching of a church committed to one man, instead of recognizing the right and duty of every competent brother to take part in the same.

VII. That the visible union of believers, and the consequent abolition of denominationalism, is essential to the conversion of the world, and that a complete return to the order of things left by the Apostles would be fully sufficient, and is absolutely necessary to such union.

The first of these propositions was admitted in consequence of the plea, that the people are not converted because the gospel is deficient in evidence, and from a willingness to have every point fairly tested. The discussion fully established the proposition, and small indeed were the number who ventured to hold up their hands against it. There was, however, a pretty general feeling that preachers are remiss in presenting the ample evidence they have at command, and hence the second proposition, which was unanimously adopted. Those which follow, from III. to VII. inclusive, are of the utmost importance to every Christian and to every church. To us, however, they contain no revelation—we knew that any meeting fairly representing the public would affirm in substance these propositions—we are assured that could the whole of Birmingham be called together, a considerable majority would adopt them without any material alteration.

Why, then, is the needed reformation resisted or neglected?

In some places the worldly interest of the minister is against it—changes would drive off some of the well-to-do and put in jeopardy the income. In others the worldly interest of the church is against it. And in others the sect demands honor to its creed and human polity. The needed reform would annihilate the sect, and as self is honored and served in preference to the Lord, evils remain and sinners perish. And may it not be feared that many churches, and ministers too, will find the settling day such as they greatly desire it should not be?

It is not our present purpose to comment further upon the resolutions. This, however, we hope to do during the year upon which we have now entered.

THE LORD'S SUPPER AND THE LORD'S DAY: ONE AS OFTEN AS THE OTHER.

A SERMON by S. J. CHEW, under the above title, price 2d. published by Showell, Temple-street, Birmingham, is now before us. From the dedication the reader may learn that it was delivered in Bond-street chapel, and published by request of the church of which Mr. Chew is pastor. The author deals in plain speaking, unanswerable logic, multitudinous authorities, and last and best, abundant Scripture proof. After the text (Acts xx. 7) and introductory remarks, it is urged that "the weekly observance of the Lord's Supper is possible"—that it is "desirable"—that it is "BINDING"—and under the last head it is shewn—

1. That such was the order of the churches whose records are given in the New Testament.

2. That this order must have been appointed by inspired apostles.

3. That apostolic order and example in church ordinances bind the church so long as the church exists.

Under the first of these heads are examined Acts ii. 42, Acts xx. 7, 1 Cor. xvi. 2, 1 Cor. xi. 20; and in support of its affirmation are called up Pliny, Tertullian, Justin Martyr, Neander, Barnes, Matthew Henry, Andrew Fuller, Scott,

"1 Cor. xvi. 1-2. 'Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches in Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come.' It is quite clear from all history, that the making of a collection for the poor, and for the customary expenditure of the church, attended from the first, this service of the Lord's supper. And it can scarcely be doubted that the reference is to such collection in these verses. We observe then, Paul expressly states that he had 'given order' to other churches; and he proceeds to do so to the church at Corinth. Passing strange would it be for him to assume authority on this point, and to leave the celebration of the supper itself without his order. We note down this, too, that some who object to the obligation of the weekly communion, supposing that there is no command enjoining it, cannot consistently object to a weekly giving, for here is the command at any rate for that.

"Acts xv. 1. 'And certain men which came down from Judea taught the brethren, and said, except ye be circumcised, after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved.' Here was the origin of a serious turmoil in the church at Antioch. If at your leisure you read through the chapter, you will see that the apostles were the arbitrators, and that their decision was binding. From them, with the sanction of the whole church at Jerusalem, the law proceeds; and mark well in their letter these words, 'for it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things' (ver. 28.) What unwarrantable presumption, were they not authorized and inspired to ordain the arrangements in the churches! Can it be imagined that this practice of communion on every Lord's day, could be started without their warrant? Also of these subverters at Antioch they say, 'to whom we gave no such commandment' (ver. 24.) And what if they did not, if they had no more than an ordinary power?

we admit. But Cannon Street is not such a church—it stands as the parent Baptist church in Birmingham, reports some six hundred members, and the meeting here mentioned was addressed by at least seven deacons. One speaks of himself as having been in office 25 years—another speaker talks of many years ago and their former pastors—another had been with them during three pastorates—another deacon felt he was becoming an old man, and Deacon Wade “was the oldest Sabbath school teacher in Birmingham.” Now, among these men and other senior members of Cannon Street, can be found persons such as Paul commanded Timothy to ordain. Such men as Paul sent for from Ephesus to Miletus, and to whom he said—“Take heed unto yourselves and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers,” i. e. bishops and pastors. To some extent on this point we have also the testimony of Mr. Lord himself, who is reported to have said that—“If he might take as a specimen the men whom he had heard that night, he felt that he was in the midst of orators. He should begin to quail, he feared, when in the pulpit, to see so many eloquent brethren. It did make him feel strangely when he saw so many brethren with hoary locks, (who were, as it were, in theology quite divines) looking up to him to be instructed in the things of God. It did make young men, like himself, feel their own weakness, and if he (the speaker) were not supplied by other resources than his own, he would not be able to go on.”

Not to construe Mr. Lord's language too literally, but taking the admission at its lowest point, there are in that church many brethren with the full experience of age and long-standing in the family of God, apt to express what they know, and well conversant with the truth of God. Well might Mr. Lord “feel strangely,” for unless he is entirely ignorant of the order of the Lord's house (and this we cannot suppose) he must know that the relative position of himself and those brethren is as perfect a caricature upon Christian order as any served up by pope or cardinal. When the Apostle addressed his letter to the church at Philippi, he could say, “To all the saints which are in Philippi, with THE bishops and deacons.” Can the church in Cannon Street be thus addressed? Certainly not!—we must write with its bishop and deacons. And why so—because it has declined to follow the divine order. Mr. Lord exhorts the church to progress—at this meeting talks of knocking out walls and enlarging the chapel, building new rooms and fine organ loft. One thing we wish, that thousands may be there converted, that all obtainable room may be required; but notwithstanding, we must say to the pastor of Cannon Street, set the house in order first—you have publicly pledged yourself to preach the whole truth, and therefore, we pray you ascertain who of the elder men have the qualifications for oversight, and show your brethren that those men, every one of them, are the God given pastors of the church, and take your own proper position as a preacher of the Gospel, their preacher or evangelist, in the sense of being supported by them, if not in a position to sustain yourself, but not a preacher to them, but to the unconverted to whom alone preaching should be directed.

In saying, “Not a preacher to them,” we do not imply that an evangelist should not take part with the qualified members of the church in exhortation and teaching, but, that preaching is for the world, teaching for the church. Such churches as that in Cannon Street should support one or more of its members to preach the Gospel in the chapel and out of it, wherever sinners can be congregated. These preaching brethren might plant churches around, in which case they would watch over them until duly set in order, until out of their own members elders could be ordained. Gladly would we welcome Mr. Lord to Birmingham, that he might do the work of an evangelist; but with reference to his present position we can only say, May he soon acknowledge, that if he is the right man for Birmingham, he is not in his proper place in Cannon Street Church, and soon may we hear of the ordination of elders in that church.

Will Mr. Lord give in our next number Scripture warrant for the one man pastorate?

CONFESSIONS OF A FOOLISH MAN.

I DON'T know that I've been more foolish than some other people, and if some of my readers and I were to compare notes together, I can't say to whose advantage the comparison would be.

It's not likely that I shall put my name to these confessions. If I have ever done some wise thing, whenever that is mentioned, I shall have no objection to the name going with it. But when foolish things are told, it makes all the difference. "Well, what are the confessions about?" First, I shall confess a little about RICH PEOPLE AND POOR.

When I joined a church, I thought I was connecting myself with a society which would take as much notice of a poor member as of a rich one. I thought the standard of honor to be one that had more to do with piety than gold. I thought, "Surely that member who is the holiest will be most esteemed." But I now find that I was a foolish man for thinking so. Longer experience and larger acquaintance, have made that early expectation look quite ridiculous.

When I went to church meetings, being but a young man, I modestly took one of the lowest seats; and when I looked to the higher seats, I found that the men who had the best coats on, and the women who wore the best shawls, were there. The deacons were the most respectable men, and whenever any were elected to fill up vacancies, scarcely anybody thought of voting for a common laboring man, so long as there was one better off to stand. One of the deacons was very rich; he came to chapel in his carriage; he lived in a large house; the minister used often to go there; and his pew was the nicely cushioned and curtained one in the corner. If ever I ventured to surmise anything about the great attention paid to this rich deacon, I found that I always had the worst of the argument; for, said they, "See how much he gives for the pew, and however would the cause get on without him." Being a foolish man, and not acquainted with Watts' or Whateley's Logic, I couldn't get over that at all.

were expected to go to the inquirer's meetings, but that rich people need not do so. And one case that came under my eye was the following:—Mr. So-and-so was a thriving tradesman; his business was largely increasing, and he had set up a carriage. He never attended the prayer meetings, and very seldom the week evening lecture; he was known to have a considerable quantity of the root of all evil, and there were rather strong fancies abroad that his temper was not first-rate. But he was rich. The minister and one of the deacons would sometimes give him a call. Well, he joined. Yes, and he was soon made into a deacon! Yes, and he soon made a disturbance! Yes, and when he had helped to drive one minister away, and had tried to drive another, but could not do it, he took himself off, and joined the aristocratic church over the way. Now I was a very foolish man for saying, that this way of bringing in Mr. So-and-so, and making him a deacon, was not right conduct towards poor John Jones, the carpenter, who was kept on the tenter-hooks several months before he could get in. If I had been at all acquainted with the faith and practice of churches generally, and if I had been up in ecclesiastical history, I should have kept my tongue quiet, and never uttered one grumble about it. "As it was in the beginning, is now," I might have said to myself, and so have slept comfortably.

Mr. Joseph Jenkinson was an intimate friend of mine; he was considered rather a talented young man, and was sent to college. I felt a deep interest in his welfare, and when he was settled over a church, our correspondence with each other was frequent; and the distance between us not being many miles we often saw each other. In the church was a poor blind girl, Against this girl one of the respectable members circulated strange reports. Who was the respectable member? Why, she was the wife of the principal deacon. Joseph thought, "Well, this must be investigated; if these reports be true, she must be excluded; if they be false, she must be justified." So he called in two members to help him, and they three set to work to find out the rights of the case. They brought it in that it was all a slander, that there was no foundation for such statements; and having gone fully into the charges, and acted impartially throughout, they thought their verdict deserved some notice. But, O dear me, what a storm it raised about friend Joseph's ears! It was a most scandalous thing, that a young man like him would not believe the principal deacon's wife, that he would go and make inquiries of poor ignorant people, and suppose that they were to be admitted in evidence. He had seen my lady, and if she didn't choose to give any proof beside saying — "You can't suppose, Mr. Jenkinson, that I wish to injure the girl, and I feel sure she's guilty" — what was Mr. Jenkinson, a young man fresh from college, and dependent upon his £80 a year, that he should presume further to interfere!

Friend Joseph came over one day to me to tell me all about it, and I said to him, "Well, if I were you I would leave; they are getting up a party against you, and it isn't worth while for you to stay with such a church as that." Here, again, in this advice, oozed out my ignorance and folly. I confess that I ought to have known better, and have told him rather, that as things were, he couldn't expect to be happy over any church, if he continued to behave in that odd way. "See," I ought rather to have said, "what other ministers would have done; they would have gone to the girl and told her, that she must not expect perfection in a church, and that seeing the principal deacon's wife had been a member so long, and was in some other ways very useful, if she kept quiet it would all end right. And their conduct, in going so far and no further, would have been esteemed charitable and expedient, all things considered."

FORGING DOCTRINES.

MANY ministers forge doctrines as they would forge ploughs. One Sunday it is election; and they heat it red hot, and beat and hammer it on the anvil, and then put it away, cold iron, upon the shelf. The next Sunday it is decrees; and they beat and hammer that, and lay it also aside. The next Sunday it is the perseverance of the saints; and the next, the origin of evil, or some equally incomprehensible thing, for the farther a subject is from the range of human faculties, the better it seems to be to make a doctrine of; and so they go on through the year, with occasional exceptions, and the next year they take them down and cast them over again. They do not use them. They only fashion them. They rub them up, they polish them, and then they lay them on the shelf—disputing meanwhile which fashion is best. There are various schools; and each school has its own pattern, and underrates the others, without ever doing as inventors do at agricultural fairs — taking their ploughs out into the field with them, to see which can do the work best. Now I believe in doctrines, with my explanations, as much as they; but I must use them. My duty is to forge a plough, and then to give it a handle, and then to fasten a team to it strong as eternity, and to put it into the soil, and to rip through the sod down to the subsoil, and to roust out all vermin and the nibbling mice, and turn up the yellow dirt to the Sun. No doctrine is good for anything that does not leave behind it an ethical furrow, ready for the planting of seeds, which shall spring up and bear abundant harvest.

H. W. BEECHER.

MEN secret their religious life through shame, or fear of criticism, or morbid sensibility; but no man can be a Christian without being luminous. A man may carry his faith so guardedly, that no one shall suspect that he is a Christian; but the worst of this is, that God never suspects it either, and forgets to write down his name in the Book of Life.—H. W. Beecher.

Good deeds are very fruitful, for out of one good action of ours God produces a thousand, the harvest whereof is perpetual. Even the faithful actions of the old patriarchs, the constant sufferings of ancient martyrs, live still, and do good to all succession of ages by their example. If good deeds were utterly barren, I would seek after them for the conscience of their own goodness; how much more shall I be encouraged to perform them for that they are so profitable both to myself and others, and to myself in others!

QUERY AND REPLY.

PRESENTING PRAYER TO JESUS.

Perhaps you or some of your correspondents will enlighten the minds of your readers as to the propriety or impropriety of addressing the Saviour of mankind in prayer, distinct from the Father, as the Giver of all mercies, and the source from whence all blessings now flow to the children of men.—INQUIRER.

Our readers would do well to examine this subject for themselves. The model as to the manner of prayer, is that which the Apostles employed after they were filled by the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, the first instance of which will be found recorded in Acts iv. 23-30, viz. — “And when they heard that, they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, and said, Lord, thou art God, which hast made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is: who by the mouth of thy servant David has said, Why did the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things? The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord and against his Christ. For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done. And now, Jehovah, behold their threatenings; and grant unto thy servants, that with all boldness they may speak thy word, by stretching forth thine hand to heal; and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy child Jesus.” This petition, as is quite evident, was not addressed to the Lord Jesus; and therefore those who advocate the practice of addressing the Saviour directly in prayer, should refer us at once to the authority of the Apostles, for the guidance of our readers.

ITEMS OF NEWS.

ABERCHIRDER.

The cause of Jesus Christ is making but little progress here, which is partly owing to early training and the religious prejudices inbibed in youth, and the plain Scriptural exhibition of the Gospel never having been brought to bear upon them. The brethren in Banff visit us stately, and the desire to hear us has never decreased. An evangelist fully qualified to present the whole council of God and silence gain-sayers, would, through the Divine blessing, be the means of persuading the undecided to put on the Lord Jesus by submitting to his authority; and, along with many of the brethren here, I earnestly wish for such a consummation.

The excellent Harbinger which you edit and publish, is well calculated to enlighten and instruct the ignorant and those who are out of the way, but as it has no sympathy with the clergy, it is their object to poison the minds of the people against it, by misrepresenting and condemning its contents. Let us labor and pray that the time may be hastened, when error in doctrine and practice may soon come to an end, and the truth as it is in Jesus pervade a redeemed world. W. AUCHINACHIE.

BIRMINGHAM.

“Since forwarding the notice for the October Harbinger we have moved on c/4

much as before. The number added to the church since the Annual Meeting is twenty-four. The meetings are well attended, so much so as to leave little or no spare room. We have no doubt that with a larger and more suitable place, considerable meetings could be held. Bible classes, on the Lord's-day afternoon, have been commenced under circumstances of promise. In last Saturday's paper an advertisement appeared, as near as we can remember, in the following words—

“The Lord's Supper and the Lord's Day—the one as often as the other. Members of churches are invited to hear this proved by Scripture and fair argument, in Bond Street Chapel, on Lord's day morning next.”

“Accordingly, Mr. S. CHEW, minister of Bond Street Baptist Church (consisting of some 300 members) in whose pulpit, three months since, we set forth the divine obligation of weekly communion, delivered an unanswerable and most convincing discourse from Acts xx. 7. We hope ere long to report that this old established church has declared in favour of the constant commemoration of the Lord's death.”

The above was forwarded for insertion in the last number, but could not appear through not arriving in time. We can now add concerning the sermon on the Lord's Supper, that the church in Bond Street have discussed the subject, and will in a few days meet to give an answer to the question, "Shall we henceforward observe the Lord's Supper as often as the Lord's day?" In the mean time they have requested the publication of the sermon, which request has been complied with, and on page forty-three of this Harbinger will be found an outline of the extracts therefrom. We are happy to know that in other churches and societies in Birmingham, this, and other topics, which, from the inspired word, we have for some months urged upon the people, are demanding and obtaining very much more attention than some people like, and that changes will come because they must. But we cannot write all we know. Since putting the above to paper we have immersed three, and have this week again to use the bath, but for what number we are not yet able to state. D. K.

DUNDEE.

By the report of our meeting at Cupar, you will see that we mean to buckle on our armour, and to wage a good warfare. A fortnight ago we had Bro. Milner, from Edinburgh, who addressed a numerous assembly on "The Everlasting Gospel," and "The Times." Our evening meeting was held in an old Scotch Independent meeting-house, its use being granted by the elder, who is a very excellent character. This body of Christians observe the same order as ourselves, with the exception that they have not entered the kingdom by a birth of water and Spirit; but they heard the truth, and I hope it will prove quick and powerful. Bro. Brown, from Kirkaldy, was with us on Dec. 14, his subjects being "The Mystery of Godliness," and "Positive Law." We have good meetings, but few obey the truth. The champion of debate, as he is termed—Mr. John Bowes, of Cheltenham—is now in this town, and crossing our path. You know how he tried to crush the cause of Jesus in Manchester, when Bro. King, with a few stones from the brook, discomfited him. We fear him not here.—I am glad to hear that the work of the Lord is prospering in Birmingham. May the little one become a thousand, and the small one a strong nation. Your's in the truth, JAMES AINSLIE.

DOUGLAS.

Myself and wife arrived at 22, King-street, Douglas, Isle of Man, on the last Saturday in October, at which time there were no brethren here. The following Lord's day, Nov. 6, four of us met for worship, and to commemorate the death of our Lord Jesus Christ. Since then two have been added to our number from the Baptists, and on Dec. 19 another who had been immersed into Jesus for the remission of sins, believing it to be the will of Christ that his followers should commemorate his death and resurrection every first day of the week. J. J.

GLASGOW.

We are happy to announce that on the 17th ult. a son of our much-esteemed Brother Webster having made the good confession, and been baptized into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, was added to the congregation of Christian disciples meeting in 41, Brown-street. May we soon see others following his example. J. BROWN, JUN.

November 14th, 1858.

GRANGEMOUTH.

I am happy to announce that last month we had an addition to our number, on confession with the mouth, that Jesus is the Son of God, and immersion in water into the names of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. May this brother, with all who like him have made the good confession before witnesses, hold fast the faith, be faithful unto death, and finally receive the crown of life. W. WALKER.

JERSEY.

I am happy to say that the little cause here is still progressing, and that we have had several additions. Last Lord's day two males were baptized and added to the church, and more are shortly expected to obey our Lord and Master. We have had three deaths in our ranks during the year, but still God is blessing us even through these bereavements, by stirring us up to renewed energy and diligence. Our meetings are well attended by many who are making enquiry as to our way.—I am glad the Harbinger continues so interesting, and that the strife of words is somewhat subdued, more peace and harmony existing among its contributors. The greater our peace and humility, the better for the prosperity of our Redeemer's cause in the world. Your's in the good hope,

St. Lawrence Valley, Dec. 9. M. F.

LONDON.

Last Lord's day, at Camden Hall, we were cheered by the presence of Brethren William and David Smith, on their way from Australia to Ireland. During their passage they labored to communicate the truth as it is in Jesus to their fellow-passengers. Two of these—one on his way to the Isle of Wight, and the other to Guernsey—accompanied them to our meeting, and were immersed into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. These brethren, we believe, are gone on their way rejoicing; and are prepared to contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints, in order to bring others to obedience thereto. May they be eminently useful, and faithful unto death, that they may receive the crown of life, which the Lord will give to all who love his appearing! W. D. HARRIS.

MANCHESTER.

You will no doubt have received the gratifying intelligence of six having been added to the church in Manchester within the last fortnight, four of whom are young persons. This addition has greatly cheered the church, and will doubtless encourage us to renewed exertions in the cause of our Saviour. W. D.

December 9, 1858.

SHREWSBURY.

We are glad to report some signs of improvement here. We commenced a Bible class on Thursday evening, a few weeks back, which we were afraid would have to be given up, as only one or two of the brethren attended; but, by perseverance, several young persons assembled with us, and we have had some very interesting conversations on the Scriptures read. On the two last evenings we have had an intelligent man from the Baptists, and now our meetings bid fair to become still more interesting and profitable. A Bible class has been commenced at the Baptist chapel by some who have observed our proceedings, at which we rejoice, for we have confidence in the power of the truth, when it is investigated sincerely and cordially received. We intend, if spared until the new year, to pay the Baptists a visit, and become better acquainted with them. We have no one here who can efficiently proclaim the truth. The labors of an evangelist for three or four months would be productive of much good. In the meantime, however, we must do the best we can to proclaim the Gospel in our own simple way, commending it also by the consistency of our walk and conversation. Your's in the hope of a glorious resurrection,

JOHN THOMAS.

WIGAN

Since our communication of last month, eight persons have turned to the Lord here. Your's respectfully, W. McDougall.

MELBOURNE (AUSTRALIA.)

The churches at Prahran and Melbourne are progressing. Two lectures, of about half an hour each, are to be given in the Mechanics' Institutes both of Melbourne and Prahran, for four successive Lord's day evenings. This day week was the first of the six Lord's day evenings, in which Brothers SERVICE, KIDNER, BURT, PICTON, MCGREGOR and COLES are each engaged to give a second lecture in each place, for the conversion of sinners, and for increasing the zeal of the saints. The six are named above, according to the years of their earthly existence; a brother belonging to Melbourne, and one belonging to Prahran, alternately. We hope to see the pleasure of the Lord prospering still more amongst us. On Friday week two females were immersed into Christ at Prahran, and on this day week a young man was immersed here. The young church at South Brighton is prospering. May the Lord grant us many proofs of the converting power of the glorious gospel, and revive and build up the saints in their most holy faith. May grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, be with all the saints in all lands. In the faith and hope of the Gospel, I am, dear brother, your's truly,

R. SERVICE.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

We abridge the following interesting accounts of the progress of the cause from Bro. Campbell's Harbinger for November:

MISSOURI.—T. M. Allen, under date of September 23, reports that after a meeting held at Smithville they had 159 additions, at Barry 17 additions, and at Miami, in Saline county, they had an accession of 20. —The same writer, on October 2, states that a meeting at Huntsville terminated with 5 additions; and on the 9th of October, that a meeting of a fortnight's duration at Middlegrove, Monroe county, had closed with 44 additions, 40 of whom were by immersion.—A meeting of two days at Millersburg had closed with 9 additions; and a meeting at Antioch with 4 additions. —D. S. Burnett, as missionary of the American Christian Missionary Society, under date of September 27, reports the labors of a tour of some six weeks through Illinois, Kansas, and Missouri. Delivered a few discourses to the brethren in Chicago, visited Hannibal and St. Louis, and after delivering addresses at these points, raised some missionary funds. Thence passed on to Columbia, where the State Meeting was in session Sept. 1 and 2. Participating with them in the various exercises, and receiving a contribution to the missionary fund, left for St. Joseph, where I delivered some three discourses to large and attentive audiences. Thence visited Atchison and Leavenworth, and preached in the former place. On the 17th, began a meeting with the Salem church, which closed with 27 additions.—R. A. Rice, under date Oct. 18, reports 5 additions by confession and baptism at Pollard, a point which had been neglected for many years.

GEORGIA.—T. H. Harris, under date of October 12, reports the organization of five churches within the past year, at the beginning of which there were but four members in the above-named place. So promising is this field of labor, that with an additional evangelist, it is thought that another year would double the number of churches in that region.

ILLINOIS.—L. J. Correll, under date of October 20, reports a meeting of one week, in the vicinity of Rockford, with 12 additions; also, within six miles of Sycamore, a meeting of several days, which terminated with 5 additions.

KENTUCKY.—J. A. Gano, writing on Oct. 12, reports 150 additions, made within the period of about six weeks, ending on the 1st of September. Most of these were gained at Carlisle and Sharpsburg, and 44 at Newcastle.

TEXAS.—E. Jones, under date of October 9, reports a meeting of ten days at Goliad, which closed on the 12th of September, with 41 additions. — S. B. Giles, on September 29th, reports a meeting of five days in Batsrop county, with 29 additions, mostly by confession and baptism. At Georgetown, after a meeting of four days, with 19 additions.

VIRGINIA.—A. E. Myers, writing on October 18, reports the progress of the good cause for the last year, within the limits of his field of labors, embracing the counties of Belmont, Monroe, and Guernsey, Ohio, with occasional visits to Marshall and Ohio counties, Virginia. The visible results of his labors, conjoined with those of other evangelists, have been about 150 additions to the principal congregations in the aforesaid district. Much light has radiated from these points, which has excited the public mind, and stirred up a spirit of inquiry which is not likely to stop.

OBITUARIES.

the beloved wife of our highly-esteemed brother, William McDougall, after a short and painful illness, fell asleep in Jesus this morning, Nov. 24, at half-past six, aged 29 years. Though she had been in this neighbourhood only a short time, she had gathered around her a circle of friends by her genial and loving spirit, and she will ever live in their memories as a truly pious and devoted Christian.

Her brethren and sisters in the Lord deeply mourn the departure of our dear sister, having looked forward to years of Christian intercourse and holy fellowship with the followers of Christ.

But we sorrow not as those that have no hope, for we know that our dear sister has gone to her Redeemer, to enjoy the rest and reward which remain for the people of God. Taken from the evil to come, and like as a flower, too beautiful and delicate to dwell in this world of sorrow, she has been transplanted into the paradise above, there to bloom in heavenly freshness and beauty. Verily the memory of the just is blessed. Well may we say, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." Let us ever remember, that it is not those who put on the Christian armour, but those who put it off, having fought the good fight of faith, and gained a triumphant victory over sin, death and the grave, who are ready to exclaim with the holy Apostle, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

J. S. WALKER.

MRS. FOULDS.

I have to inform you of the decease of my dear wife, which took place on the 7th of November last, after protracted suffering, which she bore with much patience and Christian fortitude. She enjoyed great calmness and peace of mind as the time of her departure drew near, trusting entirely in the finished work of our blessed Redeemer. Her life was that of the righteous, and her end was peace. She was much esteemed by the brethren, and all who knew her, in her former place of residence (Paisley) as well as in this island.

M. FOULDS.

MARGERY WILTON CORP,

the third daughter of our Brother Corp, died after an illness of fourteen days, expressing her faith in Christ, and her hope of admission into his eternal kingdom.

STUDY TO BE QUIET.

BY A. E. BENTON.

It has been observed by one of the first critics of the age, that when a subject is chosen, "Pontus, Galatia, Capadocia, and Asia," is as good a text as any other; but to show that Quietness, the subject of which we treat, was not beneath the notice and commendation of an Apostle, we read in 1 Thess. iv. 11, "And that ye study to be quiet, and do your own business." Nor is this the only passage in which quietness is enjoined as a grace of character, but in the 2nd Epistle the same injunction is also found; and in respect to the highest functionary in the church, the bishop, the inhibition is positive and unqualified, that he be no brawler, and that he be of good behaviour—or, as the marginal reading expresses it, that he be modest.

This quietness of deportment and language forms, therefore, an essential element of the model character, drawn by the Apostle—and it is our present purpose to analyze that element of quietness, and to develope, in some measure, its importance.

Study to be quiet.—This admonition seems to be founded on a fact of our nature, yea, a fact of universal nature, viz—excess. Nature bestows with a profuse and opulent hand. No being comes into the world without some small excess of his proper quality.

The natural philosopher would tell us that to overcome the inertia of a planet, and to start it in its orbit, more force is required than to keep it moving when once projected. The genius of force is not to be taken as the standard of continuation.

The vegetable world displays this same marvellous generosity of excess and calculated profusion. Such is its prodigality of flower and seed, that but a small portion is needed for reproduction and beneficent use. In nature all is liberal and exuberant to excess.

The experience we have of ourselves, and our observation of others, teaches the same truth with regard to our own nature. Our life from youth to age is a state of unrest and disquiet, often realizing the couplet of the poet,

"An idle chase of hopes and fears, Begun in folly, closed in tears."

The excitability, especially of early life, seems to be of excess; nor may it be without its beneficent use, for, as in the case of the planet, the projectile force may need to have a degree of impulse beyond that required for continued motion. From these illustrations is deduced that law of nature to which we have adverted. But to these tendencies of excess there are counteracting and balancing forces. In physics a nice balance of power is seen at last to exist between the centrifugal and centripetal forces; and in morals, the violence of passion and appetite, and all the tumults of soul, are softened down, allayed, and restrained by enlightened reason and quickened conscience. This in Scripture is characterized, as the striving of the spirit against the flesh—a conflict from which none are wholly exempt, and by which the moral equipoise is at last adjusted.

These perturbations of life, both without and within us—those of which we are the cause, and those caused by others—would well call forth this remark of the Apostle, study to be quiet. But we would attempt the analysis of this word quiet, and endeavour to grasp something of the amplitude of its meaning and application.

1st. And first, it is not the quietness of death. No picture of quiet—of undisturbed and perfect repose is more impressive than death. All its subjects are at rest. But there is also a quietness of life. The tree that numbers its years by centuries, that enlarges its trunk by successive layers, and that elaborates the juices from which it is nourished and enlarged, is the result of agencies quiet in their operations. That huge Mariposa pine that towers four hundred feet with its aspiring top, achieved the work without setting all the pinery in an uproar. Like the operations of Providence, silently; yet life has characterized its whole history.

Look, too, as we may through the whole domain of nature, her operations teach that quiet labor is most effective and beneficent.

2nd. In the second place, by quietness, I do not understand the quiet of stagnation. The pool by the wayside, undisturbed by breeze or shower for many a day, illustrates my idea of stagnation.—The quietness that we would commend is not that of stagnant feelings, or torpid emotions, or languid effort, but the quiet of activity.

Throughout all her departments, nature is active. The laws of attraction and repulsion are ever operative and unsuspended. That fine product of her skill, the diamond, is crystallized with noiseless activity that mocks all the polishing efforts of the lapidary. A world revolving in its orbit 68,000 miles an hour, performs its cycle with such noiseless motion, that its action is imperceptible, and was for ages doubted. But a rail car, the work of man, moving thirty miles per hour, is a wonder for its noise, and its rough, rasping friction. But to come to our social life. Who, I would ask, is the successful man of business? Is it he who is always in a hurry, in a ferment, and agitation? Or is it he that quietly directs and controls, who plans sagaciously and executes quietly. In nine cases out of ten, the blusterer will fail, because his perceptions are clouded by the disturbed state of his mind. He has, in the language of Pathology, too strong a determination of blood to the head, and the result is, a fatal vertigo. But the man of business that proceeds quietly in his vocation, leaves in free and unobstructed play all the great elements of thrift, such as prudence, caution, and sagacity, and hence avoids the maelstrom of misfortune into which the blusterer is often drawn.

The student, too, exemplifies the necessity for this quiet activity. Engaged exclusively in intellectual toils, his first study should be, the study of being quiet—quiet in the study room, quiet in the class room, and wherever his labour is to be performed. To him, close and undivided attention is everything—not a casual attention, but the habit of attention. This intense application of mind, and rigid discipline of the attention, must belong to the real student; and this habit is a fruit of quietness, and a pledge of mental thrift.

Antagonistic to this is the habit of restlessness, which indulges the mind in all its reveries, sports with its fancies, and follows its vagaries. This restless habit of indolence produces our eloquent dissertations on the inutility of some difficult branches of study, and the folly of plodding through what is deemed sterile regions of thought. From this habit come the warm eulogies of general literature and various knowledge. Resolving to become readers, they plunge into an ocean of miscellaneous reading, as superficial as paint. Quiet, intense, and confined attention such spirits abhor, as nature abhors a vacuum. They never with the energies of their souls strive to turn the key of knowledge, that opens the way into the temple of truth. They, of this restless habit, pay their homage rather to the Pandora of Literature—worship Bacchus and the Graces, and call it polishing the mind—as if mind could be polished before there is some mind to polish.

For those who would substitute such mental dissipation for quiet and attentive study, it would be better to spend their four years in deciphering hieroglyphics in the catacombs of Egypt. From such a retreat and employment a man would come forth better fitted to grapple with the realities of life, than by dissipating and frittering away his power of patient investigation on the frivolities of miscellaneous literature.

No recommendation of mine with respect to reading is at all comparable to one I will quote from that Philosopher of Philosophers, Lord Bacon. Read, says he, not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted—others to be swallowed—some few to be chewed and digested—and we might add, some are not to be read at all.

The student's world, is the world of thought, and with him to think is to act. Or, in the words of TUPPER, "the hand is not idle that props a thinking head. But intense, focal, burning thought can only be achieved by quietness, with the soul collected in all its power. The clairvoyant penetration of some men is only quiet concentration. Like the focal point of light, every refractory substance is subdued beneath its power. The high conceptions of genius, as in MILTON, were attained as he expresses it, by musings until the fire burned. So to the ancient seer the divine power was not in the fire, or in the whirlwind that passed by, but in the still, small voice. God was in that stillness of expressive silence.

We have enlarged somewhat beyond proportion, on the importance of quietness to the student, from being aware, that we are all somewhat deceived by sense, and by our worship of visible magnitude. Because a thinker is not a president, bank director, or merchant prince, we are apt to think him inactive and worthless. Of this blindness will our mental vision be couched when we realize that every institution, epoch, or condition is founded on a thought. Thought, patient, assiduous thought, is the legitimate ancestor of action. Be not then impatient to figure admiringly before the world, as senators and public men, but first study to be quiet, and do your own business, for you will each find that you have a vocation in life, and your talent will be your call.

Some years ago I had the good fortune to become a member of a theological school for a specific purpose, and the very worthy faculty of that school inquired, if I thought I had a call to the ministry, to which I replied, that I thought not; that to me a call would imply—1, The call of the people. 2, The talent and desire for the work; and 3, A prospect of doing more good than in any other way. These elements will constitute your call to the high offices and responsible trusts both in church and state. Until you receive this call, again let me recommend that you study to be quiet.

3rd. In the third place, the quietness of which we speak is not the quiet of fear.

There are those to be found who may be called fearful from constitution. They quake at opinion—public opinion, as it is called—at the threats of violence, the voice of contempt, or the finger of scorn. To such every day is a judgment day. True quiet is a state to them utterly unknown. Theirs is the quiet of the paralytic, endowed with the principle of life and activity, it is true, but like Lazarus, restored to life, bound hand and foot, with grave clothes. But genuine quiet is not attained by fear, but by courage. Peace is to be conquered on all the great battle-fields of life, where the dastard and poltroon have none but an ignoble and inglorious part to perform. It is remarked by the sententious Tacitus, that in battle the eye is first conquered; and so it is "imagination frames events unknown, and what it fears, creates." Resolution is the virtue most of all that will lead in the peaceful walks of Christ, dispel our apprehension, and subdue our groundless fears.

But in this age no courage is more demanded than the moral courage, to speak your own convictions. In England many years ago, Sydney Smith said, no man had a right to an opinion who was not worth thirty thousand a year. There is a social Coventry into which the dissidents and nonconformists in opinions are banished. To live habitually in the fear that we may offend a companion by expressing an unpopular opinion, or one at variance with his own, will not conduce to quietness of soul. Upon the man who thus covers and stifles conviction, and finally acquiesces in what he deems the false, nature takes terrible retribution. Woe unto those who call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, is the startling denunciation of inspiration. To call, or acquiescingly to hear called moral qualities by wrong names, is suicidal to our own natures, and offensive to God. Suicidal, for thus our moral perceptions are stunted, languish, and die—and offensive, because we seek to subvert the moral order of the universe of God. It would be well worthy of a discourse to show how we invert the moral qualities of actions, and how by fair names and plausible explanations, we transmute good into evil, and evil into good; but here we only mention the fact to enforce the necessity for moral courage in the expression of our views, in order to quiet the monitions of our moral nature. Hence arises the necessity for the cultivation of an independent spirit, by which I mean, not an unfeigning defiance of the opinions and usages of society, but that moral firmness that reverently listens, in evil as well as in good report, to the voice of conscience and of God.

Like the knight of the tournament, the man of independent spirit meets his adversary with the point of the spear, to show his inflexible determination and fearlessness in combat. This virtue of independence of spirit is the more to be insisted on, inasmuch as by some it is thought, that the love of popularity is the prevailing vice of the times.* By its fascinations men are led to deny their principles and former practices; and absolutely to unman themselves, and to barter away their independence of soul for the slavish and menial services of waiting on public caprice. The quietness that is desirable, or even possible, forms no alliance with fear, but it is the offshoot of the courage of an independent mind. Such a man, in the words of Cowper,

"Holds no parley with unmanly fears,
Where duty points he confidently steers,
Faces a thousand dangers at her call,
And trusting in his God, surmounts them all."

This quietness is, then, not the quiet of death, but of life; not of stagnation, but of activity; not of fear, but of courage; and who will say that it is not a grace of character?

Grace is that which is pleasing or agreeable; and what is more pleasing to our contemplation than the elements of life, activity, and courage? But quietness is something even more—it is an ornament of Christian character. The ideal of the perfect character embraces this as an integral part, and of so much importance is it, that we are to make it the subject of special study, with a view to its attainment.

While this quality diffuses itself and permeates the active elements of our being, it is also the fruit of many branches.

1st. Quietness is a fruit of self-control. This quality of self-control is to be commended and cultivated, not merely for the quiet state of mind and body that it superinduces, but for the social power it imparts. Applied to the body, self-control is called ease of manner; applied to the soul, it is peace of mind. The general result is, quietness. This ease of manner and repose of mind sway an inexplicable power over those with whom they come in contact. Many an Œdipus comes along and thinks he can expound and explain this mysterious power of the reserved force of man; this power of our personal presence, that acts directly by presence and without means.

It has been said of the celebrated William Pitt, Lord Chatham, that there was something finer in the man than in anything he said. In our own Washington, his personal weight cannot be inferred from his exploits. Of one of the regicides, Milton says, John Bradshaw appears like a consul, from whom the fasces are not to depart with the year, so that not on the tribunal only, but throughout his life, you would regard him as sitting in judgment on Kings.

The reputation of such men does not rest so much upon what they do, as upon what they seem capable of doing. The greatest part of their power is latent, and we are always ready to believe that half their power they put not forth.

In Greek drama we have this suggestive dialogue: O, Iole! how did you know that Hercules was a god? Because, answered Iole, I was content the moment I set my eyes on him.

When I beheld Theseus, I desired that I might see him offer battle, or at least, guide his horses in a chariot race. But Hercules did not wait for a contest. He conquered, whether he stood, or walked, or sat, or whatever thing he did. Hence doubtless the adage, Ex pede Herculem. (Hercules is known from his foot.)

To be superior, or inspire respect, whether we stand, walk, or sit, is self-control as applied to manner, and its fruit is quietness of manner. And perhaps it would be too much to say, that this latent force in man is like that in steam, directly proportioned to the force of repression. When the escape valve freely emits the steam, boys may stop to wonder at it, but none gains an impression of its power.

So with self-control in manner; without a steady and habitual repression of unbecoming attitudes and movements, true ease, and the grace of manner resulting therefrom, are never attained. Unsteady, restless, wriggling, lubricity of movement does not comport with dignity, and is an unfortunate inheritance to its possessor. To exert, therefore, your own proper power, be self-controlled in manner.

But there is a much nobler, and more important self-control, than the one of which we have spoken—we mean, the control of thought, appetites, and passions. It is not our intention, at this time, to enter into a full discussion of these topics, but only so far as to point out the fact, that our quietness of mind depends upon their firm and vigorous control.

In the retirement and contemplation of student life, it may be thought that the mind is prone to innocence, and in a state of moral security. But it, too, should be remembered, there are solitary diseases of the imagination, as fatal as the vices of society. He who pollutes his fancy with books, may be more to blame than he who falls by the power of some temptation, though he may not make himself so ridiculous or pitiable. The bestial tribes impelled by instinct, enjoy a round of gratifications beyond which they never pass; but man, endowed with imagination and invention, is able to whet his sensual propensities almost indefinitely, and thus an eternal disquiet settles down upon the soul. Study, therefore, to have the quiet of a self-controlled imagination.

And what need I say of the appetites and passions, or what can more authoritatively be said than the apostolic command? Dearly beloved, abstain from fleshly lusts, that war against the soul. How often do we have to deplore the fall of man, in his falling into the hands of a mob of grovelling appetites—in his baptism in the slime and pollution of gross gratifications? The ethereal spark—how its pristine light of purity and innocence has become eclipsed, and often extinguished. And how the iron of remorse often enters the soul, embittering the entire existence.

In themselves our appetences are all useful. Like the elements of the natural world, they are parts of a wise and beneficent system—but like those elements are only beneficent when restrained. Study, therefore, to control your passions, that the proportion, order, harmony, and peace of your spiritual being may be realized and enjoyed.

2nd. In the next place quietness is a fruit of patience. It has been justly said, that man is a being of wonderful conditions, but one of the most wonderful, in my esteem, is that he is a waiter. He is a waiter on Providence. We wait for the early and latter rain, and patient waiting is the substitute for the possession.

By the benign ordinations of Providence, therefore, we have to learn to wait. Of the angels even, as Milton expresses it, they too serve, who stand and wait.—This patience, so fruitful in quietness to the soul, has been shorn of much of its native glory by being called a passive virtue—as if it were equivalent to inaction, and implied a want of energy and determination.

But it will be found that there are seasons in life when to be still, requires far more power than to act. At such times, composure is the highest result of power. Think you, it requires no power to moderate the clamors of passion—to quiet the importunities of desire—to hush the repinings for the dearest hopes blasted—to quell discontent when property, the result of life's labour, is swept away—and when our confidence is shaken in the reality of virtue, by the frailties of the good, and when our love is repelled by coldness, or tortured by inconstancy.

With the student, too, is found a restless impatience for notoriety. Instead of waiting for a call, he begins the battle of life uncalled and uncommissioned. From afar he hears the bustle of the comitia, and rushes from the grove of Egeria for the encounter of parties and politics.—History is not wanting in instructive examples of the young, who, by their early abandonment of the quiet walk of intellect and moral discipline, have been lost to every good end in church and state. Among the ancients, Alcibiades and the Gracchi were lost to everything but faction; and among the moderns I may adduce the name of Burke, and support my assertion by the authority of Goldsmith, who had to lament that

And to party gave up what was meant for mankind.”

Be not, then, seduced from the quiet of literary seclusion, by the brilliant promises of rapid success in the Forum or Senate Chamber. In the words of our own countryman poet,

“Learn to labour and to wait.”

3rd. In the next place I would suggest that quietness of soul is a fruit of faith—faith with respect to life—faith with respect to the ultimate triumph of right—and faith in future happiness.

Time would fail in pointing out in detail the quieting influence of faith in all these particulars, and we must content ourselves by observing that the tendency of faith is to realize its objects—that all things are possible, to him who thinks them possible. In all the great labours of life, nothing has ever been accomplished without strong faith. The voice of confidence has rallied retreating armies, the labour of faith has civilized the world, and laid the Atlantic Cable. Let not the fearful and unbelieving stretch forth his nerveless hands to the support of any cause.

So, too, to the man of faith, the triumph of right is realized. He is not waiting so much for the Millennium, as he is enjoying it. To him war, intemperance, and slavery have already ceased, for to him things that are not, are as the things that are. To the man of faith, the history of the world is the history of God's operations, but to the sceptic it is a "mighty maze without a plan." In the deliverance that God has sometimes wrought for the oppressed, and in the decline and fall of mighty empires, unbelief sees nothing but the fact; while to the eye of faith, all forms one endless chain, fastened eternally to the throne of God, which, after embracing the universe, returns again to link itself to the footstool of Omnipotence.

But I should feel as if I had but partially performed my duty, did I not advert to that sacred quietness of soul, which faith in a future life of glory imparts. This is the peculiar province and function of faith. When the shadows of the evening of life gather thick around us, and a thick mist settles down upon the objects that have hitherto engaged our attention—when the countenances of loved ones become indistinct to our view, and the tones of friendship and affection are no longer intelligible—and when the curtain is descending, shutting out the actors of this busy scene, then it is that the eye of faith opens wide, and faith and sight are one—then the ear of faith hears the song of seraphim and cherubim, and at once he sings the song of Moses and the Lamb. This is the glorious reward and triumph of Christian faith, in the rest remaining for the children of God.

Thus we have endeavoured to trace quietness of soul in some of its sources, among which may justly be classed self-control, patience, and faith; and it only remains for us to make an observation or two with respect to the concluding sentiment of our text, "Do your own business."

This supplemental clause fully indicates that, in our study to be quiet, we are not absolved from obligations to activity. As we are to study to be quiet—so are we to study to do our own business, efficiently and thoroughly, and doubtless it would be just to say, it requires no less study to compass the latter than the former.

It may very safely be affirmed in view of this passage of Scripture, that every man has a business to perform in life. However aimless and useless our lives may become, still the truth is patent, that a business of life is laid upon us.

High and noble ends may be attained, or mean and ignoble. We may be said to be hedged in on every side save one, and in that direction we may rightfully grow and move. In the Scripture it is called the narrow way of life.

To achieve the high and noble ends of life within the sphere of our abilities, requires study—intense, assiduous study.

1st. And in the first place, it requires study to obtain a living in this world, which is first in point of time, but not in importance. Working for bread is a divine appointment, and therefore honorable in all.

2nd. And in the next place we must work for society at large. Society being in its nature a convention, naturally loves what is conventional. Study, then, the conventional arrangements of society, not to rail and satirize, but to profit and refine, and you will realize the truth of the couplet of Pope,

"Man, like the generous vine, supported lives,
The strength he gains, is from the embrace he gives."

3rd. In the third place, study your duties to the church. As every responsible man virtually belongs there—his life should not be merely a preparation for its labors, but a performance of its duties. You are not always to be keeping your armour bright, but brighten it by service. She must employ your thoughts, and your unceasing care. Labor for her interests with an unfaltering and undying interest—labor with patience and with faith, that the pleasing consciousness may attend your journey through life, that you have done what you could, and that you have studied to do your own business. Working thus, and in this spirit, your sun of life will set without an eclipsing cloud, and as it hastens to its setting in the West, though it may lose some of its fervid beams, it will go down with increased magnitude and splendor.

THE TWO COVENANTS.—No. I

"Now, the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee; and I will make of thee a great nation; and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii. 1-2-3:) and verse 7, "To thy seed will I give this land."

HERE are two covenants of promises made, which are clearly and distinctly marked; first, by their respective blessings; and secondly, by the people to whom they belong.

The first promised a numerous posterity, a great and mighty nation, and the land of Canaan as the possession of that multitudinous people. The second promised spiritual blessings of an eternal character.

The first belonged to the seed of Abraham—"I will make of thee a great and mighty nation, and I will give thee and thy seed after thee this land." The second belongs to all the families of the earth—"And in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

When this whole divine communication to Abraham is spoken of in the New Testament, the covenants are always put in the plural number. Examples:—"I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh; who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the promises" (Rom. ix. 3-4.)

The reader will notice that Paul names these covenants as two, and contemplates the giving of the law as a different transaction from the giving of these two covenants. The covenants are one thing, and the giving of the law is quite another thing. Hence the covenants and the law of Moses are not the same. Thus it is clear that there were two covenants made with Abraham, or rather propounded to him, long before the law of Moses was given.

Again, Paul to the Ephesians says—"Wherefore remember that ye, being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called uncircumcision by that which is called the circumcision in the flesh made by hands; that at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise" (Eph. ii. 11, 12.) Here the covenants are put in the plural, and are spoken of as distinct from the commonwealth of Israel, which was the law, or government of the Jewish nation.

But when the covenant which promised blessings to all the families of the earth is named in the New Testament, it is put in the singular number. Example: When Zacharias received the spirit of prophecy, after the birth of John, he said, God was about "to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant, the oath which he swore to our father Abraham" (Luke i. 72-73.)

Here he speaks of a covenant which was confirmed to Abraham by an oath. This was not the first covenant which related to the land of Canaan, and which had long been in progress of fulfilment. Long had the seed of Abraham possessed that land by virtue of the first covenant; but the second covenant, which was to bring blessings to all the families of the earth, was now about to take effect, and to pass into operation.

On the memorable Pentecost, Peter, addressing those who had inquired what they should do, said—"The promise (not promises) is to you and to your children, and to all that are afar off"—to the Gentiles. And Paul declares that, "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Not promises, but promise, in the singular, referring to the second or new covenant.

Wherever these two covenants are named in connection, they always stand in the same relation. The covenant which is confined to Abraham's literal posterity, and the land of Canaan, is always first named, and that which belongs to all the families of the earth is named last. See Genesis xii. 2-3, viii. 18, xxii. 17-18.

These two covenants were the bases of two distinct religious institutions—the charters of two organized companies, the Jewish and the Christian. The first-named is that which passes into operation at the giving of the Law. Up to this time the seed of Abraham had not possessed the promised land. The covenant was dictated by the Heavenly Father, and given into the hands of Abraham for safe keeping, until the iniquity of the Amorites should be fulfilled. See Gen. xv. 16. This covenant of promise was a source of comfort to Abraham, and to all his posterity for four hundred and thirty years before they were brought into possession of the land and blessings which it promised. But now the time has come when Abraham's seed shall inherit the land—when this first covenant shall take effect, and because of the rebellious disposition of this people, God added to it the Law (Gal. iii. 19.) The law was not added to the second, but to the first covenant; not to the promise which contained blessings for all the families of the earth, but to that which secured the land of Canaan to Abraham's family.

The law of Moses bears the same relation to the covenant that the statute laws of a state do to its constitution. The constitution defines the rights and privileges of the citizens, and the laws based thereon are designed to secure these privileges. Hence it is that an unconstitutional law is not binding. The constitution is the charter on which the people stand as an organized body, and the laws are added for the purpose of preventing transgression, and to maintain to the people their constitutional rights.

So these two covenants are the constitutions or charters of two organized bodies, the Jewish and the Christian; and the law of Moses was designed to secure to the Jewish nation all the blessings of the first covenant—the Gospel, "the perfect law of liberty," being designed to secure the blessings of the second covenant to all the spiritual seed of Abraham.

Here I will mention one fact of great significance, and which seems to have been overlooked by most of the wise and learned, in their discussion of the unauthorised practice of infant baptism. Circumcision was joined to the first, and not to the second promise made to Abraham. It belonged to the covenant which secured to Abraham a numerous posterity and the land of Canaan, and not to that which contained blessings for all the nations. Circumcision is first enjoined in the 17th chapter of Genesis, and the promise of blessing all nations in the seed of Abraham, is not so much as named on that solemn occasion. Read this chapter carefully, for it is full of meaning. Why, I ask, is not the promise of a blessing to all families through the seed of Abraham, named in this whole connection? I answer, because circumcision belonged to the old, and not to the new covenant. The literal seed of Abraham was organized upon the first covenant, and not on the second. Circumcision and infant membership belong to the first covenant, and not to the new. Hence when the old covenant and the statute laws based thereon passed away, circumcision passed away with them.

I have already said that the first covenant went into effect at the giving of the law. This is the reason why Paul, in Gal. iv. 24, dates the old covenant at Mount Sinai. Not because the covenant which he calls old was first made there, but because it went into operation there. We have already seen that Paul distinguishes between the law and the covenants. But still, as the first covenant went into operation at this time and place, and as the law was based upon it, in reasoning with the Jews, the Apostles often refer to the terrible scenes of Mount Sinai, the giving of the law, and the covenant, as identical.

THE SINLESSNESS OF JESUS.*

"Now here we see a young man, but little more than thirty years old, with no advantage of position; the son and companion of rude people—born in a town whose inhabitants were wicked to a proverb—of a nation above all others distinguished for their superstition, for national pride, exaltation of themselves, and contempt for all others; in an age of singular corruption, when the substance of religion had faded out from the mind of its anointed ministers, and sin had spread wide among a turbulent people, oppressed and down-trodden; a man ridiculed for his lack of knowledge, in this nation of forms, of hypocritical priests, and corrupt people, falls back on simple morality, simple religion; unites in himself the sublimest precepts and divinest practices, thus more than realizing the dream of prophets and sages; rises free from all prejudice of his age, nation, or sect; gives free range to the Spirit of God in his breast; sets aside the law, sacred and time honoured as it was, its forms, its sacrifices, its temple, and its priests; puts away the doctors of the law, subtle, learned, irrefragable; and pours out a doctrine, beautiful as the light, sublime as heaven, and true as God. The philosophers, the poets, the prophets, the rabbis—he rises above them all. Yet Nazareth was no Athens, where philosophy breathed in the circumambient air; it had neither porch or Lyceum, not even a school of the prophets. There is God in the heart of this youth. * * * Here was the greatest soul of all the sons of men; one before whom the majestic mind of Grecian sages and of Hebrew seers must veil its face."

Men have quarrelled, fought, and burnt each other over the question of Christ's nature, and Christ's teaching or doctrine; but unanimously almost, from the Pope of Rome down to Theodore Parker (from whom our quotation is taken) they have agreed that the character of Christ was transcendently perfect. But, even as the purest marble statue is sometimes seen spotted with the touch of insects, so some of the smallest of the tribe of infidels have touched the perfect life of Christ, and have attempted to leave the mark of their own impurity behind them. But the great body of even unbelievers have knelt before that incarnation of spotless purity, and have acknowledged it to be divinely perfect.

Now this universal homage to the sinlessness of Christ is a remarkable fact; remarkable on many grounds, but especially on this, that the character of Christ is altogether unique, nothing before or since ever having approached it within an infinite distance; and is not only supernatural, but truly and properly miraculous. For that there should arise a being, having the nature of man, and yet not only perfectly free from all actual sin, but free also from the hereditary taint and bias towards sin, while every other individual of the race was a victim to the power of sin, this surely is a true miracle in the most proper sense of that word. Here was an interruption to the natural course of human nature—a suspension of the ordinary laws of human character—and yet men who flout the idea of a miracle in the natural world, who ridicule inspiration as involving a miracle in the intellectual world, have accepted this miracle of a sinless life without hesitation.

It will be interesting for us to inquire, what there was in the character of Christ which has now for him the supreme place he occupies as the Holy One; and then to make some attempt to ascertain what there was in his nature to account for his exemption from the ordinary corruption of human life.

Before Christ appeared, the purest moralists of antiquity had never conceived the idea of such a life and character as his; and now that he has been here, we find it impossible to describe or paint the divine beauty of what he did and said. Painters have striven to put on canvas the countenance of the Saviour; yet we have never seen one to satisfy us, as expressing what must have been in that face. They have given intellectual faces, faces filled with love and meekness, agonized with suffering, faces of feminine beauty, but we cast them all away from us as tantalizing failures, with the feeling that the great original was beyond all the efforts of art and genius. A similar failure waits upon the attempt to describe in poetry or prose, that sublime mind and character. We fall back from our highest conceptions, and own that such knowledge is too wonderful for us; it is high, we cannot attain unto it. A full and perfect sympathy with Christ would alone enable us to present a satisfying portraiture of him; but the depth and range of his sympathies were such as to preclude us from fully understanding his nature. If a hero should write the life of a hero, an artist the life of an artist, a politician the life of a politician, a sinless man would alone describe, in the dialect of a world free from sin, the thoughts and deeds of Christ.

The Gospels are but fragmentary sketches—that is all they claim to be—only one or two incidents of his life up to the age of thirty are mentioned. What a longing have we often felt that we could lift the veil of the daily life at Nazareth during all those years he spent there—that we could see him as a child with other children—whether he mingled as a boy with other boys, and how—and when he became a young man, what were his ways, and habits, and speech, with those around him—parents, brethren, and neighbours. The unwritten life of Christ affords to some minds subjects of absorbing meditation, just because the written life is so full of the grandest interest.

The first words spoken of him and by him in the Gospels, inspire us with a sense of his greatness—yet not distinctively intellectual greatness—for though that was an element of all his utterances and deeds, we feel that it was but the fitting medium to reveal the grandeur of his moral and religious nature. "Wist ye not that I must be about my father's business," was his calm answer to his mother, when she found him in the temple disputing with the doctors. An ordinary youth, of great intellectual endowments, would have come away from such a contest, flushed with the sense of victory over his superiors; but though but little more than a child at the time, he had already apprehended his vocation, and felt the "Father's business" was the great work of life. The religious, and not the intellectual, interest of the incident was uppermost in his mind.

We shall not attempt to prove that Christ was perfectly sinless—we shall assume that, and simply say, that he claimed sinlessness in the challenge he gave to his adversaries—"Which of you convinceth me; of sin?"—and that he produced the conviction that he was sinless on those who had the most intimate knowledge of him. "He was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners." "He was tempted in all points, like as we are, yet without sin." The sting of his betrayer's sin was, that he had traitorously sold "innocent blood." We wish to call attention to some characteristics in his holy life.

1. It was not asceticism. "He came eating and drinking." John the Baptist lived in the desert, had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins, and his food was locusts and wild honey. He only came among men to preach repentance and righteousness, and then vanished from them into the wilderness, to be alone with his own solitary thoughts. But Christ lived among men and women on the freest terms, and sought no fictitious sanctity by shrouding himself in mystery and solitude. He went to a marriage feast—he promoted the festivity of the occasion by making wine when there was no more left. He went to the tables of the reputable and the disreputable—feasted with Simon, and fared with Zaccheus. He formed friendships with the little family at Bethany, and often retired thither at the close of the day. He did not disdain the grateful attentions of Mary Magdalene, even at the house of a rich man. Yet, in all these situations, how easily and beautifully does he blend the life of heaven with the circumstances of earth, and show the way to act on common, as well as on great occasions. He was never dazzled by the splendours of the rich, nor repelled by the miseries of the poor, but was able always to separate man from the dress of circumstances, and to serve him, by speech or deed, as a divine, sinful, immortal creature. Purity and righteousness men usually stand in awe of—and great sinners will not face a man who has the reputation of great sanctity—but Christ, who in human nature? When the brave man gives his shattered arm to the surgeon's knife, will may prevent even the quiver of an eyelid; but no will and no courage can reverse his sensations, or prevent the operation from inflicting pain. . . . So that in every one of these cases — not by the reluctance of a sinful sensation, but by the quivering and the anguish of natural feeling when it is trampled upon by lofty will—Jesus suffered being tempted. He was "tempted like as we are." Remember this. For the way in which some speak of the sinlessness of Jesus, reduces all his suffering to physical pain, destroys the reality of temptation, reduces that glorious heart to a pretence, and converts the whole of his history into a mere fictitious drama, in which scenes of trial were represented, not felt."

How are we to account for the character of Christ—to what must we look for an explanation of the sinlessness of his nature and the holiness of his life? To two things mainly — to his uncorrupted human nature, and to the wonderful constitution of his person.

1. To his uncorrupted human nature. Universal man, with this single exception, has come into the world with a moral nature diseased at its very birth—biassed or bent towards evil in such a degree, that as soon as moral action begins, every individual of the race begins to sin. We may vary the statement of this fact as we please, to suit our different theological systems, but the fact remains. We may account for it in such a way as shall square with our philosophy or theology; but the fact itself remains untouched, as a huge mournful fact in the history of the race. This is what divines call original sin. But now Christ was born into this world as an unfallen being, with a nature free from the universal depraved bias, a perfectly healthy soul, without any germ of moral disease in it. Once more for this world the question was to be tried in the person of Christ, which had been tried before in the person of Adam with such disastrous issue, i. e. —Whether a will created free would surrender or retain its freedom; and this time the solution of the question brought redemption to the world. The second Adam opened the gates of Paradise to a banished race. But still we have to ask the question, how was human nature restored to integrity and soundness in the person of Christ? How came he to be born pure, free from original sin, when all other persons were born subject to it? The only possible answer we can conceive is, that his birth was miraculous. A new special act of creative power was put forth in the production of the human nature of Christ. By no other conceivable means could he begin to be, as man, free from that moral disorder, which was the condition of every other creature's birth into the world. And in this way the Scripture represents this marvellous fact:—"The power of the Most High," in some special sense, is the explanation given of the manner in which he came into existence here. He took our nature as it existed in Adam before he fell; he took our unfallen, not our fallen nature: but as this was out of the ordinary course of nature, it was a miracle of the most wonderful sort we are acquainted with.

This conclusion can be evaded in two ways; either by denying the perfect sinlessness of Christ, or by accounting for his sinlessness in some other way. In regard to the first way, all we have to say in defence of the perfect holiness of Christ is, that if the enemies of Christianity have generally acknowledged it, we are not going to argue for it with the professed friends of Christianity. And as to any other mode of accounting for his sinlessness, we say this—It must have reference to some influence exerted upon the childhood of Jesus; for if he was sinful, even at the earliest stages of his earthly being, we must give up the doctrine of his perfect holiness. But any change wrought upon the moral nature of Jesus, during his childhood, involves the miraculous as much as the theory which assigns miracle to the cause and manner of his birth—and, inasmuch as the Scriptures speak only of his miraculous conception, of his being the Holy Child Jesus, we prefer the record of inspiration to any conjectures on the subject.

2. The perfect sinlessness of Christ is also to be referred to the wonderful constitution of his person. Christ's human nature being born absolutely pure, would be no infallible warrant that he would never, under any circumstances, be guilty of sin. Adam was created upright, and he fell. The possession of a moral nature implies the possibility of sinning. But Christ's nature was not simply human nature, it was divine as well. "God was manifest in the flesh." "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." "I and my Father are one." Now this mysterious union of the divine and human in the person of Christ, is the guarantee that he was sinless and holy. Here are two all-sufficient grounds on which the structure of a perfect human life could be raised—a soul born pure, and sustained pure by the presence of an indwelling Deity.

To maintain that there were no real points of contact between the two natures of Christ, would be to deny the reality of the incarnation; or to assert that the contact was only such as takes place ordinarily between a good man and God, would be essentially a Socinian idea, abhorrent to all the teaching of the New Testament. And yet, if anyone were to ask for an explanation of the real nature of the union, and how it could be effected and maintained, we would honestly tell him we do not understand it, and that we bow down before an awful, impenetrable mystery. We cling to a recorded and evident fact, and abjure all theory on the question.

Affirming, then, the complex nature of Christ—that he was, Son of God, truly divine, and Son of man, truly human, and that there was a real, though mysterious, union of these two natures, we can now account for the phenomenon of such a life as his—beginning, continuing, and ending a perfectly spotless life. Because God was in Christ, the divine upheld and supported the human, and enabled it to exhibit the God-life before the eyes of the human race. Here is the great significance of the life of Christ—a manifestation of God to the world. It was a sublime sight, the spectacle of a perfect man showing us what our nature is when unfolded according to the will of our Great Creator; but He, the Redeemer, who has life in himself to bestow on the morally dead, who is the Truth itself for the enlightenment of the dark, who is the wonder-worker in the regions of the dead, amid the elements of nature, and in the wrecked chaos of man's spiritual being—he is more than the perfect man, he is the God-man—the Mediator between God and man—the Founder of the kingdom of God amongst men—the Sacrifice for the sins of the world—the Resurrection, and the Life, and the Judge of all mankind. May he draw us by the attraction of his love to himself, and assimilate our characters to his perfect life!

CHRIST'S CHURCH IDENTIFIED.—No. II.

"Upon this rock will I build my church."

ARE we to understand that Peter was this rock?—or does Jesus intend to say, upon myself—upon the truth which thou hast confessed, will I build my church? We doubt not, the latter was his meaning.

We are informed by linguists, that a correct rendering of the passage under consideration would be as follows: "Thou art stone, or a little stone, (petra) and upon this rock (petros) will I build my church." That this rendering is correct, and that Jesus did not affirm that he would build his church upon Peter, is, to our mind, quite certain, not only from this rendering, but from the testimony of other scriptures. The church was "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner stone."

"Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation; he that believeth shall not make haste." Peter, in the second chapter of his first epistle, applies this scripture to Christ. And Paul, in the third chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians says: "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." These several scriptures show with the most satisfactory conclusiveness, that Jesus is the rock, the foundation of the Christian congregation. Hence, when Peter made "the good confession;" when he said, "thou art the Christ, the son of the living God," Jesus pronounced a benediction upon him. He had, indeed, confessed that cardinal, that axis truth upon which the whole evangelical system would turn—a truth so comprehensive and momentous, that without the hearty belief and confession of it, on the part of those to whom the Gospel was preached, there could be no salvation.

Seeing, then, that the Scriptural Sonship of Jesus Christ is the grand foundation truth of Christianity, it becomes apparent why it was, that not only Peter confessed it, in order to receive the benediction of Jesus, but why all others were required to confess it, as one of the conditions to be submitted to in order to admission into the church of Christ, and a participation of all the privileges of the reign of Immanuel.

That this confession was indispensable in the apostolic age, is evident from a declaration by Paul, in the 10th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. "The righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise—that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thy heart that God has raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation."

Those who believed in their hearts that God raised Jesus from the dead, believed also in his Sonship, for "he was declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead;" and, consequently, that he was the Oracle of the Father, the True Light, the Prophet, Priest, and King of His people—clothed with all authority in heaven and on earth, to be believed and obeyed in all things. The confession of believers, therefore, is a solemn avowal, not only of faith in Jesus, but of a disposition to obey him in all his commandments. Such the Apostles baptized, and after baptism admitted into the church.

"Let every man," says an Apostle, "take heed how he builds thereupon." Jesus is the grand master builder. He has laid down all the rules of spiritual architecture, in accordance with which this superb temple, the church, is to be erected. He has even done more than this; he has presented a model church—the church at Jerusalem! He has shown both in word and in deed, the spiritual dimensions to which every material should be reduced in order to its constitutional admission into this heavenly building. He has done all things well! But now we press the emphatic question—What sort of a church was this model church?—Have the many thousands of sectarian churches been built after this model?—It is certain that they have not. For, had they been, they would all have been like the model; and if like the model, like one another. We see, however, an endless diversity among these churches. They have all, more or less, added to, or subtracted from the terms of admission into Christ's church. And they have added to, or subtracted from the laws by which the members of Christ's church were to be governed. And they have called their churches by names unauthorised by the head of the church. In other words, the workmen, the preachers, who are commanded "to take heed how they build," have fallen upon the materials which Jesus created for his church, and in a great measure, regardless of the model—regardless of Christ's rules of building—regardless of the examples of the Apostles, who wrought by the dictates of the Holy Spirit, under the immediate supervision of Jesus—calling some of the commandments of Christ essential, and others unessential!—have cut here a mortice where there should have been a tenon, and there a tenon where there should have been a mortice, so that when all the materials are attempted to be brought together from the hands of sectarian workmen, they can in no wise be made to fit into the house of the living God, and the best thing that can be done with them is to sort them for shanties. Reader, you must not think me severe. Let the truth be told, though the heavens fall. I must use plainness of speech. I must tell you the evil that you may shun it, as well as the good that you may pursue it. And I do verily believe, that there is more difference between the church of God, as it would have existed in this age, had it not been for the baleful effects of sectarianism, and the best church in Christendom not built after this model, than there is between the superb mansion and the miserable hovel. For sectarianism is a house divided against itself. It is a kingdom torn by divisions. It is a multitude of factions, expending their energies for the destruction of each other.

CHAPTER IV.

A WEEK has passed away ; a week of bright, sunny days — of cool, dewy nights. Much has taken place therein, and the fair mount of Hermon appears in altered guise. When we last looked upon it, the wheat and barley still waved in golden surges in many scattered fields. In others, the grain already cut, and bound in sheaves, lay piled in readiness to be carried to the threshing floor.

Now the reapers have finished their labor ; the piled sheafs, too, have disappeared from the smoothly-shaven slopes, where so late they grew. The patient oxen have drawn them to the threshing floors, and their heavy hoofs have trodden out the precious grain. Then the winds of heaven blew auspiciously, and the threshed wheat, thrown aloft by the shovel, was separated from the flying chaff, and fell in ruby showers upon the cloths spread to receive it. All day long the air was laden with the cries and songs of the labourers, and heavy with the refuse chaff and dust. Then, at evening, their toil ended, they betook them to joy and feasting. Their lands having brought forth abundantly, their garners being full and plenteous with all manner of store, the wealthy landholders, in accordance with ancient custom, gave a feast to those who had wrought so successfully in their fields. Their oxen and their fattlings were killed ; the well-refined wine was brought forth, and all was gladness and plenty.

But amid the general joy, how few bethought them of their duty to Him who had crowned the year with His goodness ! How few were the knees bowed in thanksgiving to Him for the blessings His hand had showered down ! How few were the eyes raised in grateful acknowledgment to the Heaven whose early and latter rains were given to prepare the earth for the seed—whose fostering dews and vivifying heats were freely shed to nourish and warm it into life, to hasten its growth, to make it meet for the reaper's hand, for the bosom of him that bound up its full sheaves ! True, from the tall groves near the summit of Hermon altar-fires were seen, sending their curling smoke far up into the pure air. But they ascended not to God. Idolatrous hands sent their lurid flames, and the shocking rites of Chemosh and Moloch were there performed.

Yet there were a few who still claved to the religion of their fathers, who still feared the Lord Jehovah. But these raised no altars. Their enemies were the chief. If they worshipped it must be in secret, and without public rites. One part of their duty, however, was faithfully performed. The offering of the first-fruits was punctually rendered. But a day ago, a little train of asses and camels wound wearily up the slopes of Hermon, on their return from the city where dwelt a remnant of the priesthood. These servants of the Most High, forbidden by Him to own lands or tend flocks, were thus mercifully provided for by the few whom He had kept in His fear.

With these Manoah's humble offering of corn, and wine, and oil had been sent. His own beasts had borne it, and his own hands presented it reverently at the appointed place. Returned to his home, he began the preparations for the approaching vintage. The heavy clusters of fruit were fast ripening, and it was necessary that all should be ready for the manufacture of the wine, that it might be ended before his wealthier neighbours needed his services. It was not expedient to lose the benefit of their employment, nor yet to suffer his own fruit to decay ungathered. It was therefore requisite that his vintage should be earlier than that of the larger gardens. It was to produce this end that his wife had been busily engaged in uncovering the clusters hid from the Sun by the too-abundant foliage. Her active hands had nearly finished the work, when on this the last day of labor in the week, she paused at noon to provide her own and her husband's repast.

He was busied in repairing the rude wine-press, which, contrary to the usual custom, was placed at a short distance from the vineyard, in the shaded bosom of a little dell. Thither, after fetching the food from the cottage, she bent her steps. Manoah stood beneath the cool shade of a lofty olive, wiping his heated brow, and gazing thoughtfully into the clear waters of the little brook that murmured along at his feet. The soft breeze lifted the damp hair from his forehead, and must have been pleasantly refreshing; yet his face had a grave, almost troubled look. He smiled, however, as he glanced up and saw Zillah passing the brook by means of a large stone laid in the centre of its bed.

Sitting down at the foot of the tree, he motioned her to besetate beside him. She stood for a moment, and gazed earnestly into his upturned face. Then, as if divining the cause of his gravity, she took the offered seat.

"The day is very warm," he observed, as he rose and proceeded to bathe his hands and face in the clear stream.

She did not reply, but proceeded to arrange the refreshment which she had brought. A white cloth of her own weaving was laid upon the grass, and on this she spread wheat cakes, with a cruse of vinegar, and another of honey. There was also a lump of figs, and clusters of sun-dried raisins. She filled a pitcher with water from the brook, and then both bowed themselves in the usual form of thanksgiving. This ended, they began to eat, yet not with that relish their previous labor should have given. Both were evidently ill at ease.

The meal was nearly finished when Zillah said, "Thou art sad, and I know why, my husband; but dost thou well to despond?"

"Nay, dear Zillah," he said, calmly, "I do not despond as yet; I still hope that our prayer may be answered, and that the man of God may be sent again unto us. But time passes, and he comes not. Why is this? Surely it is not amiss to desire to know what we shall do to the child that shall be born unto us?"

"No, Manoah," she answered, sadly, "but it is not this that distresses thee. Thou hast a secret doubt—unconfessed though it be to thyself. Thou fearest that I was deceived when I thought to have seen one from the presence of the Lord. I blame thee not, my husband, for 'tis a thing to try one's faith. These are degenerate days. There is no prophet in Israel now, and it hath been long since God hath spoken to man. So utterly are we, as a nation, gone aside from His way, that it seems not strange He should forsake us. Yet He hath spoken to me, the most unworthy of His handmaidens. He hath spoken a marvellous thing, and He will surely bring it to pass.

"Hear me, my husband. Last night, as I slept, methought I stood here, even as now. Thou wast by my side, and I talked with thee as I talked on the night when I met thee as thou camest from the harvest fields. I told thee of the angel's visit, and of his gracious words; but I was unto thee as one that prated wildly of mad dreams. And I did plead with thee, even with tears, for one little share of thy belief, but thou would'st not listen, and left me with anger. Then, methought, I fell upon my knees, and did pray that the Man of God might show himself unto thee also. And, even while I lifted up my voice, he stood before me. Oh, Manoah! would that I could tell thee the beauty of that face, the sweetness of that smile, the love that looked out from those heavenly eyes! I essayed to speak, but no words came to my trembling lips. I fell at his feet, and bathed them with my tears; but he lifted me gently up. Then I spoke, and prayed him to give me some token that he had appeared unto me, that thou mightest believe. He smiled again, and said, 'I will give thee this word: fear not, only believe.' Then he was gone, I know not how, and I awoke to see the last star fading out from the brightening sky."

She stood as she spoke, having already gathered the remnants of the repast, and returned them to the basket of woven withes. Manoah had listened in perfect silence, his head resting upon his hand. He did not reply, but rose, after a short pause, and standing before her, gazed long and sadly into her speaking eyes. Then he bent down, and pressing his lips to her forehead, turned in silence to his work. The strokes of his busy hammer were heard as she walked pensively back to the vineyard, after having carried the basket to the cottage.

Manoah, however, gave little heed to the work his well-skilled hands performed so readily. He felt there was more truth in his wife's words than he was willing to acknowledge even to himself. The faith so reluctantly given to Zillah's earnest recital, when it was first listened to, was, now that day after day passed away without an answer to their united prayer, insensibly withdrawn. Her words still rung in his ears, "Doeſt thou well to deſpond?" Was he doing well? Her viſion of the paſt night ſeemed to reprove him with its beautiful leſſon of ſimple faith. Yet that was no confirmation of the reality of the firſt viſit of the angel to her. It was quite natural that ſhe ſhould dream of that which was ſo entirely the theme of her waking thoughts. And its beautiful confirmation of her firſt account was as little to be depended upon. Dreams are apt to paint the fulfilment of that which we greatly deſire. Therefore he truſted it not. He was ſorely perplexed.

His unbelief muſt not be too hardily judged. The thought of his beloved Zillah, ſhe whom he had wedded in the firſt ſweet bluſh of her dawning womanhood, ſhe who had been through all their blended lives the trueſt, beſt of wives, could deliberately deceive him, was never for one moment entertained. He knew her to be perfectly perſuaded of the truth of that which ſhe had declared unto him. It was only the poſſibility that ſhe might be deceived that troubled his heart. The nature of the times, he thought, the idolatry, the almoſt univerſal apoſtacy, made ſuch a thing improbable. He did not reflect that the mercy of God made the reverse of this moſt likely. He forgot the promiſes made to Abraham, to Isaac, or to Jacob; or, remembering them, was too humble to believe they could be fulfilled in a deſcendant of his. While he earneſtly hoped the purpoſes of God might be thus gracious toward him, he could not feel it might ever be.

The Sun had declined half-way from the meridian, when he was roused from a fit of painful abstraction by the conſciouſneſs that his name was being called by his wife in tones of trembling eagereſs. He turned, and ſaw her hurrying toward him, along the edge of a little ſtream. Her every look and movement betokened the higheſt excitement; and there was a world of rapturous joy in her flueſhed cheeks, and almoſt burning eyes. So inſtinct with light and animation was her face, ſo full of eager grace were her rapid movements, that it was as though a baptiſm of new youth had been given her. He ſtood, looking wonderingly at her till ſhe had reached his ſide,

"Oh, Manoah—" but her utterance choked, and ſhe found relief in a ſhower of tears.

"My own Zillah, what hath happened thee?" he aſked, ſtraining her to his boſom.

"Deareſt Manoah—" and ſhe threw back the heavy maſſes of her falling hair, and ſmiled up through her tears into his face; "did I not tell thee? did I not know it would be thus—that God would grant our prayer?"

"Hath he!" exclaimed Manoah, releaſing her in very wonder and amazement. "Hath the LORD ſent His meſſenger again unto thee? Speak, I implore thee! is it even ſo?"

"Even ſo," ſhe echoed, joyfully.

"Tell me, my Zillah, how and when he came unto thee."

"But juſt a ſpace ago," ſhe answered, "as I ſat down, my work being finiſhed, to reſt. I looked up, to mark the height of the Sun, and lo! he ſtood before me. But not as when I ſaw him laſt. He had no ſtarry diadem, no golden-hued wings. Yet I knew him, for there was the ſame heavenly beauty in his face, the ſame celeftial ſweetneſs in his ſmile, the ſame pitying love in his deep, deep eyes. His robes, too, were of the ſame unearthly purity. But though unmiſtakably immortal, he was altogetheer more in ſaſhion as a man."

"And what ſaid he unto thee? Why cameſt thou not unto me, that I might have communed with him concerning the child?"

"Even ſo I did, my huſband. I bowed before him to the earth, and ſaid, 'If, now, I have found grace in thine eyes, ſuffer me, I pray thee, to go hence for a moment, that I may call my huſband.' And he ſaid, 'Go.' Then I ſaid, 'Tarry, my lord, I beſeech thee, till I come again.' And he answered, 'Go in peace.' So I came unto thee, and, behold! he waits my return. Come with me, my huſband, that thou mayeſt ſee, and believe."

With ſteps ſo fleet that he could ſcarce keep pace with them, ſhe led the way to the vineyard. Paſſing through its little wilderneſs of fruit, they gained the upper end. There, beneath the ſhade of a clump of fig-trees, ſtood the Man of God. Above the uſual height, there was a majesty in his form and mien such as no son of earth could have. Yet in the love that beamed from his azure eyes, in the encouraging beauty of his smile, there was something human, something to embolden a mortal to approach him, albeit with reverence. Bowing himself to the earth before him, Manoah spoke :—

"Let me find grace in the sight of my lord! Art thou the man that spakest unto the woman?"

For the first time the hidden harmonies of that voice fell upon the ears of Manoah, thrilling his inmost soul, "I am."

"Hear me now, my lord, and let thy gracious words come to pass. How shall we order the child, and what shall we do unto him?"

There was a tone of solemn authority in his voice, as the Man of God replied : "Of all that I said unto the woman, let her beware. She may not eat of anything that cometh of the vine, neither let her drink wine nor strong drink, nor eat any unclean thing. All that I commanded her, let her observe."

"Yea, my lord; as thou hast spoken, so will we do. Yet leave us not now, I beseech thee. See! the day is far spent."

"I may not tarry with thee," he said kindly, "but must go hence."

"The even cometh on apace; still, if thou wilt not tarry till the morning, I pray thee let us detain thee till we shall have made ready a kid for thee."

"Though thou detain me," he answered, "I will not eat of thy bread. And if thou wilt offer a burnt-offering, thou must offer it unto the LORD."

A desire to know who it was that spoke thus, with so much authority, and yet with so much gentleness; who bore about him so much that was spiritual and unearthly, blended with that which was endearingly human; seized upon Manoah. He was doubtful of his real character, but it seemed most probable that he was a holy prophet of God. Trembling for his own temerity, he said :—

"Let it not displease thee, my lord, that I seek to know thee who thou art. Tell me, I pray thee, what is thy name, that when thy sayings come to pass, we may do thee honor as a true prophet of God."

"Why askest thou after my name," he said, "seeing it is secret?"

"Let me find favor in thy sight, and pardon me if in this I have sinned against thee. But I will sacrifice, even as thou hast said. Rest, my lord, upon this seat, while I run to the flock for an offering."

The Man of God sat down upon the rude bench of stone, and, approaching Zillah, who still knelt in mute attention, he whispered, "Haste thee, now, to the cottage, and bring therefrom flour of wheat and oil, that we may offer a meat-offering also."

They departed on their different errands, and Zillah returned first. The Man of God still sat beneath the fig-trees, and as she looked upon him, she thought there was a halo around him, a surrounding of sanctity to which a mortal might not approach closely. So she stood at a short distance in reverent silence.

Soon Manoah came also. By his side he led a kid of a year old. Upon his shoulders was bound the wood, already cleft and prepared, and in his hand was the knife wherewith to slay the victim. Close at hand there was a natural altar of rock, and upon this he laid the wood in order. Then he mingled the oil and flour, and laid it upon the wood, and signing Zillah to procure the usual censer of coals with which to kindle the wood, he bound and slew the victim; receiving the blood in a vessel held for that purpose. Then he separated the body of the kid, and placed it upon the wood; laying the fat, with the choicest parts, in the centre, and the remainder in order around them. Then he sprinkled the blood over all, and kindling the wood, knelt with Zillah before the altar.

He looked that the Man of God should do so likewise, but he only rose as the flame appeared, and stood by the altar's side gazing up steadfastly into heaven. The Sun was sinking low in the West, and his red rays fell full upon the face and form of their sacred visitor. The fire burned rapidly, consuming the offering, and sending up a thick column of smoke; which, as it rose, was transfigured in the sunlight, and rolled away in a purple cloud heavenward.

It was a beautiful scene, that still sunset hour, with its holy light; that burning altar with its heaven-ascending smoke, an emblem of the prayers its own wings were bearing up to the throne of God ; that noble figure in its long, white drapery, the earnest face uplifted in its holy beauty to the heaven of which it seemed a foretaste. Manoaah and his wife—their devotions ended—looked upon him, and lo ! from his shoulders there rose the wings whose drooping plumes were of a golden whiteness, and over them fell the silky tresses of his waving hair. A bright halo was about his head, and as they gazed it condensed, and formed a single brilliant star over the snowy brow. Then, just as stars twinkle out in the darkening sky of evening, they formed in a dazzling tiara about his head, lending their intense brightness to his countenance, now radiant in its terribly majestic beauty.

The Sun—shrouded for an instant behind a mass of purple clouds—now shot forth his last rays, flooding the earth with their glory. At the same instant a spire of flame leaped up from the expiring brands of the altar. In that golden glow—in that ruddy flame and its cloud of tinted smoke—the Angel of God ascended. For an instant they caught a glimpse of the spread pinions, a flutter of the pure robes, a gleam of the heavenly smile, a glance of those pityingly-loving eyes—and then the angelic vision had faded away into the sapphires of heaven.

For an instant, only, they dared to follow that upward flight with their earthly gaze. Then they fell upon their faces to the ground, and Manoaah knew that he was an angel of the Lord. And he said unto his wife, "We shall surely die, because we have seen God."

But Zillah answered, "If the LORD were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat-offering at our hands ; neither would he have showed us all these things, nor would, as at this time, have told us such things as these."

"Thy words are good, my Zillah, as they are ever wont to be. How has my unbelief been rebuked ! Would I had hearkened unto thy voice, for then I had not thus sinned."

"Blame thyself not, Manoaah ; for doubtless all this hath happened as God did appoint. But let us rather give Him thanks who hath wrought so marvellously for us. Surely thy hand must seek thy neglected harp this night !"

And together they walked homeward in solemn, happy converse ; while the pale stars came out in the pure vault of heaven, and looked calmly down—as calmly on their rapturous joy as they had ever looked upon their bitterest sorrow. And the night winds came down from Hermon's cedar-crown—and sighed amid the dark pomegranates, and softly stirred the mournful cypress. Was it ominous of evil yet to come ? We may not know—but it marred not the blissful present, it cast no shadow upon the joy of those loving hearts.

THE VOICE OF TIME.

THE knell of 1858 has tolled, and the old year has been buried in the measureless depths of eternity, from which there can be no resurrection. How it smiled and promised at our first acquaintance ! How buoyant was hope, and how elastic were our spirits ! It was introduced to us amidst the ringing of bells and the hearty congratulation of friends ; and it was a thing of beauty, full of vigour and life. It was the child of ages, born to subserve the high purposes of humanity. In the spring of its youth it was girt with hope and anticipation, and in the summer and autumn of its manhood it was healthful and benevolent. Flowers and fruits adorned its brow ; it was clothed in light and beauty, and the music of the earth and the heavens fell upon its ears. The shades of night fell softly and gently upon its brow. The golden crops waved in its presence, and the little hills rejoiced on either side. Sometimes its voice was as euphonious as the gentle rill, and as soft as the soothing zephyr. At other times it frowned with its dark cloud in the sky, and the lightning, the thunder, and the storm were indicative of the conflict within. It was terrific and sublime, and nature trembled beneath its power. The storm passed away, and the birds in the light and beauty of the world warbled forth their notes of gratitude and love ; and the Christian bowed his head in solemn prayer, and then lifted up his eyes with gladness, and with a song of thanksgiving he offered praises to God. But the year is passing away, and the splendour of its attire begins to fade. The fresh colours are seared with age—the leaves fall. The varied hues of summer mingle into the beautiful death-blush of the hectic autumnal tints. Its zephyrs are turned into sighs, and the cold sharp winds of winter enfeeble its power. Now its strength and beauty are fled—its time of departure has come—the hoar frost has become its winding sheet, and being covered with the dark pall of midnight, the corpse of the old year has been borne to the grave of ages. What a year of remembrance! How graciously we have been permitted to assemble with the saints, and to hope for the joys of the kingdom! In our small circle, what changes have taken place! Some of our friends are in foreign lands, and some are dead. When the year began, they smiled in the prospect of life. One we cannot forget; she was young and lovely, and the heart of her lover was filled with hope; her education was complete, her conversation most interesting, and her singing accompanied with the piano we shall never forget. In the course of a few months we stood by the side of her grave; and many others have been taken away. During the past year the world has been shaken by war—Vesuvius hath poured forth its stream of fire—Earthquakes have caused millions to fear—the pestilence has walked in darkness—a blazing comet hath pursued its journey through the heavens—the proud have been humbled—riches have fled—dynasties have passed away; but the Word of the Lord abideth for ever. The old year, as a year, is dead; but the thoughts, hopes, and emotions which influenced the minds and affected the hearts of this world's denizens are not dead. They still live with all their spirit-power to humble or to elevate, to curse or to bless. The new hooks of the old year are with us, to advise, rebuke, instruct, and exhort. They speak the language of morality, poetry, and science, and unfold to us the deep utterances of matter and of mind. They draw back the curtain of popular ignorance, and evolve the truths of nature and of God. Those little, cheap, simple books, with the illustrated alphabet, shall speak to our children, and kindle in their fond hearts a love which may never die. The angel of hope shall hover o'er them, and they shall hear the sweet voice of Jesus say, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." The warnings of the past year are not dead; their voices are still heard, and as reflective and responsible beings, we dare not treat them with contempt.

"The air is full of farewells for the dying,
And mournings for the dead;
The hearts of Rachael's for their children weeping, Cannot be comforted."

"Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh." We thought, on the last eve of the year, how quietly it was passing away. Its silence was eloquent—the soul was solemn. Its last moment had come, and while we paused in silence, it noiselessly took its flight. It was a silent departure—no fluttering of the wing or sounding of the footstep—no sighing nor shouting; the wind was still, the stars were hid, and nature seemed bathed in tears. But it was not so, for beyond the clouds the stars shine, and the apparent death of nature is pregnant with life. "Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge." It is now the last night of the year. How cheerful it is within—how cheerless and gloomy without. We love the happy fireside, and the cheerful faces there. How beautiful is the family or friendly circle—how easy and instructive the conversation. There the kindest feelings are reciprocated, minds are improved, spirits harmonize, and impressions are made which cannot pass away. Health and happiness have met together, and the heart of the youth is buoyant with hope. It is well that we do not know how quickly that bright eye may be closed in death. The aged man of fourscore years is watching the old year, and the youth full of hope is watching too. The former says with a sigh, it has gone, it has gone—the latter smiles that the new year has come. I love both the sigh and the smile. Be not too confident, young man; thy grandsire may weep over thy grave. The first step of the old year was connected with life and death. The widow wept in the chamber of sorrow—the father rejoiced at the birth of his child. The marriage-bells rang, and the death-knells tolled : some who with the paleness of death appeared to be on the margin of their graves, are now in the happy enjoyment of health ; while others who were confident and strong, have been captured by disease and conquered by the great destroyer. The aged have been spared still to worship on their staffs, while the young have been enshrouded and entombed. During the past year death has entered our church, and our eyes have been wet with tears. A little time hence, and it shall be said of us, that the place which now knows us shall know us no more. The voice of Him who never lies may have said this year, thou shalt die ; and what we may consider as the sure harbingers of longevity, may prove themselves to be the closing scenes of our mortal state. God, in the beginning, when He created the heavens and the earth, wound up the vast machinery of the universe, and suns and satellites, planets and constellations, are performing their wonderful revolutions ; and without any essential disturbance or manifest change, they will continue to do so until the grand purposes of the Eternal are accomplished. Then time shall be no more. A thousand years in His sight are but as one day, and one day as a thousand years. The past year was but a moment ; our days are but as a shadow : we come forth like flowers, and are cut down. When we were born, nature was rich, redolent, and beautiful ; her songs of joy were heard, and all the daughters of music shouted their anthems of praise. And while we pass through life, the beautiful works of our Creator conspire to make us happy and good. The charming prospective unfolds its exhaustless sources of pleasure. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and the passing clouds are fringed with silver and gold. In the splendour of the rising and setting sun we see the delicate tracings of the hand of Him who is invisible. The flowers which God has made so beautiful, are our gentle guides and loving companions. These exquisite specimens of power, wisdom, and love, were not for food or for clothing ; but for a higher purpose God hath so adorned them. He clothes them with light, impregnates them with heat, bedews them with moisture, arrays them with beauty, and blesses them with life — and for what ? Not for themselves, but for us. The gentle breeze blows upon us like a soft breath from the spirit-world. To me the works of God are always impressive. Time seems to make no change upon them. The grass looks as green as ever, and the light and the heat bear no marks of age. Cohesion and gravitation are as strong and powerful now as they were at first. The hills and the valleys remain the same ; yet all these unchanging things were made for changing and dying man. And when he has fulfilled his mission, their great change will come. But the glories of nature are not worth a thought, when compared with the glories of the cross ; and the splendid worlds which roll in space, are not equal in importance to the beautiful mansions which Christ hath prepared for us in the glorious city of God. I hear the voice of Time saying, “ I shall speedily bring the day, when your grave shall be opened, and the mourners shall go about the streets.” I hear the voice of the Son of Man say, “ I am the resurrection and the life, and he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live.” I can see by faith the mighty angel who will stand, one foot on sea and one on solid land, to swear by Heaven’s Great King, that time shall be no more. And I can hear the welcome words of the Great Judge, “ Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you before the foundation of the world.” We know not how and when we shall die ; but we hope it will be in the midst of our friends, and in the presence of those we love : and when we shall closely approximate to the spirit world, may our hearts be cheered by the presence and prayers of those with whom we have worshipped at the foot of the cross. How quickly this winter will pass away—and how soon the time of the singing of birds will come, and another spring will adorn and beautify the land. But we know not where we shall be. The seasons ever sing the same songs. Time is passing on, and no power can stay its flight. When God created the worlds, it began. It was born with the stars, and will die with them. Desolation shall drive her ploughshare through creation, the elements shall melt with a fervent heat, and the earth shall be burnt up. It shall expire amidst the throbings and convulsions of the universe, and the heavens shall pass away. But we look for new heavens and a new earth. The good hope through grace smiles at the efforts and conquests of time. It views all changes as subservient to its future happiness and eternal peace. And there can be no state of confusion and death, no fearful conjuncture of dread and appalling elements, no din of battles nor rumours of wars, no voice of wailing, of lamentation or despair, unless clearly and distinctly above them all can be heard the sweet voice of the Saviour saying, "My peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you." Time tells me I must die—Eternity says I must live for ever. Time opens my grave—Eternity tells me of the life for evermore. Time shows me desolation and sorrow; vice and crime have stained the earth, and our passage to the tomb is through a world of sin. But the voice says, time is passing, death is at hand, eternity is near.

Oh, may it be to us a blessed change! What glorious scenes await us! What songs of celestial harmony will fall upon our ears! If we be faithful unto death, Christ will give us the crown of life. Saints will be our companions, angels will be our friends, and we shall mingle our songs of gladness with those who have been purchased by the shedding of blood. And there we shall ever behold Him who hath bought us with His own precious blood, who hath saved us and redeemed us, and made us kings and priests to God. Time, outstretch thy wings, and fly away. We wait for the joys which are eternal, for the pleasures which never end—for the glory, the song, and the crown—for the good, and the happy, and the blessed—that we may wave the palm of victory, and tune our heavenly harps to sing for ever the praises of redeeming love. For the glorious Gospel of the blessed God pardons sin, conquers death, and saves the soul.

EVANGELISTS—THEIR POSITION AND WORK.—No. I.

AN evangelist in Scotland seems to be at work with the primitive pattern before him. Ere we bring out any portion of our store of reflections on the subject, it will be in good order to hear our brother from the European side of the ocean. Here are his words:—

"The apostles were the stewards, depositories, trustees of God's grace and gifts to men; and hence the propriety of the use of their hands in the formal conveyance to others of the Divine favors, denoting the Apostles' instrumentality in their forthgoing. Subordinately to them every brother who in faithfulness to the Lord has filled office—that is, done duty—is in a position, in the discharge of that duty, to give charge and commendation to other brethren concerning the doing of the like work on their part. The apostolic office, as the first in the church, and as that given to establish it, embraced all the subordinate or after-duties, or offices. That is, the twelve in being apostles, were prophets as well; they spoke the truth of God by direct inspiration, as well as did Isaiah or Jeremiah. They were also evangelists

—indeed, they were the first or principal teachers. Further, in executing their office, they came to be teachers or prophets in the subordinate sense of the word, for having disciplined men, they taught them the all things commanded; and so Paul says he was ordained a preacher and an apostle, a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity. Still further, their office included the eldership, bishopric, or pastorate. To Peter Jesus said, 'Feed my sheep;' to the elders he in turn said, 'I also am an elder;' and Paul likewise specifying his duties, included 'the care of all the churches.' And lastly, the apostles were the first deacons; the bounty of the church was laid at their feet—they had the charge of it—they were the church's first treasurers and almoners.

"It is thus very plain that the apostles were in a position to ordain or set apart prophets, evangelists, pastors, teachers, and deacons. They themselves had held all the offices, and were the possessors and communicators of all the wisdom and grace necessary to their due fulfilment; and when in the progress of the great enterprise, they found the work too much for themselves alone, and that there were brethren around them who, having been trained under them, were qualified to act; and moreover, that vast regions beyond called for their personal presence as the pioneers of the faith, most evident it is, that they were the parties to give charge to, and set these brethren over the work in its various departments, subordinate to the primary office of apostleship. According to the same rule, the evangelistic office includes in its duties, all those subsequent to, or flowing out of it. It does not include the previous offices of apostle and prophet—these both being filled and finished in the legislation, and instruction conveyed to all ages in the Scriptures of the apostles and prophets. But the evangelist of the New Testament type—the only one deserving the name—does the work of an evangelist, which is not only to preach the gospel, but, on making converts by it, to instruct them in the doctrine of Christ and in the order of his house; and to feed and look after them, or to act episcopally, or as a shepherd, until those so taught and trained by him, are able in their turn to become teachers of others, and duly assume the oversight of the flock.

"And as in regard to preaching, teaching, and pastorate, so in respect of deaconship, the evangelist, as the first in the field—the first in the providence of God in planting the church—is properly its first deacon, as were the apostles the first servants of the primitive church. Since, therefore, the evangelist has had the charge, or done the work of preacher, teacher, pastor, and deacon, for the time being, he is undeniably the party to surrender the charge to such brethren as, having been qualified under his teaching and example, are now prepared to enter severally into his labors, that he may be free to break up new ground. And as a still further item in the divine order of procedure, it is proper here to observe, that should this church, which he has been already honored to raise, be prepared, as it ought, not only now to walk alone, but to send out preachers, as did the primitive churches, the eldership of the church are the persons to commit those sent forth to the favor of God, by the imposition of hands, fasting, and praying.

"This includes the whole procedure, as exemplified in the Scriptures, or in any age, for the forthcarrying of the good work. More or less than this is evil. It is vain presumption for men not possessing the gifts which the apostles actually held, and as actually conveyed by the laying on of their hands, to pretend to give them thus to others. It is also a mere pretence, for men not in actual possession of a post in a Christian church, to commission, or charge others with it; and it is also vain and sinful for men to pronounce the benediction of God on those on whom His malediction rests. But as nothing could be more proper than that, as the apostles were the custodiers and conveyancers of the grace and gifts of God to men, their instrumentality should be recognized by the imposition of their hands: so nothing is more seemly, than that brethren whom God providentially honors in the evangelistic work, should surrender by their own hands, the various branches of the work to brethren prepared in future to fulfil them."

The preceding we offer to the reading community upon the like principle that we offer some other documents, requesting every reader to examine and decide for himself. Certain celebrated men, or rather who afterwards became celebrated, following the calling of fishers in lake Galilee, after casting their net into the water, and drawing out great numbers of fish, gathered and kept all that were good, and threw away the remainder. In all that our periodical net encloses, whether the sentiments be original or selected, let the reader carefully husband what agrees with the infallible standard, and reject all else.

Be it known to every reader far and near, that in expressing our sentiments upon this wide and weighty topic, we fear no scrutiny. It is indeed a conscientious conviction with us, that the period has yet to come for the proper and thorough investigation of the subject on the part of the brotherhood. Yet we propose, agreeably to former announcement, to submit a select bundle of thoughts and Scripture gleanings upon the subject, trusting that among the numerous readers of this work we may drop a little seed that will be prevented from scattering on a thorny field or on rocky soil.

Some good friends, who are both honest and devout, consider it a marvel that we have so long cherished views relative to this large question that have not been brought out upon the pages of this monthly. These beloved brethren do not reflect that it is one of the marks of a working and serviceable teacher to bring out lessons, not only that are true, but timely. A teacher of Greek, if worthy of his post, teaches his pupil to master the Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, before passing to Omikron, or to Omega. In grammar, the parts of speech need to be familiarized before proceeding to the labyrinths of parsing. God, the Father and Teacher of all, kept a secret in his mind for over four thousand years, relative to the salvation of the nations, and wisely made it manifest when the fulness of time came to divulge it; and he has still many a secret to open out to us when we shall be able to apprehend and enjoy them. And it appears to us, and it has so appeared, that elaborate and frequent disquisitions upon the official place occupied by general labourers in the gospel, are quite out of order, while still we have many lessons to learn, for our own sake and others, relative to more simple and primary things.

A word here concerning Scotland's Baptists. If we are not acquainted with the Baptists of our native country, it is very certain that we ought to be. The first years of life we lived on Scotch Baptist milk. Our first whippings for being youthfully rude, were Scotch Baptist whippings. Our first prayers, religious lessons, and professions, were all of the Scotch Baptist stamp. Father Oliphant was, we gladly know, an accredited and esteemed Scotch Baptist for over forty years; and from him, as also from one of the most exemplary Scotch Baptist mothers, we enjoyed a flow of pure Scotch Baptist instruction, a portion of which we expect to carry over Jordan into the land of promise. We claim also to possess some of the best works of the denomination ever written or printed. Likewise, it has been our privilege and pleasure to converse freely and frequently with all shades and degrees of these brethren Baptists, both in this province and elsewhere.

While, therefore, it is quite easy for us to utter the joyous belief that this order of Baptists are perhaps, on the whole, the most worthy people in the wide world, we are not so in love with any people as to blink their shortcomings and imperfections. Glad would we be was there less evidence tending to show that their critical acumen and natural preciseness outstrip their gospel enterprise. Some of the ablest of them would divide a logical thread into forty parts, and then dispute about which part was the biggest. With abundant and well cultivated talent—with a superior stock of biblical intelligence—with rigidly correct religious character—with marked personal devotion—with fearless and uncompromising independence, it is indeed a question if our brethren, the Scotch Baptists, exert more influence in the world, or number more than they did fifty years ago. There are radical causes for this very serious lack of evangelizing success. We enter not into this chapter to day.

A fraction of one of these causes which check advancement, has, we opine, been somewhat conspicuously shown by good brethren in these provinces, since the time that a very talented and well learned brother was permitted to touch with emphasis, a very prominent defect in the Scotch Baptist polity. But putting a stout cloak of charity over this for the time now present, it is every way proper to observe that in cuffing the Baptists of dear old Scotland, the masterly brother Shepard was giving as severe a cuff to a very large majority of disciples in America. This, therefore, on his part, whether his positions were defensible or erroneous, showed both courage and impartiality; for who does not know that so far as congregational policy is concerned, the best samples of disciples in these provinces and in the United States, are simply a second edition of the Baptists of Scotland, with slight emendations?

Never, however, having proposed a defence of friend Shepard, we do not now propose it. He is of age—he can speak for himself. Circles of months previously to the utterance of his sentiments as published in this periodical at the close of 1856, we studied to the full extent of our ability and leisure, the whole question of the ordination, the position, and the responsible action of evangelists ; and finding sundry conceptions in our brother's article very nearly or quite corresponding with our own previous conclusions, it was given to our readers after careful and mature reflection. So far we are decidedly pleased with the result. "No strange thing has happened," if we are able to look rightly over the horizon. If our brother could make a little more stir, it would not, in the long run, according to our judgment, be amiss. Let no helper or opposer think that we are fearful of agitation, provided it springs out of what is avowedly legislated by the Ruler of rulers. A storm in nature is often of greater service than a calm, although at times our feelings are not specially gratified on encountering it. The only question with us, in this case, is, whether many or any of us are sufficiently advanced in "the things of the Spirit" to reap marked advantage from such a storm.

We propose in these papers to develop with more or less distinctness, and sustain the following items :—

1. That the much vaunted independence of each church is a sentiment charged with illegitimate wisdom, and not maintainable by the divine Scriptures.

2. That the phrase "authority of the church" is chiefly, if not wholly begotten by ecclesiastic jargon, and that said authority is not only unscriptural but anti-scriptural.

3. That what we call "the decisions of the church," are to a greater or less extent fragmentary scraps of papal pretension.

4. The evangelists—we mean those taught and at work by the Christian statutes—are in these days as much like primitive evangelists as the scriptural bishops of this age are like the ancient bishops.

Whether any man, or number of men, will seek to take off our head for this sort of heresy, we have no positive evidence ; but of one thing we are delightfully assured, that if our head is to be taken off, we will give it up freely, for we believe in being always ready for Paradise. We have somewhere read, that a man's head is of considerable importance to him ; but there are things, both revealed and yet to be revealed, of far greater importance.

The doctrine of the independence of each church is such a vital misconception, that, notwithstanding our past struggle to break away from it, we would now be surprised, if indeed we could on any score be made surprised, at our former lack of religious wisdom. Take, for illustration, one scriptural representation of Christ's people—a body with its parts and members. Some of these parts, or a few of these members, we shall say, are in Salem, Prince Edward Island, and some are at Brighton, Canada West, and these members are independent members of the body ; that is to say, keeping the figure before us, that there are parts or members of a perfect body independent of some of the other parts or members !

True, even only two persons, the smallest number who can meet for worship, Jesus being in the midst, have the amplest and happiest freedom to enjoy every congregational blessing. But if this be called independence, it really signifies no more than to say that one Christian man is independent, seeing he may freely worship the Lord Jesus on any day, hour, or place that he pleases.

But so radical are we in disowning the democracies and independencies called churches, that we not only look over the whole field from pole to pole to see the one dependent family of living worshippers on the footstool, but when we ascend Mount Calvary, we first look away back to Abel, and then far into the future, to witness the last convert to the Gospel ; and while gazing from this stand-point upon all redeemed, we reflect upon the great bond running from each to each, and the dependence of one part upon the other, even where the links of connection are not visible from some points of view. Not only are all joined together by one Common and Great Head, but it is a most edifying study to observe the Lord's manner of employing men to subserve his designs, and the dependence of laborers and churches upon each other. For instance, we could not wonder if the Lord, only seventy or eighty years ago, made use of a workman in Scotland, whose instrumentality is now being felt in Salem, Prince Edward Island, and Brighton in Canada.

But whence comes this term independence ? From the Scriptures ? Nay, verily. It was born and nurtured in a very dark day. It belongs not to gospel phraseology. It grew up under, or rather was a natural off-shoot from, a church with an earthly head. It signified a step, one short step, in the direction of reformation. We frankly and rejoicingly admit that the term independence, with an ecclesiastic head before us, has not a very bad meaning, though always incorrect; but in view of the heavenly Head, the rightful and authoritative Head of the church, it is, we judge, wholly astray from the mind of the Spirit.

Well do we know that in these British possessions, and in the American States, there is such a peculiar unction in the very word independence, that a person ought to be prepared for a Roman or anti-Roman purgatory, the moment he calls in question its political or ecclesiastic orthodoxy. But really, in all humbleness of soul, we desire to be so loyally attached to the Divine Prince, and so thoroughly in love with his wisdom, as to treat with due indifference the whole host of pleadings in church or state, which virtually hide heaven's volume, more or less, by a surroumdment of popular enchantment. "Whether shall we obey God or men?" —is, with us, the question. It is not our doxy, or your doxy, or their doxy, but bibleodoxy that we seek to approve. Is it possible to deal with due pointedness in reviewing sentiments and denominational, without a single unpleasant or unworthy feeling toward any person or persons? We shall try it. In the name of the Master we shall make the effort. D. O.

THE SOUL WITHOUT GOD CANNOT BE HAPPY.

ON another of my ranges through the forest of reflection and meditation, there rises up before me a councillor of yore—one from whom I have received many a lesson of wisdom and delight—who thus addressed me:—

"When the soul once finds a kindred soul, then beginneth her revelry of delight. Unfeigned friendship, chaste love, domestic affection, pure devotion—who compares the intensity and delight of these conjunctions with a stale and heartless sympathy there is between a naturalist and his museum, or a scholar and his books? The human soul groans in langour till she finds a fellow spirit, or a generous cause of human welfare to engage her affections.

"Even such langour, such a dissatisfaction, finds the soul when, without a guide, she goes to seek God in his natural universe, groping about and unrested, hungering for larger insight, perplexed with difficulties, and finding no end, in wandering mazes lost! How refreshing to such a spirit, when the dark cloud God has retired within bursts, and in visible glory he displays himself to his benighted children, speaking to them in an intelligible voice, and revealing the mysteries of his nature. Then cometh rest, and with rest refreshment and enlargement of soul. There is no cause beyond to long after. Than God, the mind can ascend no higher, and should be satisfied with his likeness. Here there is perfection without a blemish, which we range the world for in vain—justice never perverted, which it hath been the glory of man to live under—mercy, with all the tender affections which pacify and harmonize the life of man—holiness, holding a spotless reign over the happy fields of heaven—all composed and peaceful within that same Being, who is clothed with the elemental powers, armed with the thunder, and served by the army of heaven and the voice of fate.

"Do ye love to meditate on the nobleness of nature? Here it is infinitely noble. Do ye love to contemplate stupendous power put forth in soft acts of goodness? Behold it here, pouring the full river of pleasure through the universe. Here is the Father of all families, from the highest in the heaven above, to the lowest tribe upon the earth beneath, serving out justice and liberality to them all. What would you more to fill your mind with, than the idea of God, which, while it fills, elevates, enlarges and refines? With what ardour men behold their favorites of the present or past ages, aiming generously to equal or excel them. What silent musings over their history, and estimation of their parts! Now, what hinders their rising higher to contemplate the revealed image of the invisible

God! He is not seen—neither are the worthies of a former age. They are written of. He is written of. The one is as lawful an object of thought and imitation as the other.

“Nay, the closer to bring you into fellowship, he hath despatched from his highest sphere the image of himself, to act the divine part among earthly scenes; and seeing we had fallen from his neighbourhood and could not regain our lost estate, hath he sent forth his own Son, made of a woman, made under the law, down to our sphere, to bind the link between heaven and earth, which seemed for ever to have been broken. He clothes himself in the raiment of flesh—he puts on like passions and affections, and presents himself to be beheld, talked with, and handled of the sons of men. He opens up the heart of God, and shows it wondrous tender to his fallen creatures. He opens up his own heart, and shows it devoted to death for their restoration. He stretches out his hand, and disease and death flee away. He opens his lips, and loving kindness drops upon the most sinful of men. He opens a school of discipline for heaven, and none are hindered. Whosoever comes he cherishes with food, fetched from the storehouse of his creating word. The elements he stilleth over their heads, and maketh a calm. He brings hope from beyond the dark grave, where she lay shrouded in mortality. Peace he conjures from the troubles of the most guilty breast. The mourner he anoints with the oil of joy. The mourner in sackcloth and ashes he clothes with the garment of praise. He comforts all that mourn. And what more can we say?—but that, if the knowledge of death averted from your heads be joy, and the knowledge of offences forgiven be contentment, and the knowledge of God reconciled be peace, and of heaven offered be glory, and the fountain of wisdom streaming forth be light, and strength ministered be life to the soul—then verily, verily, this peace, contentment, honor and life is yours, Christian believers, through the revelation of Jesus Christ, the eternal Son of God.

Thus to be brought into the secret counsels of the Almighty, by familiar teaching of one himself Almighty, is an exaltation of human nature only surpassed by the perfect satisfaction which it yields to her various conditions to know things as they are to be, and have no perplexities about the future—this is the resolution of a thousand doubts which were wont to afflict the speculation of man. To have that future filled with life and immortality, honour and glory—this is the conquest of all earthly trials and troubles. To know what is best to be done in every predicament from the mouth of God—this is safety. To know when we have done amiss where to find forgiveness—this is relief. To know in life's embarrassments where to look for sufficient help—this is assurance. In life's disappointments to know a heaven to flee to, and in life's griefs a comforter to repose on—to have, in short, the faculties of our minds directed, and the ambiguities of our conduct cleared up, and our prayers listened to and our wants supplied—this is unspeakable privilege, and the knowledge which unlocks is not only the eternal, but the present life of man.”

Thus ended, I ceased my range for the time being, and concluded that—“the soul without God cannot be happy.”

ETERNITY.

O ETERNITY, Eternity! How utterly vain are all attempts to number the days of the years of Eternity. For when millions of centuries are past, it is just commencing; and when millions have run their round, it will be no nearer ended. Yea, when ages numerous as the bloom of Spring, increased by the herbage of Summer, both augmented by the leaves of Autumn, and all multiplied by drops of rain which crown the Winter; when these, and ten thousand times ten thousand more than can be represented by any similitude, or imagined by any conception, are revolved and finished—Eternity, vast, boundless, amazing Eternity—will only be beginning! And ought I not to try the sincerity of my faith, and take heed to my ways? Is there an inquiry—is there a care of greater, or equal, comparable importance?

THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH.

TRUTH is one of the brightest jewels in the whole string of cardinal virtues. It is the chief corner stone of the foundation of every correct character, whether illuminated with the spirit of Gospel light, or coldly shadowed forth through the mazes of philosophical reasoning. Nothing gives so strong faith of man in man, as a well settled assurance of truthfulness. The man or woman in whose character the truth is kept bright and shining, is always respected and esteemed, and is prepared for every good word and work. Thousands are constantly saying by their acts, what was said of old by Pilate, "What is truth?" They exhibit a carelessness for the truth in their dealings with those around them, for there is truth of deed as well as word; destitute of this they appear as without moral foundation in their character. They may prosper for a season, but the first revulsion in business will stop their credit and destroy their prospects for future pecuniary success. Although persons not remarkable for truthfulness may prosper for a season, yea, may acquire and retain wealth, yet they cannot enjoy it, for in such minds there must ever exist a remorse which will always be a canker on their possessions. Thus while wealth is a source of enjoyment to the truthful man, to the opposite it will be a constant cause of vexation and remorse.

But to be truthful in word, act, and deed—in short, to have the spirit of truth engrafted on the heart—to have that true spirit within us, so that all we have, can be, or do, shall be correct, right, and true—we must endeavour to possess ourselves of a measure of that spirit which our Saviour possessed in its fulness. Let the heart be submitted to his rule, and the soul will then continually grow in the knowledge and spirit of the truth. The spirit of truth will banish from our hearts all burnings and sources of bitterness, so that although we may consider our brother in an error, yet we shall only regard him with pity, and not be led to entertain a feeling denunciatory in its nature and unkind in expression, but should continually exhibit a Christian, a Christ-like spirit towards all alike; towards those whom we consider to be our enemies, as well as those whom we consider to be our friends. While we should concede nothing to what we consider to be error in him who differs from us, yet in the language of Paul, we should let our moderation be known to all men. At times such a course of conduct would seem trying to our faith. Let us try every spirit whether it be of God, for we know that he who has not the spirit of Christ is none of his. However difficult it may seem to us at times to possess our spirits in peace, let no one for this reason ever fail to make the effort. If we have the spirit of truth in our hearts, we shall desire only that the truth may triumph, whether our own preconceived notions are exterminated or stand fast. It is particularly desirable that every difference between Christian brethren should be approached in the spirit of truth with moderation. There is no more just cause of reproach to the cause of Christian truth, than to see those who profess to be actuated by the same spirit, and that the spirit of truth, when they may sometimes come to opposite conclusions in reference to some point in moral or Christian doctrine, exhibit a spirit totally at variance to that of Him who was the pattern and guide of all his true followers. If we are Christians, we shall certainly occupy one common platform in the kingdom of heaven. Are we not taught that the kingdom of heaven is set up in the hearts of his followers in the earth? His church is the visible kingdom in the earth. Let all of his followers have the spirit of truth in their hearts, then Christians will be what they should be, and all will love as brethren.

G. M.

TWO SORTS OF PEACE are more to be dreaded than all the troubles which we may meet with in the world. Peace with sin, and peace in sin.

FALSE HOPE.—To hope we shall be saved, though we continue unconverted, is to hope that we shall prove God a liar. There is blasphemy in it.

THE PENITENT SINNER.

AN impenitent heart may truly be called stony, for it is unproductive of the noble fruits of righteousness. Real penitence is of great esteem in heaven, and ought to be highly prized on earth. It takes the place of that haughty and imperious mind generally possessed by the rebellious. It fits the offender for an obedient and humble return to duty. It prepares the heart to bow submissively to all the requirements of the Gospel. It fits the sinner for entering into the Lord's service with his whole heart. Without it there can be no real submission to the Lord's authority and will. True penitence, or deep sorrow for sin, will lead to repentance, and a consecration of the body, soul, and spirit to the Lord.

Dear reader, art thou a penitent, and dost thy sorrow for sin incline thee to repentance? Dost thou see thy sins rising up as a dark cloud between thee and the Lord, and preventing all hope of life eternal, unless removed from you? Look, then, to Jesus, for deliverance; for he alone can save you from ruin. Give yourself to him, and he will deliver you from condemnation—will save your soul from death—grant you pardon—give you hope and joy on earth, and glory and life eternal in heaven. Dost thou inquire with a sincere and contrite heart, how thou shalt enter into the Lord's service, and how thou shalt devote thyself to him? This is an important point, but a "stumbling stone" over which many fall and rise no more!

To begin the gospel, or heavenly race aright, is of vast importance. Do you inquire, like some of old, what you shall do to be saved? Paul answers, Believe on the Lord, and thou shalt be saved. But believing with all thy heart, wouldst thou learn what to do to be saved from thy sins, and that doom which awaits the impenitent and ungodly? Peter will tell you to repent and be baptized, for the remission of your sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts ii. 48.) Now if thou would'st be saved by Christ, thou must submit to his will in all things. Without an unfeigned faith in the Lord and Saviour, a sincere repentance growing out of a deep sorrow for sin, and a humble submission to his whole will, you can have no real hope of forgiveness. Do not begin to reason with yourself, that some way of your own will do as well as the way which the Lord, by his Spirit, taught through Peter on Pentecost. Think not of being saved by faith alone. Faith without works is dead, says the Apostle (James ii. 17.) Paul writing to the Galatians, affirms thus — "For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision; but faith which works by love." A faith which does not lead to action, is of no avail in the sight of God. Though works have to be done, they are not works of merit, but tests of the sincerity of our faith and repentance, and means of enjoyment. No work that man can do merits anything from God. Do not imperil your soul by persuading yourself, that though the Lord commands certain things to be done, they are not essential to our salvation. The Lord never does anything which is redundant, nor does he command the penitent sinner or the saint to do anything that is not important or beneficial. To say that any of the Lord's commands are not needed, is an impeachment of both his wisdom and benevolence. If thou hast read thy Bible with diligence, and art truly penitent, thy language will be, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and you will be told, like Paul, to arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord (Acts xxii. 17.)

Let, then, the unparalleled love of Christ constrain you to enter his service, and no longer despise his goodness and mercy. No longer labor for the wages of sin, but begin to lay up a treasure in heaven. Enter the Lord's service with thy whole heart at once, for the Lord delights in a willing people. Seek for glory, honour, and immortality by a life spent in the Lord's service, and you shall have them abundantly, without money or price, and enjoy them eternally.

J. B.

Gather instruction from thy youth up, so shalt thou find wisdom till thine old age.

"As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ."

"THEY WENT OUT FROM US, BECAUSE THEY WERE NOT OF US."

THOUGH not a constant reader of your magazine, and for the last twelve mouths or more having seen it occasionally, as I have met with it among the brethren where I have been, I am greatly pleased with the firm, independent, consistent, and at the same time mild and conciliatory course you have generally pursued, so far as I have seen and heard from you. It is one worthy of you and of the great cause in which you are engaged.

You are right in giving no quarter to error, wherever you find or meet with it. By "nipping it in the bud" as soon as you discover it, you prevent it from expanding into those formidable dimensions into which it might soon swell, when it would be far more difficult to eradicate and root them out. When originating and prevailing among the sects, there is not so much danger from it to us. It is when it arises among the brethren, and is advocated by men of ability and influence—men of ingenuity and great powers of address and persuasion—that it becomes of such dangerous character. We have a good criterion to judge by here, as to what is of dangerous character. It is not only the inconsistency of anything with the Word of God, but whatever is calculated to exert a neutralizing influence in reference to the Gospel—to mar its purity in any way, or to destroy its force and power over the mind—calls for our opposition to it in putting it down, and in its destruction. "Every plant," says the Saviour, "which my Heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up." This is not only a truth as regards the certain eradication of error by Divine influence, but it has the force of an injunction or command upon us, to root out everything not having the sanction of God's Word, or which we find to be in opposition to, or inconsistent with it. But to the application of the language of my "text" contained in the caption of this article.

Occasionally a prominent brother seizes upon some speculation—something of the character of which we have been speaking—and commences advocating it, either with the tongue or with the pen, or with both, as the case may be. And it is fortunate for the brotherhood and the world, if he cannot use the pen well; or if he has no periodical at his command, or cannot obtain access to the columns of one—for then the error cannot do one-tenth of the mischief it might otherwise do: because when published and advocated in the columns of a periodical, it may be read again and again, and goes abroad on the wings of the press to spread and extend its mischief over the country. There is not much danger to ourselves or others, in holding speculations of any kind, when we do not go beyond this, and keep them to ourselves. I have speculations myself on the Bible, or on matters connected with religion—religious speculations, I might term them, or perhaps more properly, opinions on many subjects connected with the Bible—and some of them of a startling character to the brethren, were I to indulge them; but as the preaching or publication of them would not be the Christian religion, or any part of it, and as it would do no good, and might do a great deal of harm, I keep them<sup>2</sup> to myself, so far as that is concerned. I might, by preaching and publishing them, get to myself a great name, or rather become notorious, as others have done; but it is a notoriety that I do not seek or want, for it is of no enviable character. "Preach the word," was the solemn injunction or command of Paul to Timothy—"be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine." And what were his reasons for giving him this injunction? We have them in what immediately follows:—"For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they hearken to themselves teachers having itching ears, and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned into fables." That time has come long since, and is now; for no prophecy has ever been more literally and exactly fulfilled. We see it in the very things of which we have been speaking, as well as among the different sects, where it holds as to every departure made by them from the truth. The language of Moses to the Israelites, in reference to the revelations of God, is worthy of our attention now, as it was that of the Jews to whom it was addressed:—"Secret things belong unto the Lord, but the things that are revealed unto us and our children, to do them." This is of universal application—for all time to come—and applies now, under the Christian dispensation, "to us and our children," as much as it did to the Jews and theirs. Whenever a man gets outside of the revelations of God—outside of the Bible which contains these things, of which we know anything—he plunges into a boundless sea of speculation, where he is like the ship without chart or rudder, liable to be tossed about "by every wind of doctrine," "like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed." "What do you suppose the seven thunders, heard by John, uttered?" asked an individual once of an indignant sister. The reply was appropriate: "How should I know," said she, "as the Bible does not tell us." The desire to be "wise above what is written," and to acquire a name and reputation by making and divulging discoveries in religion of what nobody else has ever seen, are the two great sources of speculation and error in religion. And it is something notable, that whenever a man imbibes an error in religion, it immediately takes possession of his mind, like a demon that can't be expelled; and becomes a hobby that he is riding on all occasions—the absorbing thought of his mind, which,

And the next thing is, that the brethren either have to withdraw from him, or he takes the advantage of being cut off from them, and leaves them himself.

When the history of such men—their past life—is examined into closely, it will generally be found that there has always been something wrong about them—that they never were really "of us"—"rooted and grounded in the faith," as they should have been. Hence the language of the Apostle, in reference to them, is generally true to the letter: "They went out from us, but they were not of us," and equally true is what he immediately adds: "For if they had been of us, they, no doubt, would have continued with us." The teaching of the apostles is the criterion which the same writer, John, lays down for us in judging of these matters. After cautioning those for whom he wrote, to "believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God," and giving the reason, "because many false prophets [teachers] are gone out into the world," he lays down this infallible criterion or rule by which to try these spirits: "We [apostles] are of God: he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth and the spirit of error!" J. R. H.

THE PREACHING REQUIRED.

THE age demands, loudly and imperatively, from the public teachers of Christianity, a forcible and impressive style of speech. A preacher who cannot impress, may as well hold his tongue; for his instructions, however wise and excellent, will be as water spilled on the ground. No amount of truth will be of the slightest use, if addressed to sleeping ears. But, on the other hand, it is equally true, that if the preacher can only impress, not instruct, he may as well hold his tongue too; for he impresses to no purpose. Whatever the age may demand in the style of preaching, human nature, in every age, demands divine truth as the one thing which can renew and save it.

ginality, pointed sarcasm, and all other forms or instruments of eloquence, will never compensate for a defective exhibition of divine truth. That truth is not to be snatched up at a glance, from the mere surface of Scripture. It will not reveal its harmonious symmetry and majestic proportions, to a shallow, impatient intellect, even though allied to a fervent and sincere heart. Inasmuch as it is spiritual and moral truth, it cannot be apprehended by mere intellect; but, inasmuch as it is truth, it cannot be apprehended without the intellect. "He that loveth not, knoweth not God:" but it is equally true that we can love God worthily only as we know him. And we know him only in proportion as we know all that he has revealed for himself—of his character, laws, designs and dealings—in his word.

Prose, poetry, history, proverbs, parables, discourses, letters, and predictions afford the ever-varying media through which successive ages made their slow and unequal contributions to the sum of inspired teaching. Truths the most distinct are found inseparably interwoven, and kindred truths widely separated; a law involving a promise, a history veiling a prediction: the casket lying in one book, and the key, a thousand years later, in another. But, to infer from this that there is no systematic unity in Scripture, would be as unwise and unwarrantable as to conclude that there is no system in creation, because the creatures are not distributed, either geographically or numerically, according to genera and species; but as if by chance, or, at most, for convenience and beauty: the whale having its home among the fishes and the sea-weeds, and the humming-bird being placed in nature's cabinet, among butterflies and blossoms.

God is one. His manifestations of himself are infinite—but he is in them all—he cannot be unlike himself, nor can he do the least act, or produce the smallest work, but what is worthy of himself, and bears the impress of his infinite wisdom, and is by the very fact in necessary harmony (whether our dull eyes and ears can discern it or not) with all things else in the universe.

TRUE HAPPINESS.

To be happy is the universal desire of the human family. All the pursuits in which they engage are prosecuted with an aim, that in the future they will bring true happiness. There is a vacuum in the human mind, which can only be filled by being in possession of this felicitous boon; and it is this aching void that causes man to seek so diligently for happiness. But notwithstanding it is so universally sought, and so laboriously toiled for, yet it is obvious that there are many who never obtain it; but while seeking it their hopes are crushed by disappointments—gloomy shadows of sorrow eclipse their beacon light, and their frail bark is wrecked on the ocean of despair. But they seek it not in that channel alone through which true happiness can flow, and through which it must be sought, if it is ever to be enjoyed. That it was the design of the author of our existence, that we should enjoy happiness in this life, is attested by the adaptation of things that are created to afford pleasurable emotions, when intelligently contemplated. Scenes beautiful, grand, and sublime, are ever presented to the eye—music, soft and harmonious, from the unnumbered voices of both animate and inanimate nature, is ever falling on the listening ear, to soothe and delight the mind, and elevate the thoughts to a higher life, where unalloyed happiness is alone to be enjoyed.

But there are many who live and move in the midst of these heavenly gifts, and are yet strangers to the purifying influences they have upon the heart, and the happiness they were designed to afford here. They search far and wide for happiness, and toil unremittently to gain it. Some will peril their lives on the ocean's boisterous waves, and delve deep for the hidden treasures of earth, hoping to purchase this priceless gem with wealth. Others seek it within the walls of fame's alluring temple. But earthly honors cannot satisfy the longings of the soul, nor give that sweet peace of mind which they so much desired.

But there is still a more deluded class, who seek for happiness in the haunts of pleasure, and in the fascinating charms of evil. But to them it proves like the deceptive mirage to the weary traveller: they view it in the distance—they admire its charms—but when they wish to approach it, it vanishes from their sight, leaving them surrounded with nothing but the unfertile plains of the arid desert. Vain, deluded creatures! searching in the distance for that which is within their grasp—strangers to the fact, that true happiness is indissolubly connected with virtue, and that it is the virtuous alone who can enjoy it—that sin, in its varied forms, is the cause of all unhappiness, and that the soul which is conscious of guilt cannot enjoy undisturbed repose.

QUERIES AND REPLIES.

THE WORD "PNEUMA."

Please give us your views of John iii. 8. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof; but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit."—R. S. N.

The Greek word Πνευμα (pneuma) here translated wind, occurs in the New Testament some 384 times. 382 times it is rendered in the Common Version, "Spirit," or "Ghost," which means the same thing. Once it is rendered "life," Rev. xiii. 15, "And he had power to give life to the image of the beast," &c.—But in this text any one can see that "Spirit" would suit the sense of the passage just as well as life. And once only it is rendered "wind," and that is the text to which you refer.

Now the word πνευμα, simply means Spirit, and we affirm that it is never used in any other sense in the New Testament. The word occurs five times in the conversation of Christ with Nicodemus; four times our translators have rendered it Spirit, and once wind. There is, however, no authority for this change in the context, or in the meaning of the word.—Jesus gives Nicodemus no intimation of such a change in his meaning.—We therefore affirm that it should be translated Spirit in the 5th verse, as in the 382 other places where it occurs in the New Testament, and not wind; as it is never used in that sense. To understand the passage we must have a better translation than the King's translators have given us. We would render the whole passage thus: (Following an able translator.)

"Jesus answered: Truly I say unto you unless a person be born of water and the Spirit (that is, be born of water, having been begotten by the Spirit) he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is begotten of the flesh is flesh, and that which is begotten of the Spirit is spirit, (i. e. is spiritual, and fit to enter the kingdom of Christ, which is spiritual.) Wonder not that I said, you must be begotten from above. The Spirit breathes where he pleases, and you hear his voice, but cannot tell whence he comes, and whither he goes; so is every one who is begotten of the Spirit."

With this rendering, which we think every scholar will admit to be correct, we think the passage is not difficult to be understood. Nicodemus, though a master in Israel, was entirely ignorant concerning Christ and his mission; yet he came to Jesus saying, "we know that thou art a teacher come from God, for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him." He had heard the report of the miracles which Jesus had done, but it is not likely that he had witnessed any of them. The answer of Jesus charges his ignorance upon him—he did not know what he claimed to know. Before he could know it he must be born again. The ruler is surprised, and Jesus explains the matter further to him. A person must be begotten of the Spirit, and born of water, or he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is begotten of the flesh is like its father, fleshly, and fit only to enter a fleshly family, as was the Jewish family; but that which is begotten of the Spirit, is spiritual like its father, and prepared when born of water to enter into the spiritual family, the church of God.

"The Spirit breathes where he pleases, and you hear his voice." The Spirit breathed in the Scriptures, and in the words and miracles of Christ, and his voice was heard in both. Yet Nicodemus did not know what he claimed to know. J. M. MATHES.

THE CONTENTION BETWEEN MICHAEL AND SATAN.

Will you give us an explanation of Jude, 9th verse? What did Michael and the Devil dispute about?—C. A. D.

The precise nature of the controversy has never been made known, we believe. We cannot, therefore, speak with certainty. We are informed, however, from what is said in the Old Testament, that the Lord, for some wise reason hid the body of Moses, so that the people knew not where it was. (See Deut. xxxiv. 6.) "And he buried him in the valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor; but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." Now we infer, that Michael, the arch-angel, superintended the burial of Moses, and that he hid it lest the people should commit idolatry, to which they were very much prone. The devil wanted to show the children of Israel where his body was, so that they might get possession of it, and commit idolatry by worshipping it, and thus incur the divine displeasure. The angel opposed his design, and hence they contended "about the body of Moses." But Michael said to him, "the Lord rebuke thee." And he was rebuked, and failed of his object, as "no man knows of his sepulchre unto this day." This, we think, was most likely the merits of the controversy. J. M. M.

IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

Do the Scriptures teach that all men, both righteous and wicked, have an immortal soul?—J. D.

The word immortality is generally understood and used to mean nothing more than never-dying. The words soul and spirit, too, are generally used by those who discuss this subject, as two words for the same idea. In this sense, then, they often speak of the "immortality of the soul," meaning no more, than that man has a never-dying principle within him. Now using these terms in this loose sense, we believe the doctrine; that is, we believe that all men, both righteous and wicked, have in them a never-dying spirit.

But we do not find the word immortality, any where in the Scriptures, applied to the wicked. In fact, immortality is not predicated of the soul at all, but always of the body, where man is referred to. Christians are not immortal in this life—but Paul says they will put on immortality at the resurrection. He says: "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality" (1st Cor. xv. 53.) This evidently refers to the resurrection of the body, and is represented as a putting on of immortality.

Again, he says: "To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honour, and immortality; eternal life" (Romans ii. 7.) From this it is quite evident that none, not even the Christian, possesses immortality in this life, but they are to seek for it. Once more. The Apostle represents Jesus Christ as only possessing immortality to bestow. He says: "Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto" (1 Tim. vi. 16.) From all of which we learn, that immortality is to be sought for in this life, and obtained at the resurrection of the body. The wicked will not obtain immortality, though they will continue to live in utter darkness, away from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power.

MIRACLES IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

Please to give us your views of James v. 13-15.—P. B. M.

James is writing to the brethren in the dispersion. They were scattered abroad among the heathen, where they were suffering great opposition. The apostolic age was an age of miracles. These miracles were performed not only by the Apostles, but many of the disciples enjoyed the gifts, and were able to demonstrate the truth of the gospel which they proclaimed. Therefore, says James:

"Is any among you (Christians) afflicted? Let him pray. Is any merry? Let him sing psalms. Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick person, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."

There is no question in our mind but this was a miracle, and belonged to that age of wonders and signs, and was not intended to be continued beyond that age. A few disciples scattered abroad among the heathen get together, and organize a congregation. They become the subject of remark and ridicule, and even persecution. But one of them falls sick, and the elders of the church are sent for; the thing is noised abroad, and their enemies assemble to make sport of them. They know there is no virtue in the oil to heal the sick. All look on with intense curiosity as the elders proceed. The man is nigh unto death, but the prayer of faith is offered for him; that is, miraculous faith such as would remove mountains "as a grain of mustard seed." He is at the same time anointed with oil in the name of the Lord. What is the object of all this? A mighty miracle is about to be wrought for the confirmation of the truth. Suddenly, the man who was on the crumbling verge of the grave is made whole! Health and life again course through all his veins! "The Lord shall raise him up." The hitherto unbelieving crowd stand amazed. The miracle is complete, and they cannot gainsay it—the Gospel is confirmed, and this little community of disciples is proved to be the church of the living God.

But this arrangement passed away when "knowledge vanished away."—"Prophecy failed," and "tongues ceased." And the elders of any church might just as well try to speak with tongues that they had not learned, as to enact this miracle in the present day.

JOB AND HIS TIMES.

Is the Job mentioned in Genesis xvi. 13, the same Job who bore his afflictions so patiently in the land of Uz? The general opinion is, I believe, that the man of Uz lived in patriarchal times, and as there is no allusion in the Book of Job to the bondage of the children of Israel in Egypt, or their deliverance, he must have lived before that event.—J. L. T.

We do not suppose that the Job of Gen. xvi. 13, was the same as the man of Uz. The Job spoken of in this text, was the grandson of Jacob, and son of Issachar. But in the margin his name is given as "JASHUB," which is, perhaps, the true name, and not Job. The man of Uz certainly lived, and flourished, and suffered long before that time. He was most likely a contemporary of the patriarch Abraham, if not one of his sons by Keturah, his second wife. (See Gen. xxv. 1-6.) It is true Job's name does not occur among the names of Keturah's sons; but he might have changed his name after he went to the land of Uz, or the East, as the names of many of the patriarchs were changed, as Shem, Abraham, Jacob, and others. To us this seems rather probable, but we do not therefore agree to prove it.

Those who wish to examine this subject fully, are referred to the Book of Job, translated by Professor T. J. COLEMAN, with a preface which we inserted in our pages some few months ago, and published by the Bible Union.

CORRESPONDENCE.

INFLUENCE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

To the Editor of the Millennial Harbinger.

In this month's number of the Harbinger are two communications upon subjects in which I feel specially interested; one signed "James Adam," on "The Operation of the Holy Spirit," in reply to the article of D. O.; the other signed "Inquirer," on "Presenting Prayer to Jesus." I understand it is the doctrine of yourself as of some others—if not all of the living teachers in the reformation, with which I consider myself identified—(the errors of some of its teachers notwithstanding) that the Holy Spirit operates only through (as distinguished from with—or accompanying) the Word:—that all the influences of the Spirit are exerted, and the effects produced—by means of the Word—as by a sword or hammer in the hands of a man.* Now, my dear brother, I must confess—that upon this, as well as the other subject,—I am so dull of apprehension, as not to have attained to the knowledge professed by some of our brethren. I am somewhat slow to believe all that our great men have written and spoken—because I find that great men have generally their peculiar "hobbies," which they often overdrive. It is the tendency of extremes to beget extremes—and experience teaches, that great men, in trying to correct one error, often fall into another. In their efforts to get straight, they lean a little the other way. I have a strange presumption that D. O. is one, whose Christian society I have enjoyed in bygone days, on the other side the Atlantic; and I understand that his sentiments upon the influence of the Spirit, are those held at Bethany. I have not leisure for writing long letters, but will just make a remark or two, in the hope that others more gifted and less engrossed in secular matters, will discuss the subjects more at length. I can understand the physical principles upon which a man acts upon matter, by means of a sword or hammer; and I can perceive a propriety in applying the figure to the operation of mind upon mind, through the sole means of written words. It would be a good figure of speech, though not a philosophical explanation. Every one who writes a book thus acts upon mind through written words, as by a sword or hammer; or to use another figure—not a philosophical demonstration—a writer's "spirit clothes itself with motives and arguments," and thus "enlightens, convinces, persuades." All these operations we may comprise in the term "moral suasion." Is it indeed true, that the Holy Spirit does no more than the writer of a book, for if there be nothing more done, I can see nothing more in his operation than "moral suasion?" I know that the beloved and esteemed brethren, who advocate the view referred to, believe there is something more than "moral suasion." They probably pity those whose obtuse intellects cannot perceive anything more than "moral suasion" in their theory. But such obtuse, slow people there are; and I am one of the number. I cannot see how agencies, confined to words as their instrument, can amount to more than "moral suasion." It is not necessary that we should be able to describe or define the superadded power; there are many powers in nature which we cannot describe or define, whose existence is nevertheless apparent. The reality of a superadded power—of something beyond mere words or arguments—cannot, I think, be disproved by our knowledge of "the constitution of the human mind," because I conceive no human being fully understands "the constitution of the human mind." It is a subject too mysterious for human ken. In the relations of mind with mind, and with spirits good and bad, there is much that is far beyond human comprehension. "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it"—"As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child; even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all" (Eccles. xi. 5.)

* From what source Bro. Wraith obtained a knowledge of our faith as to the Holy Spirit, we are at a loss to know. The terms "influence," or "all the influences" of the Holy Spirit are not found in the Bible, and therefore form no part of our creed. We rely on the power, wisdom, love, and purity of the spirit, but never of his influences.—J. W.

With regard to "presenting prayer to Jesus," I wish to be enlightened; but it appears to me, that all I have yet seen adduced as proof of the negative, falls short of proof. My own feelings would indeed be greatly violated, should I become convinced that I am forbidden to seek succour from Him who having "suffered being tempted, knows how to succour those who are tempted" (Heb. ii. 8)—that when approaching the "throne of grace," where Jesus sits, to seek "grace to help in time of need," I am forbidden to appeal to Him who can "be touched with the feeling of our infirmities," and "was in all points tempted like as we are" (See Heb. iv. 15-16)—that I am forbidden to worship Him who is "over all—God blessed for ever—Amen" (Rom. ix. 5.)

In your remarks on the communication of "Inquirer," you refer us to "the model" which the Apostles employed, after they were filled with the Holy Spirit, as recorded in Acts iv. 23-30; but what, may I ask, is the ground for adopting this as the, rather than a model? Why is Stephen's short prayer, recorded in Acts vii. 59, not to be considered also as a model? What do you understand by the Apostle Paul's speaking with approbation of "all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord?" (1 Cor. 1-2.) How do you understand "at the name of Jesus every knee should bow?" (Phil. ii. 10.)

Time forbids me to say more at present: I have written thus, for the hope of inducing others more able, and more at leisure, to take up the subjects. We have heard much at different times on one side—I, for one, should like to hear something more on the other. Among other things, I have never yet been satisfied with the theory of "Heart Opening," by "The Speaking of the Truth," in order to gain attention to the speaking of the truth, as in the case of Lydia. As the case is recorded, Lydia's heart was not opened, in consequence of attending to the truth spoken by Paul; but she attended to the truth in consequence of a previous opening of her heart.

Hoping you will not take any freedom amiss, and assuring you I write only with the desire to elicit truth, I remain, yours with Christian love,

THE WORK OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

To the Editor of the Millennial Harbinger.

THIS subject seems to be engrossing the minds of some, as if we were to look for new revelations, or to believe that the great work of human redemption was not perfected before the Apostles of our Lord and Saviour ceased to be. Not that they perfected the means, but that all things necessary to life and godliness were made plain by their labors, is an undisputed fact. So that in the New Testament Scriptures we have the whole mind of the Spirit, the mind of Jesus, the mind of God. Our Bro. Adam, in expressing his views on this subject in the January Harbinger, apprehends that the darkness and strife prevalent among professing Christians is owing to the Spirit being quenched in their midst. We allow that the Scriptures of Truth contain the whole mind of God. To heal these divisions, then, and dispel the thick darkness, we must all have recourse to the illumination which the Spirit gives through that medium. But he asks how does the Spirit work now? and answers it by saying—precisely as in the days of the apostles. Allow me to add, if properly understood. Not miracles by the hands of living apostles, though the signs and wonders done by the hands of the Apostles of the Lamb, exhibit and will tell to latest generations, the heavenly nature of this work. The Apostles were the agents of the Spirit, as Jesus was of God, and the Spirit of Jesus, to convince the world of sin; so that faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God. This is precisely how the Spirit works now, as it did then. The field is the world—the seed is the Word of God—received into the heart, its operations are there, quickening the dead soul, and imparting a new life, which grows and produces fruit to the glory of God's great name.

The new economy has no special anointing by the Spirit of the servants of Christ, to do his will. They have the words of truth dwelling richly in their hearts, that they may be able to shine as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life. The baptism of the Holy Spirit participated in by the apostles and first Gentile converts, fulfilled the prediction, "I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh," and conveyed an impartation of power. There is no other anointing of the Spirit, but by the hands of the Apostles conferring gifts, throughout the whole New Testament record. But the Spirit of God is not quenched, for it still acts through the servants of Christ, in the living voice of the preacher, pointing out the love of God embraced in the Gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, and by the daily walk and conversation of those who fear God and keep his commandments.

With reference to those in other communities of whom our brother speaks, who may be enlightened and high in the kingdom of God, it is our duty to show them the door whereby they may enter in, and find rest to their weary souls. We dare not make a breach in the wall to afford them admission, but show them, in the words of our Lord and King, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be condemned." J. MORRIS.

MR. BINNEY ON CHRISTIAN UNION.

To the Editor of the Millennium Harbinger.

THE "illustrious visitor," as he is called, T. BINNEY, has been in Australia some time, and in connection with him the subject of Christian Union has been mooted, eliciting much discussion in the public papers. I regard Mr. Binney rather as an architect than "a wise master-builder." It is not uncommon for architects to build splendid castles in the air, or on paper, which the wise master-builder finds altogether impracticable. So I think of his scheme for union amongst Christians. Let them unite as they are, keep their respective doctrines and systems of government, but let there be an exchange of pulpits by the ministers of the various denominations. Thus he advises, but what a babel it would be. Already there is no small clatter made by some who are contending for keeping time by the "old church clock," which, however, is not so old as the Apostles. But as the subject is being well sifted, it must result in good, and the truth will perhaps dawn on some minds. Our Governor headed a petition for the purpose of obtaining a consecrated building, a church pulpit, for Mr. Binney, which, of necessity, fell to the ground, as being opposed to the ecclesiastical laws and traditions of the State Church. How can a dissenting minister, who has never had the hands of an Anglican bishop on his head, preach in a church, a consecrated building? Verily, I don't know which is the greatest hoax, consecrated houses or apostolic succession. In the course of our discussions on this question, the following conversation took place:—I think we have in the Scriptures the basis of union.—Yes, no doubt we have, if we could find it.—Well, say that Peter's confession is that on which Christ will build his church.—Yes, but then we have all the opinions, forms, and governments; what are we to do to get union here, baptism for instance?—Well, of baptism, do you think with me, that to immerse a believing penitent is Christian baptism.—Yes, unquestionably.—Then, as you are so anxious for union, just regard me as a weak brother, because I cannot see so far as you can in respect to infant sprinkling, and we may then unite on faith and obedience; and here I submit is the bone of contention.

But no, they will not let me be a weak brother, yet if their's is truth I must be : for I cannot, for the life of me, see it.

In the hope that the theory of uniting denominations, as such, and calling it Christian union, will lead to a "thus saith the Lord," or an apostolic example, for the faith and practice of all who love our Lord in sincerity and truth, I remain, your's in Christ,

H. WARREN.

ON PRAYER TO THE HOLY SPIRIT.

To the Editor of the Millennial Harbinger.

LOOKING upon your periodical as one of the most unfettered of the present age—in whose pages important scriptural subjects are freely discussed in the spirit of charity, and apparently with a strong desire to elucidate and bring out the real truth—I am induced to ask your opinion, or the opinion of any of your able correspondents on the above subject. I am a truth-seeker, and having received enlightenment on various topics from the perusal of the Harbinger, I would desire to ask, Whether it is scriptural, and therefore proper, to address our prayers and praise to the Holy Spirit?

I am perfectly aware that such a question, in the estimation of some, may appear very strange, may seem tinged with Unitarianism, Arianism, or some other "ism." But I trust that we are so far removed above what people may think—so prepared to look at all questions full in the face, as not to shrink from asking a question of this nature. From my own inquiry and observation, I find there are many Christians who, on this point, are quite unsettled, and who cannot therefore conscientiously join in prayer to the Holy Spirit.

It is needless to remark, that among all professors—at least among all those who hold what are called "orthodox" sentiments—it is quite customary to address the devotions as well to the Holy Spirit as to our Heavenly Father. It is, indeed, often the case, that in a long prayer—for Christians are sometimes compelled to suffer such infliction—more petitions are addressed to the Spirit than to the Father. How often we hear the Spirit implored to come down—to take possession of the soul—to go from heart to heart—to prepare the mind for the reception of the seed about to be sown—to make men willing to submit to the Gospel, and to come to the Saviour—and other similar petitions. A whole hymn is sometimes addressed to the Spirit—such as, "Come Holy Spirit, on Thee we call," &c.—"Come Holy Spirit, heavenly dove," &c. And if in a place of worship where such devotion is offered, and such hymns are sung, there happen to be one who is undecided as to the scripturalness of such worship, how strange that worship appears; he is apt to say, "Who hath required this at your hands?"

On this theme, as on all like themes, we have to resort, not to human opinion or practice, but to that word which is the lamp unto our feet and the light unto our path. Our reason, it is very true, might lead us to the conclusion, that prayer to the Holy Spirit is perfectly proper. We might, as of course most professors do, reason thus:—Prayer should be offered to God, the Holy Spirit is God; therefore, we may and ought to pray to him. But have we any instances, any examples in the Bible of such prayer? Are there any commands to such a duty? Do we find any of the saints of old making use of such prayer?

If we examine the Old Testament, we find the Spirit very frequently mentioned, but, so far as I am aware, we never find any invocation to the Spirit. David prayed for the Spirit, but I am not aware that he ever prayed to the Spirit. He said, "Take not thy Holy Spirit from me"—"Uphold me, with thy free Spirit"—"Whither shall I flee from thy Spirit?" But this language was not prayer to the Spirit.

If we come to the New Testament, our Great Teacher and example is Christ, and, though he was filled with the Spirit, it is quite certain he never prayed to the Spirit. He was a man of prayer.

"Cold mountains and the midnight air, Witnessed the fervour of his prayer."

Yet truly to the Father do his petitions ascend. No supplication, no earnest cry, no intercession is offered to the Spirit. In the same way he taught his disciples. He told them to say, "Our Father."

We are not aware of any instance where the Apostles prayed to the Spirit, or taught their followers to do so. Paul says to the church at Corinth, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, be with you all;" but we can hardly regard this as a prayer.

If, therefore, we find in the Bible no precept nor example in regard to this subject, is it proper that we should address our prayers to the Holy Spirit? While it is scriptural, and therefore proper, to pray for the Spirit—to implore the Father to fulfil his promise, and to bestow upon us his Holy Spirit—is it not unscriptural to supplicate the Spirit itself? Does not, in fact, such supplication tend to bewilder the mind, to cause confusion, and thus in some measure to quench our spirit of piety?—Your's, &c.

NOTES AND CRITICISMS ON PASSING EVENTS, &amp;c.

DICHOSTACY.

EXTREMES sometimes meet. The Rev. T. Binney, who has intimated that "the Church of England ruins more souls than it saves," is the very person that the Bishop of Adelaide longs to enclose in his own pulpit, yet he must not admit him there because Mr. Binney's mission is "the offspring of division," and his church system "dichostacy." But some of our readers will ask for information concerning this (to them) new evil. The Bishop, however, is not dealing either with a new word or a new thing. The Greek dichostasia is found in the New Testament three times, and is twice translated divisions and once seditions. Romans xvii. 17, "Mark them which cause divisions." 1 Cor. iii. 3, "Envy, and strife, and divisions." Gal. v. 20, "Emulations, wrath, strife, and seditions." It means literally "a standing apart." But let us have a portion of the Bishop's letter to Mr. Binney:—

"I am truly glad that so considerable a person as yourself should, by your presence in this colony, have forced me to consider again the question, 'Why I could not invite you to preach to our congregations;' to review my position, principles, belief, and prepossessions, more especially as the absence of sectarian prejudice on your part, and the presence of all that in social life can conciliate esteem and admiration, reduced the question to its simple ecclesiastical bearings.

"Again and again the thought recurred to me, Talis cum sis utinam noster cases!* Still I felt that neither the power of your intellect, nor vigour of your reasoning, nor mighty eloquence, nor purity of life, nor suavity of manners, nor soundness in the faith, would justify me in departing from the rule of the Church of England; a tradition which declares your orders irregular, your mission the offspring of division, and your church system — I will not say schism, but dichostasy.

"But while adhering to this conclusion,

I am free to confess that my feelings kick against my judgment; and I am compelled to ask myself, is this 'standing apart' to continue for ever? Is division to pass from functional disease into the structural type of church organization? Are the Lutheran and Reformed, the Presbyterian and Congregationalist, the Baptist and Wesleyan bodies, to continue separate from the Episcopal communion, so long as the world endureth? Is there no possibility of accommodation, no hope of sympathy, no yearning for communion? Will no one even ask the question? None make the first move? Must we be content with that poor substitute for apostolical fellowship in the Gospel, 'Let us agree to differ;' or an evangelical alliance which, transient and incomplete, betrays a sense of want without satisfying the craving? Or are we reduced to the sad conclusion, that as there can be no peace with Rome so long as she obscures the truth as it is in Jesus, and lords it over God's heritage, so there are no common terms on which the evangelical Protestant churches can agree, after eliminating errors and evils, against which each has felt itself constrained to protest?"

More of the letter we have not space for, as we desire to notice several important items. The Bishop sees—

1. That denominational coöperation, and agreement to differ are distinct from Christian union, may, and do exist without it.

2. That the boasted Evangelical Alliance is transient, incomplete, and that it "betrays a sense of want without satisfying the craving."

3. That Baptists, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Congregationalists, and Wesleyans, are not one body, but bodies separate.

4. That "standing apart" is sinful and lamentable, and he therefore asks whether the Lutheran, Presbyterian, and other bodies, "are to continue separate from the Episcopal communion so long as the world endureth?"

The Bishop hints at a plan by which the various distinct sects may be incorporated with the Church of England, so as to become one visible communion, while Mr. Binney, putting no faith in visions of the future, asks that what can now be done may be done, and calls for an exchange of pulpits. A leading Baptist organ on this point says, "The Dissenter is ready enough to admit him (the Churchman) to his pulpit, but he will neither preach for the Dissenter, nor let the Dissenter preach for him." Well, we are very sorry for the Dissenter—sorry that he should be ready to preach for England's state church—sorry that the affluence and respectability of a Church of England pulpit should entice him—sorry that Mr. Binney should be ready to preach for a church which he has said "ruins more souls than it saves"—sorry that the Dissenters are less consistent than the Bishop. He says—I love you, admit your piety, admire your talents—I long that my arms should enclose you, that you should stand with us as members of one body, sheep of one fold, but, you depart from the rule of a church which has the sanction of eighteen centuries; your orders are irregular, you stand out, and I cannot help you. Dichostacy, according to the Bishop, is sin—and what it is, according to Paul, may be determined by the fact, that he puts it with emulations, strifes, wrath, and envyings—and by the law of God, which says, "Mark them which cause it, and avoid them." The Bishop says this avoiding is painful: "I am free to confess that my feelings kick against my judgment," but I must do it. All honor to the Bishop. But there is another point of view from which to glance at this matter. The Bishop and all members of the Episcopal church are "standing apart." Did not the early bishops of the English State Church receive their offices from Rome? Does not the Papal Church hold the same language to the Bishop of Adelaide, and charge the same sin upon him that he holds to and charges upon Mr. Binney? Does not the Bishop defend himself by saying, I stand apart from the Papal Church, because that church stands apart from the divine economy given by the Apostles of the Lord? And do not the Dissenters of England defend themselves from the Bishop's charge in the same way? Why have Congregationalists, Wesleyans, and others come off from the State Church? Their doing so can be justified, or it cannot. If justified, it must be on the ground that the State Church was standing apart from the Divine faith or polity, and that which justifies the separation must unchristianize the church they came from, in which case the law of the Lord is, AVOID IT. If, on the other hand, the Episcopal church was of the one body of the Lord, then these Nonconformists cut themselves off from that one body, by forming a society distinct from and in opposition to the Episcopal Church? For ourselves we may just say, that we are high church, very high—that we believe in one body, as well as in one Lord—that with other bodies there can be no authorized fellowship, though there may be much good feeling—that the Papal body, the English State Church body, the Wesleyan, Lutheran, and Baptist bodies are not that one body—that dissent from, nonconformity to all these bodies, are not only lawful, but necessary, because they dissent from, and do not conform to, the one Divine economy for ever perfected through the Apostles of Jesus. On this high ground we commend to all, as models, "the" churches first in Christ Jesus in Judea, and the writings of the Apostles and Evangelists, as the only and sufficient, because perfect, rule of faith and polity. Further remarks upon the results of "incorporating the various sects with the Church of England, so as to form one visible communion," and upon the true and only foundation of Christian union, must be deferred, at least for one month. D. K.

THE ONE BODY.

BEFORE us is a recently-published volume by T. H. Milner, of Edinburgh, entitled "The Messiah's Ministry," which we hope, 'ere long, to notice at some length. In the mean time we give an extract to which we heartily subscribe, and commend the book to every person who desires human help in learning what Primitive and Apostolic Christianity really is. In a book of 370 pages we do not expect to find every conclusion such as we can accept, but in "Messiah's Ministry," while here and there we have to demur, yet so largely does the volume speak to us in the terms of the Apostles, and so closely does it keep to their conclusions, that could we place a copy in the hands of any Christian, gladly would we do so.

"Denominationalism bids for division, lives and thrives upon it, and must die without it. For 'the ministers of the various denominations' to lead all into the unity of the faith, would be to unchurch themselves, and throw away their living. With a sectarian ministry, Christian union is impossible. The doctrine of the former is, that there are many bodies; of the latter, that there is but one. As soon shall grapes be gathered of thistles, and figs of thorns, as will those all speak the same thing, and be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment, who are already divisioned off by the party cries, I am of Paul! I am of Cephas! I am of Apollos! I am of Calvin! I am of Knox! I am of Wesley! We do not say that those who utter such cries will always be so foolish, but we do say that their coming into the unity of the faith must be preceded by the entire renunciation of party names, whether of men, opinions, or countries, and their being called by the name of the one Lord of the one body his bride, the church. If as 1 Cor. xii. 25 intimates, God has so arranged and constituted the members of the natural body, as that by their joint operation, there should be no schisma, division, or rent; the apostle has stated this, that the body of Christ might learn thereby that all its members are so set, joined together, and compacted in one cooperative ministry, as to secure that union which otherwise were impossible.

"10. And as to sympathy, as well might we expect it, from the bleeding dismembered pieces of the dying soldier on the gory field of strife, as from rival religious factions. That there is no sympathy between individual members of so-called Christian churches, we do not affirm: we rejoice to know and acknowledge the opposite. But we unhesitatingly declare that denominationalism is utterly unsympathizing. Its reign has proved it so. Happily it is falling, and with it the rancour of its spirit. As it falls it will be seen that there is no good in it. The truly pious are fast discovering that their sectarianism has simply divided them without blessing themselves or others one whit. As they recede from it, they discover that Christ is one, that he is not divided, that his body is one, and his faith one. And as this union in him is realized, then only is that sympathy which alone deserves his name experienced. The unity of the body—the union of many members in one body, is absolutely essential to that feeling which is peculiar to the closest of relationships. Thus to the fact that God has tempered the body together that there may be no schism in it, the apostle adds the further consideration, 'but that the members may have the same care one for another; so that whether one member suffer all the members sympathize, (συνπάσχει) or one member be honored, all the members rejoice together.' But it is the direct opposite in sectarianism; for consisting in a rivalry forbidden in Scripture, and ignoring the union which is the glory of the ecclesia of Christ, there is instead of this sympathy which a union of membership in one body produces, that cold feeling of pride and jealousy with which rival establishments or powers ever contemplate themselves in contrast with neighbours, or foes.

"11. Christian concord is an impossibility with denominationalism. Wherever various denominations exist there are just as many spirits. Each sect has its own spirit. Each regiment is characterised by the esprit de corps. And who does not know that it is quite 'a taking illustration' with 'popular preachers' to represent 'the different bodies' under the military idea, and speak of their 'regimental colours,' as if the Prince of Peace had constituted his church on the model of modern military tactics, or as if the articles of war were copied from the faith in Christ! The gaping, applauding multitude do not perceive that the despots of Europe have divided their forces into distinctive regiments, while the King Immortal has formed his into one body, that while regimentalism is a law of the former, sectarianism is a violation of the law of Christ. The injunction to the disciples, to endeavour to keep the unity of the spirit, is given in view of their being but 'one body.' Denominationalism reigned both among Jews and Gentiles when the Christian faith was established, and one capital object of it was to 'make the two one new man' under Christ, and to 'reconcile both to God in one body by the cross.' But, alas! through the perversity of men, he who is 'the God of peace' has been worshipped rather as the God of war, that gospel which is the good news of peace has been tortured into a preaching of strife, and that cross through which the enmity of man to man, and man to God is slain, has been carried and emblazoned as a symbol of diabolic fight. Yet the repose which Jesus left in legacy to his disciples, was his own unbroken, ineffable peace: 'My peace I give unto you.' That perfect peace he had in the undisturbed serenity of his union with the Father was what he gave to them. His last prayer for them was that they all might be one, as he and the Father are one (John xvii. 20-21.) But how entirely unrealised has this been amid the wars and fightings of denominational Christianity! How utterly unrealizable is it till parties and party names are as entirely discarded by Christians as they are reprobated by the apostles (1 Cor. iii. 1-5.)

"12. Yet, who has not gloried in 'his church,' 'his minister,' 'his denomination?' And what preacher does not boast of 'his people.' It is verily so; more truly so, indeed, than is imagined; for nothing is more certain than that these things are not of the Lord—be whose they may, they are not his. He never established them, he never authorized them. They have been founded by men in contradiction of his laws, and they exist without a license—they are perpetuated under his condemnation—they are outlawed in Scripture. In regard to but a comparatively small amount of this vain glory, Paul said to the Corinthian believers, 'Brethren, I could not speak to you as spiritual, but as carnal. For, whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and division, are ye not carnal, and walk as men? While every one of you saith, I am of Paul, or I am of Apollos! are ye not carnal?' And so he charged them to glory not in men, but in the Lord. But denominationalism always glories in men.

"13. And of course it seeks to justify itself, and in this attempt it has made a mere myth of the body of Christ! Unable to deny that his body is one, and as unable to deny that its own name is legion, it seeks to cover the discrepancy by talking of 'the invisible church.' But who ever saw this invisible church, and who ever read of it in Scripture? None. It is a figment of modern mythology. The Christian body is one as we have seen, and its characteristics are all stated in the apostolic writings. Many assemblies in different parts it had when the Scriptures were written, as they shew, and these together formed in one body, but it was not an invisible church; it consisted of living men and women united together in the bonds of the gospel, and there was no difficulty in recognizing them as the body of Christ, and members in particular. Their conduct and character shewed what they were. A disciple was a disciple, and recognized as such everywhere; membership in Jerusalem gave membership in Rome. The body was one, visible and ascertainable. And still with the guidance of the New Testament Scriptures, a Christian church is as easily discoverable as are the cities, lakes, and mountains of Scotland by the help of a tourist's guide-book. But it is very convenient for the ministers of sects, to tell the anxious enquirer after the way to Zion, that the descriptions of the church he has been reading in the New Testament refer to the invisible church, a thing not to be found on earth; no, nor in heaven. But this keeps restless members in their seats.

"14 But, says an objector, 'Physician, heal thyself;' you are a member of a sect as well as others. Unquestionably. For all men are sectaries. Infidels, philosophers, worldlings, and religionists, are all sectaries. And we plead guilty to being one of 'that sect everywhere spoken against.' Nor shall any rob us of this boasting. And if any replies, Then, do not you rob others; we answer, We do not rob them; they rob themselves, or allow others to do it; ours is not their boast—they are not content with the name of Christ—they call themselves by other names—they do not confine themselves to epithets of Scripture—they tell us they are Romanists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, Independents, Baptists, or something else which the Saviour never called his people; they talk of their church being that of Rome, England, or Scotland, and themselves as Calvinists, Arminians, or anything rather than Christians. But, says one, Can a man not be a Christian and a Baptist? Certainly he can, if, as a Christian, he baptizes those whom the Lord authorizes to be baptized. A Baptist is one who baptizes: one who does not baptize is not a Baptist: John was a Baptist, simply because he baptized; had he not baptized any he would not have been called John the Baptist; those whom he baptized are not called Baptists. But to take this name in an unscriptural acceptance, or to take any other in the way of denominational distinction, is to contravene the law of Christ, and to violate the unity of his body. What would the husband think, who, on taking home his bride, found she was not content with his name, but would have one or other that could not mark her out as his wife? And is not the church the bride of Christ? The Lamb's wife? Is she not married to him, and become dead 'to the law by his body? Why, then, play the harlot by taking the name of another?"

CONFESSIONS OF A FOOLISH MAN.—No. II.

ONE day, not twenty years ago, when out for a country walk, I saw posted on a wall an announcement of a sale by auction. Some land was to be knocked down to the highest bidder. On the same bill, too, I read thus:—"Also, all that seat or pew in the North aisle of Minera chapel, in the said parish of Wrexham, usually held with the said Glascoed farm, as appurtenance thereto." That's odd, isn't it? I thought I to myself. To sell by auction a "seat or pew," seemed at first sight rather queer, and my face began to look red with indignation thereat. Now at that time I used to preach, and to tell out the whole truth, my income was derived from what are called "pew-rents." So the second thoughts were, "Don't get angry too soon; just con over how the thing is done in your chapel, and before you throw a stone, see that you don't live in a glasshouse." Whether it was conscience, or something else, that whispered to me such thoughts, I must leave it to wise men to determine; but into my mind they came, and all at once I did not turn them out, as the sequel will show.

I began to ponder and compare, and my verdict was, that about all the real difference between the North aisle pew and the pews in which my hearers sat lay here, that was sold by auction, and ours were let by private contract. I remembered how a much-esteemed brother and deacon used to stand in the table pew, or attend in the vestry once or twice a week, with book in hand, to let sittings. My friend whose trade was thriving would take the pew with four sittings in it, and would pay 16s. a quarter for it; while Mary Thompson, the washerwoman, who could not afford so much as that, sat at the back of the gallery, towards the top, and gave a shilling a quarter for that privilege. Some of the members, when they became reduced in circumstances, and could not pay for such good sittings as they used to, left the chapel and attended nowhere. Some who took sittings never paid their rent, so that "bad debts" would form an item in our yearly reckonings. Sometimes a stranger who had come early to the place, would sit down in a pew that was rented; and sometimes, when the holder of the pew came in, he would turn the stranger out. And then the said stranger would go away, and abuse the whole company of chapel-goers.

Well, thought I again, what a foolish fellow I must have seemed to some sensible person who understood all this, when at that Anti-State Church meeting I was praising our principle as "THE VOLUNTARY PRINCIPLE." Suppose that I am accosted in coming from such meeting by some owner of houses, who, having heard my speech, begins to admire it exceedingly, and to inform me that he practiced the voluntary principle also.

"How do you practice it, my good friend?" I ask.

"Why," says he, "I am the owner of ten houses. Three of these have shops connected with them, and are in a good thoroughfare; a capital situation. I don't let anybody occupy them who won't pay me a good stiff rent. Five of the others are in a middling situation; these I don't get so much for, but still I must have my price. Two of them are cottages in a court, and these I can't get more than half-a-crown a week for. That's the voluntary principle, isn't it?"

Oh dear! how very foolish I feel! I don't know what to say; I see clearly that he has me in a fix; he knows all about how we go on at our chapel; so I turn off the subject by talking about the weather, and asking him how the crops are.

But now what is to be done, thinks I once more. I know this is wrong, and I dare not speak of the voluntary principle any more. But will the chapel have to be shut up, and shall I be obliged to leave, if all seats are free, and we are to trust to voluntary contributions?

I went to sleep, and I had a dream.

And in my dream I thought some one came and talked with me.

"Why art thou thus agitated?" said the speaker. I told him my fears.

"Do you think," he said, "that the cause of God cannot be carried on without a system of collecting money, which keeps up worldly distinctions in His own house?"

"I hope it can," I replied, "but I fear the people are not ready for it."

"Do not the members of the church LOVE God then, and LOVE His cause?" he said; and he placed great emphasis on that word, love.

I was silent for a moment. Then I said, "I hope they do."

"And if you devote the time and talents which God has given you, to serve them in the Gospel, are you afraid they will not esteem you highly enough in value and importance; yet, it is not all that is necessary; nay, if this alone be sought after, the end which is aimed at is very apt to be defeated altogether."

On the result of this practice, as proved by experience, the editors say:

"We have often been struck with the scene presented by a Scottish assembly during the morning exposition. We have witnessed, we must say, nothing at all like it in England. You may see the people there, while the minister is conducting this exercise, each one with the Bible open before him; and the very rustling of leaves, when some passage of Scripture is referred to, breaking in every now and then on the otherwise almost breathless silence of the auditory, together with the whole appearance and attitude of each individual present, afford a sufficient voucher of the fact that every one considers himself a party concerned in the business, earnestly and eagerly engaged in carrying on the investigation. Something like this is what we should be glad to see prevailing among ourselves."

Let this practice become general, let church members closely follow and enter into the exposition. Let those who can do so take notes of important points and enter them into a book kept for the purpose, and depend upon it a considerable portion of the ignorance of the Scriptures, which is a standing disgrace to the churches, and which text preaching can never remove, will be taken away, and an approach will be made to that time when we shall all speak the same things. ### POPERY IN ELY.

SEVERAL communications, headed as above, have been forwarded to us. One letter states, that a sorrowing husband has been deprived by death of his affectionate wife and first-born—the mother and babe only living a few days after its birth. A few lines from the letter will state the case. "The departed wife and her husband were regular attendants on the services of the Established Church, and therefore her grave was bought on the 'consecrated' side of the Cemetery. But about one day before the interment intimation was given, that the infant, not having been blessed by the sprinkling of a few drops of water from the hands of a priest, could not be put into its mother's coffin, nor taken into the chapel, nor to the grave till the service had been gone through, and eighteen inches of earth covered over her coffin — then the babe might be put down. So it was done." Admitting the painfulness of the case, and that we feel for the relatives of the departed mother and child, we nevertheless cannot join in the outcry made by "Evangelical Churchmen" against such cases. We neither call them popish, nor find fault with the clergy who insist upon acting in accordance with what they have vowed to teach. Infant baptism, and infant regeneration by baptism, are not peculiar to the Church of Rome — they belong fully and fairly to the Church of England, and they existed before the first Pope. The church established by law has a burial service for members only, every word of which its ministry are bound to use. This church also believes in consecrated burial ground for its own members, and unconsecrated earth for Dissenters and Infidels. Now, in the name of common sense we ask, what right a man has to expect or desire that his unbaptized child should be buried in the place and manner provided for and restricted (according to the letter and spirit of the standards of his church) to its baptized members? And we further ask, in the name of common honesty, how any priest could be required to give the church's services for members to those whom it considers not members? Does our reader say, Do you then believe in infant regeneration by baptism, and in the necessity of separating in death the unbaptized child from its baptized mother? Certainly not! And we may add, not in any church which so teaches. But at the same time be it said, that we could as soon believe in such monstrous nonsense, as admit the consistency of those who hold membership in, or give support to, a church which thus teaches, and yet complain when the consequences fall on themselves. It is far better to be free from the charge of supporting an anti-christian establishment, than to remain in it and raise against it the cry of Popery.

When there is love in the heart, there are rainbows in the eyes, which cover every black cloud with gorgeous hues.

ITEMS OF NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM.

Since our communication last month we have had good meetings, and some amount of discussion on infant baptism. Five have been added to the church, and our influence is being more widely felt. In our last it was stated that the Baptist church in Bond-street would shortly meet to answer the question, "Shall we henceforward observe the Lord's Supper as often as the Lord's Day?" The meeting has been held, when only some seventeen, out of about one hundred members present, said No. We are therefore no longer the only church in this town which meets every first day to break the commemorative loaf. What next, and next, remains to be seen; it is not for us to speculate. On the first day of January we published, price one penny, No. 1. of the Birmingham Bible Advocate, to be continued monthly. This was done upon our own responsibility — the loss, if any, to fall upon ourselves. We are happy to add, that close upon 500 copies have already been sold, and the cost covered, or within a fraction. This little monthly is similar to the Quo Warranto? and intended for circulation in Birmingham only. Lectures to females have been given by Mrs. King and Mrs. Chew, which have been well attended, and are likely, by making some acquainted with our place and times of meeting, who otherwise would not have been informed, to increase the number of female hearers of the Gospel.

BANGOR.

I am most happy to inform you, that the cause of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, is progressing amongst us, having had three additions to our number recently, and two more candidates for Christian immersion presented themselves last Lord's day. We have enjoyed the fellowship of our much-esteemed brother, William Watkin, of Llanfair, for these last nine days, and his presence has strengthened us much.—Bro. William Jones, of Portmadoc, has promised to pay us a visit soon. We are in peace and union, and are greatly attached to our King and his institutions. J. ELLIS.

CROSSGATES.

We had another addition to the church in Crossgates on the 9th of January, a married man who has attended our meetings for some time past, and who is now thoroughly convinced of the truth taught by our Lord and his Apostles, as revealed for our instruction and guidance while in this probationary state. Being thus convinced, he publicly confessed his faith, and was baptized forthwith in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, for the remission of past sins. Having thus commenced the Christian race, may he continue faithful until called on to cross the Jordan. G. RAMSAY.

DYSART.

As I know you are always interested in the progress of the truth, I am happy to state that with us it is steadily progressing. We have had seven persons immersed since October, and having some enquiring we expect that we shall go on adding to our number. T. HARRIS.

January 18th, 1859.

GLASGOW.

I am again happy to inform you, that during last month, a young woman was immersed upon a confession of faith, and added to the church meeting in Brown street. May she be an ornament to the Christian name. J. BROWN, Jun.

12th January, 1859.

NEWTOWN.

Since our last report we have added two, one by removal, the other by immersion. I am thankful to say, we can discover that the hearts of some others are being stirred to their depths by the power of the Gospel of Christ, and that there is every reason to believe we shall soon again immerse willing converts.—(Jan. 21.)

It rejoices me to say, that one of those to whom our anticipatory reference was made, was this morning immersed into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. This additional convert is a sister who may have much opposition to meet, but will, we trust, be zealous and useful in the Lord's vineyard.

J. B. R.

WIGAN.

The Gospel of Christ still continues to manifest its power among us. Since the beginning of this month, nine individuals have been added to the church, and some of those most unlikely in the judgment of man. W. McDUGALE.

January 19, 1859.

SWITZERLAND.

The friends of Mr. and Mrs. Darby will doubtless feel interested in news concerning them. I have therefore copied from a letter written by my daughter to her sister, a few particulars which I think will afford you pleasure, especially as it will show, that we are not the only people who honor the Lord's day, by an observance of its sacred institutions. Mrs. Darby writes as follows, under date Geneva, Jan. 7, 1859:

We have been to the Protestant French Church again. Not being able to sit by the side of my beloved father, how I wished he could for once have sat by mine. The picture, if nothing else, would have pleased him. A neat plain built building, painted white and relieved with green festoon and curtains, green trees looking in at every door, plain deal seats with backs, and no cushions; no distinctions of place, those who come first taking the best, and all classes mingle. The old marked woman, with dark ugly face under a checked muslin cap, and wearing a white muslin square for a shawl, sits beside the daintiest lady, who dresses well, but not luxuriously enough to startle the eye by contrast. The young women wear pretty embroidered caps instead of bonnets, and here and there may be seen a dark head with only a black crape veil; but from the highest to the lowest grade, all in every item of the dress exquisitely clean. The contribution for the poor and for support of the worship, is made every week. The Lord's Supper apparently every week. The hymns simply, but well sung. The sermon soundly scriptural, and to-day really eloquent, on the Christian combat and weapons—"Fight the good fight of faith." The preacher read nearly the whole Epistle then took his subject without sitting down. The prayers were full of truth and burning earnestness, without a shadow of fanaticism, and with a directness and plainness that had nothing to offend. He prayed for all in authority. (their's is a republic, remember) for the temporal governors of that canton and of all the cantons of Switzerland, and for the inhabitants of that beautiful land, &c. Then what is worthy of note, by nine o'clock every seat is occupied, and again at two p.m.—Every one of the many places of worship in the town is filled at this hour. There is but one English service, and that is from 11 to 1, and again from 6½ to 8.—I am pressed for room, and can only give my kindest love and affectionate remembrances to all friends.—M. D.

AUSTRALIA.

From a letter addressed to a brother by S. Kidner, dated St. Kilda, Nov. 15, 1858, we take the following extracts:—

"The cause of Christ is progressing most encouragingly. Several additions have been made during the last five weeks. Our Bro. Procter's young daughter, only 12 years of age, and a brother of our Bro.

Picton's wife were the last adherents to the truth of Jesus. Melbourne has also increased, and at Brighton as well, whither our good and energetic Bro. Coles accompanies me, that he may immerse a female convert from Roman Catholicism. Such is the bright side of the picture, but a cloud, thick and dark, intervenes; and while we rejoice to know that there is a bright light behind the thick cloud, we nevertheless mourn and grieve while under the cloud, and so rejoice with trembling at beholding the love and severity of our God. — Our beloved Bro. Walker, of Moorabbim, has lost his eldest son, who, about a month ago, being overcome by the effects of a hot wind which then prevailed, rose from the dinner table and washed his head in cold water, afterward walking in the garden without his hat. The result was he received a sun stroke, complained of pain in his head, gradually becoming worse. A medical man was sent for, and after a fortnight's treatment, he was declared to be convalescent; but two days subsequently he had a relapse, and after a week's suffering, was taken from this life, we hope, to a better and everlasting existence. Our Bro. Walker's trials have been heavy indeed, for some 14 months ago his wife was thrown out of a vehicle and killed on the spot. The love of the brethren has abounded towards the tried ones, and it was my privilege to witness the Christian affection exhibited by all the disciples. He died on the 9th of November, and was buried on the 11th.—No one was invited to the funeral, but some 60 or 70 friends attended, either on horseback or in light carts, and among the visitors were the young persons composing the Temperance Band of Hope, in a large dray, who surrounded the grave, and cast flowers on the coffin of their beloved secretary. Bro. Davies, of Mollington, and indeed all who knew Bro. Walker, will be grieved to hear of his loss."

Brother R. SERVICE, writing under date of Victoria, Australia, Nov. 18, says:—"The churches in Melbourne, at Prahran, and at South Brighton, are in health and thriving. The churches at Prahran and at Melbourne have been in combination for six Lord's day evening lectures — two lecturers from each church, in each place, every evening, to be continued three weeks longer. Within a few weeks we have had two immersions, and the Prahran church have had three."

EVERITT ALLENBY.

With sorrow I have to communicate that our beloved brother, Everitt Allenby, Liverpool, was removed from our midst on the 4th of January, aged 32 years. There is however, so much of joy mingled in the cup, both to the brethren and his immediate relatives, that we should all be ungrateful and totally unmindful of God's gracious dealings, if we gave way to rejoicing under the bereavement. The stroke was long expected, and came very gently, as to time; but heavy in the degree of suffering that accompanied it at last. Most appalling, at times, was the agony that our dear brother endured; but like a gallant bark, securely anchored, he arose above all the tossings of anguish, clinging to the hope that had entered within the veil—which hope he found sure and steadfast, gaining strength with each successive strain, until the haven was reached, and all was "calm as the breast of the lake, when the loud winds are hushed to repose." A more instructive death-bed has seldom been witnessed—a soul-enlarging, faith-expanding scene it was from first to last. To one who stood by him at the last swell of Jordan and its final ebb, he said, grasping his hand in both his own, "Oh, brother! for a drink of the crystal, the pure crystal of the water of life;" and then, as the fearful choking set in, he cried with a pleading voice, "Oh, Father, take me to thyself!" and his panting breath grew fainter and fainter, till all was still. Only twenty-four hours before he drew his last breath, he sang with a clear voice, part of the beautiful hymn, "My God the spring of all my joys."

Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.

CLEMENTINA MANFULL.

It is to me a painful duty to record the death of my beloved and only child, Clementina Manfull, who died of consumption, the 17th of December, 1858, in her 19th year. I have greatly desired to make the same known, especially to the young, who may learn a lesson, and know how it is possible, by belief in and obedience to the truth, for the young to conquer death, and disarm him of every sting. This young sister was immersed into the name of Jesus, for the remission of sins, in October, 1855, after hearing a stirring appeal to the young upon the danger of death-bed repentance, delivered by our Brother J. B. Rotherham. She had learned the lessons of divine wisdom in that school where they are best taught. Her Heavenly Father had appointed to her a cup of sorrow, which she drank to the very dregs, saying, "Not my will, but thy will be done." But her very merciful Father had sweetened that bitter cup with love, and she realized the promise, for as her day, strength was imparted.

The sting of death was removed, and she triumphed as she journeyed through the valley, leaning on the beloved; and even in her bodily agonies she exclaimed, "Never mind, papa, it will soon be over; I confide in Jesus: all is well." Truly she was waiting and watching for her Master's coming, having her lamp trimmed, and oil in her vessel, ready to enter in to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Her mind was not clouded or perplexed with any doubts or unbelieving fears, but she had full confidence, addressing often her Father thus—"My God will not suffer more to be laid on me than I can bear, and as my day, my strength will be; he doeth all things well." It was, indeed, most affecting to hear her repeat the following hymn, the day before her death:—

"What sinners value I resign;
Lord, 'tis enough that thou art mine;
I shall behold thy blissful face,
And stand complete in righteousness.

This life's a dream, an empty show,
But the bright world to which I go
Hath joys substantial and sincere;
When shall I wake and find me there?

My flesh shall slumber in the ground,
Till the last trumpet's joyful sound;
Then burst the chains with sweet surprise,
And in my Saviour's image rise.

O, glorious hour! O, bless'd abode!
I shall be near, and like my God;
And flesh and sin no more control
The sacred pleasures of the soul."

I had sweet converse with her respecting the glories to be revealed, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, and of which finite creatures cannot conceive. She filled up her place round the table of the Lord, so long as her feeble frame would allow. I sorrow not as one without hope, but look forward to a reunion, when mortal shall put on immortality, and where with the redeemed out of every nation, tribe, and people, we shall mingle our praise to Him who washed us in his blood.

EDWARD MANFULL.

Nottingham, January 10, 1859.

JOHN HAWKES.

I have to inform you and the brethren, that our beloved brother, John Hawkes, fell asleep in Jesus, on the 14th ult. after a trying illness of two years, of a consumptive character. Our deceased brother was immersed into Christ about three years since. In health, he was diligent and faithful; in sickness, patient and cheerful; and in death he was filled with peace and joy, and the hope of a blissful immortality beyond the grave. May the Lord teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

PHILIP SANTO.

Adelaide, November 12th, 1858.

FAMILY CIRCLE.

BLAME not before thou hast examined the truth; understand first, and then rebuke.

THE keenest abuse of our enemies will not hurt us so much in the estimation of the discerning, as the injudicious praise of our friends.

Gross and vulgar minds will always pay a higher respect to wealth than to talent; for wealth, although it be a far less efficient source of power than talent, happens to be far more intelligible.

NEVER WEARY IN WELL-DOING.—When some one asked old father Scott, of Kentucky, "Why do you continue to preach when you have converted but one sinner in 20 years?" "Have I converted one?" said he. "Yes," replied the other.—"Then," said the good man, "here's for 20 years more, I may convert two." And the faithful old soldier toiled on to the end in his Master's work.

BEAUTIFUL AND TRUE—Education does not commence with the alphabet. It begins with a mother's look; with a father's smile of approbation, or sign of reproof; with a sister's gentle pressure of the hand, or a brother's noble act of forbearance; with handfuls of flowers in green and daisy meadows; with bird's nests admired but not touched; with creeping ants, and almost imperceptible emmets; with humming bees, and glass bee-hives; with pleasant walks in shady lanes, and with thoughts directed in sweet and kindly tones, for words mature to acts of benevolence, to deeds of virtue, and to a sense of all good, to God himself.

TEXT FOR YOUNG MEN.—A better subject for young men to discourse about, and to meditate upon, was never written than the following, by Swift:—"No man ever made an ill figure who understood his own talents, nor a good one who mistook them." Young men do not fail in life because they lack ability to succeed, half so often as from misdirection of talents. A right use of a moderate capacity will accomplish more than a wrong application of the most brilliant qualifications. Study, therefore, yourselves—aim to find out the actual talents you possess, and then endeavour to make the best possible use of them; you can then hardly fall short of making a good figure in the world, and what is more, being one among those who live not in vain.

THOU GOD SEEST ME!—What a solemn thought! Let me be where I may, upon the mountain or in the valley, in the forest or in the open field, in the house or out of it, asleep or awake, at toil or at rest, surrounded by midnight darkness or by the brightness of the noonday sun—in all my wanderings, changes, and failings, "Thou God seest me." Thou seest my actions—Thou knowest my thoughts. Can I conceal anything from Thee? Can I deceive thee? Surely I cannot. And since I cannot, what should be my conduct? Should it not be sincere, open, candid, true? Although I may deceive my fellow-man, and wrongfully obtain his good-feeling, his kindness, or his property, yet "Thou God seest me," and "rememberest it" against me. Should I not fear the dreadful day of reckoning, when Thou wilt punish for all these? And Thou seest and knowest the circumstances of all my situations; Thou knowest all my sorrows, my troubles, my trials. Should I not then be perfectly willing to trust and to depend entirely upon Thee at all times and in all circumstances? Help me, O my Heavenly Father, by Thy grace to feel and to think that "Thou God seest me," and to act as becomes one who thus feels!

THE STARS.

OH 'tis lovely to watch ye at twilight rise,
When the last gleam fades in the distant skies,
When the silver chime of the minster bell,
And the warbling fount of the woodland dell,
And the viewless sounds in the upper air,
Proclaim the hour of prayer!

Then ye shine in beauty above the sea,
Bright wanderers o'er the blue sky free!
Catching the tone in each sighing breeze,
And the whispering sound of the forest trees,
Or the far-off voice, through the quiet dim
Of some hamlet's hymn!

And the midnight, too, all still and lone!
Ye guard in beauty, from many a throne!
In your silver silence throughout the hour,
Watching the rest of each folding flower,
Gladdening with visions each infant's sleep,
Through the night hour deep!

Yes, ye look over Nature's hushed repose,
By the forest still where the streamlet flows,
By the breezeless hush of many a plain,
And the pearly flow of the silver main,
Or sweetly far o'er some chapel shrine
Of the olden time!

Thus in shadeless glory ye onward roll,
Bright realms of beauty, from pole to pole!
'Mid the vaulted space where your bright paths lie,
In the hidden depths of the midnight sky,
To some far-off land—to some distant home,
'Neath the ocean's foam!

But lo! the far voice of the waking sea,
And the first faint tinge of the early day,
Shining afar o'er the ocean's spray!
Oh, ye that have been as a power and a spell,
Through the dim midnight!

Farewell!

CHRIST'S CHURCH IDENTIFIED.—No. III.

"Upon this rock will I build my church."

THE death and resurrection of Jesus are facts which cannot be too highly appreciated, or too studiously investigated by any one who wishes to become thoroughly acquainted with the truths of Christianity. They constitute the splendid centre of the whole Christian system; and would, were they rightly apprehended and appreciated, so strongly attract our affections, as to render it impossible to be otherwise than in a state of union or fellowship one with another.

In a former number we heard made by an Apostle and by the Ethiopian, "the good confession," "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God;" and that "he was declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead." It was also shown that there was a most intimate and interesting connection between the Sonship of Jesus and his death and resurrection. His divine Sonship gives value and efficacy to these transcendent facts; and, together, constitute the bottom corner-stone of Christ's church. To these must all the living stones be joined, to be built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to show forth the praises of him who hath called us out of darkness into the marvellous light of the gospel.

Hence the Sonship of Jesus — Jesus and the resurrection — constituted the grand theme of apostolic preaching. By a candid examination of these discourses it will, we think, appear that our modern metaphysical sermons no more resemble them than my pen resembles a ship-mast, or a candle the luminary of day. Jesus and the resurrection are the centre to which they all invariably tend, and to which, with celestial eloquence, they attract the minds of their hearers.

If they required sinners to believe that "Jesus was the Son of God," it was because he had been "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." If they commanded men to repent, it was because "God had given to all men an assurance of judgment to come, in raising his Son from the dead." If they required sinners to "confess with their mouth the Lord Jesus," it was because they "believed in their hearts that God had raised him from the dead." If they commanded that believing penitents should "be baptized for the remission of their sins," it was because "baptism doth now save us by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." If they taught the doctrine of "the remission of sins," it was because "Jesus had been delivered for our offences, and raised for our justification." If they expected the Divine Comforter, or Advocate, "who should lead them into all truth," it was because Jesus had promised "that if he went away"—rose from the dead, and ascended to heaven—he would send them "the Comforter, who should abide with them for ever." If they taught that "the vile bodies of the saints should be raised," it was because "Christ had risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." If their preaching inspired Christians "with the hope of eternal life," it was "by the resurrection of Jesus that they were regenerated to this living hope."—If they observed the first day of the week as the Lord's day, it was because "the Lord rose from the dead" on the first day of the week. If "they continued steadfastly in the breaking of bread," it was that "they might show his death as often as they did it." If they continued through life, in a course of holy obedience to Jesus, it was because "he had died and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living." "They judged that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they who live, should not henceforth live to themselves, but unto him who died for them and rose again." And in every sentence, if their preaching was, to any extent, beneficial to the myriads, who were, through their instrumentality translated from darkness to light, it was because they "were determined to know nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified!"

Thus, the death and resurrection of Jesus, were central facts in apostolic times; and constituted a celestial magnet to which all Christian hearts were attracted, and around which the purified affections of the redeemed revolved; and which, consequently, consolidated in one harmonious fraternity, all the disciples of our blessed Lord.

To illustrate this idea, we will suppose a magnet to be placed in the centre of a great circle, on the circumference of which are a multiplicity of the particles of steel. No sooner does the magnetic influence reach them, than every particle moves toward the centre of attraction, until they come into actual contact, and form but one body around the one point of attraction.

Now, we hesitate not to say, that if Christians so understood the genius of the Christian religion, as to appreciate the death and resurrection of Jesus, they would no more depart, by opposing sectarian influences, from this Christian centre, than do the particles of steel from the centre by which they are attracted. The love of Christ would constrain them as the magnet attracts the steel—so that, of all the individuals thus constrained or attracted, one body, and but one, would be formed, having

But, if we suppose these particles of steel to be scattered over the whole area of the great circle, with a magnet in the centre, and other magnets occupying various situations, some within, and some without its area, the influence that these magnets would have on the particles of steel, would illustrate the present condition of sectarian Christendom. The different centres of attraction would each embody around it a multiplicity of neighbouring particles, so that, instead of the one body, around the one centre, there would be as many bodies as centres of attraction.

The reader will, we doubt not, perceive—unless his perceptions have been wofully stupified by prejudice—that we have proved, by a very summary process, that sectarians, properly so called, are more influenced by their sectarian peculiarities, than by the death, and resurrection, and love of Jesus. For as the particles of steel embody themselves around the magnet that attracts them the most strongly, so do sectarians crowd around those peculiarities which have the most influence on their minds. And it is useless for them to say, in the face of this demonstration, that the death and resurrection of Jesus attracts them more strongly than do their own peculiarities; for, it is mathematically certain that if this was the case, there could no more be more than one body of Christians, than there could by the attraction of one magnet, be formed separate parcels of the particles of steel!

A great part of the preaching of the present day, is, with respect to the minds of the people, what we have supposed the attraction of the magnets to be to the particles of steel. It creates influence by which their minds are drawn off from the centre of Christianity, and placed on sectarian peculiarities. The preaching of an Arminian, for example, attracts to the peculiarities of Arminianism. That of a Calvinist, to those of Calvinism. That of a Universalist, to those of Universalism. That of a Destructionist, to those of Destructionism; and so to the end of the ring-streaked and speckled catalogue! There is, indeed, scarcely any opinion or system of opinions, which may not, under certain circumstances, become the attractive centre, or foundation of a sect. Look at the peculiarities by which the Baptists have been drawn asunder, and associated into twelve or fourteen tribes. The Methodists, into five or six. The Presbyterians into nine. Every sect has its grand distinguishing peculiarity—its attractive centre; and the minister of the dogmas of each, so ministers his peculiarities, as to unite his converts around a sectarian magnet different from those of all other sects; and different also from that, by which we have already seen, the primitive church was distinguished.

Just so different, however, as are the dogmas and sectarian peculiarities of the sects, from the simple unsophisticated preaching of the apostles, the tendency of which was, to unite all around the sonship of Jesus, just so different are the churches of the sects from Christ's church! The church of Christ has, for its only foundation, facts and truths the most sublime and momentous that have ever been presented to the ear or eye of man or angel;—

whilst, very frequently, the foundation of the sect, is some trifling opinion at which an apostle might blush! Opinionism, unsanctified and factious opinionism, has been the bane of Christendom. So intoxicated have great multitudes become with opinionism, that they have lost sight of the transcendent beauties of apostolic Christianity. Nay, many of its most obvious truths have been laughed at and scorned by a sectarian clergy. The church of Christ itself, as it existed in the days of the apostles, were it here now, in all its original simplicity and glory, would be denominated "a no creed, faith, and opinion church," and "piratical," because not having a human creed. Then would it be identified, if in no other way, by the bitter and stubborn opposition with which it would meet, on the part of those who are determined at all hazards, to sustain their human ecclesiastical organizations.

Reader, march right square up to the line of truth, and be honest! Do you, or not, believe—do you not know, that if just such a church existed now in this country, as that which Peter constituted at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, it would meet with the general, if not universal opposition of the sects? Ponder this well in your mind, and ask yourself, can those be Christ's churches that would oppose Christ's church?

THE TWO COVENANTS.—No. II.

In this number on the two covenants, I will compare the old and new institutions. I have already said that the first, or old covenant, went into operation at Mount Sinai, some four hundred and thirty years after it was deposited with Abraham. The second, or new covenant, went into operation on the memorable Pentecost, some fifteen hundred and twenty-five years after it was first propounded to the father of the faithful.

1. The first item of comparison between these two institutions that I will notice, are the scenes that attended their going into operation. When the laws, based upon the first, were about to be given, the sight was so terrible that even Moses said, "I exceedingly fear and quake." Paul thus describes it: The mount "burned with fire," attended with "blackness, and darkness, and tempest, and the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words, which they that heard entreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more. * * * * And if so much as a beast touched the mount, it shall be stoned, or thrust through with a dart" (Heb. xii. 18-21.)

The whole scene was grand and awfully terrible. God commanded Moses "to set bounds to the people round about, saying, Take heed to yourselves that ye go not up into the mount, or touch the border of it: whosoever toucheth the mount shall surely be put to death." "And it came to pass, on the third day, in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceedingly loud: so that all the people that was in the camp trembled." "And the Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly. And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice" (Ex. xix. 12-19.)

Such were the awfully grand and terrific scenes which attended the giving of the law that was to guard and secure to the nation all the blessings contemplated in the first covenant. And these overwhelming displays of divine power were all indicative of the character of that law which was to be their governor and teacher. Its absolute authority, its uncompromising demands, its merciless penalties, were all adumbrated in the thunderings, the lightnings, and the trumpet's blast, which accompanied its first announcement.

But O! how different the scenes which attend the taking effect of the second, the new covenant. It is preceded by the life, the teaching, the miracles of Jesus. Its near approach is heralded by the tears of the Son of God at the grave of Lazarus, by his mournful lamentation over Jerusalem, by his agonizing prayer in the garden of Gethsemane, and by his dying words upon the cross—"Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." But he dies for the sins of the world, is buried, and rises again the third day, according to the Scriptures. The perfect law of liberty, based upon the second promise, that "in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed," is now placed not in the hands of Moses, but in the hands of the Twelve Apostles, together with the promise that they shall receive the power and wisdom of the Holy Spirit to guide them into the whole truth; and then Jesus ascends to his native heaven, and by his Father is crowned Lord of all.

Now, the day comes when this new covenant is to take effect; when it is to go into operation. The disciples are all in one place with one accord. Suddenly there is heard a sound as of a rushing, mighty wind; but there is no smoke nor awful thunderings. There is the appearance of fire, though it issues not from the trembling, smoking mount, but sits in the form of separated tongues on the heads of the Apostles of the Lamb.—There is nothing to strike terror to the heart of any, but their own sins. Those sins which pierced the tender side of Jesus, now pierce the hearts of his murderers, and well may they exclaim, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" not because of what they see without, but what they feel within.

But O! what soothing words are uttered by the heaven-inspired Apostle, in response to this mighty question! He does not say, stand off and tremble—come not near, or you shall be stoned or thrust through with a dart; but he says, "Repent and be immersed, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit; for the promise is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off." Yes, notwithstanding the first, or old covenant, was confined to Abraham's fleshly descendants, the second, or new covenant, says, "In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." In view of that promise, therefore, could the Apostles offer salvation to all.

All the scenes that accompany the first promulgation of the new covenant indicate that it is an institution of mercy, of grace; that it is a system of peace and good-will to man.

2. As a second point of comparison between these two institutions, I refer to the multiplicity of their adherents. In the first, God said to Abraham, "I will make of thee a great nation." "And he brought him forth abroad, and said, look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them. And he said unto them, so SHALL THY SEED BE."

But concerning the second, "it is written, Rejoice thou barren that beareth not, break forth and cry thou that travailest not, for the desolate hath many more children than she who hath a husband" (Gal. iv. 27.) That is, the adherents of the new covenant shall be more numerous than those of the first; or the spiritual children of Abraham shall be more numerous than his fleshly children: or, to speak plainly and without a figure, Christians shall outnumber Jews.

This true, the first covenant was a fruitful mother: her children were, for number, all that God promised; and while her family was multiplying in the land, and like a fruitful vine whose branches covered the mountains, they were filling the valleys and stretching themselves throughout the hill country of Judea, the second covenant lay concealed in the archives of the nation, overlooked as a woman forsaken of her husband. But now it is brought forth in all the beauty and vigor of youth, and the multiplying of her spiritual offspring commences. Three thousand are born to her in one day. Soon we hear of the number being increased to five thousand. Thus shall she proceed from strength to strength, lengthening her cords and strengthening her stakes, until the whole earth shall be filled with her glory, and all nations shall rejoice in the blessings that flow out to a perishing world through the blood of the everlasting covenant.

3. On the point of comparison between the two institutions, I can only make a passing remark.

Under the first there were the high priest, the priests, and the people.—Under the second there are the High-priest and the priests: for every child of the new covenant is a priest, consecrated and set apart to the divine service, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, holy and acceptable to God. Under the first, the priest was made without an oath, "by him that said unto him, The Lord swear, and will not repent, thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec." Under the old covenant, the priest had father and mother in the priestly lineage; but under the new, Christ, the High-priest over the house of God, is without father or mother, so far as priesthood is concerned. The priesthood under the old, being limited by law, had beginning of days and end of time; but Christ remains a priest for ever. His priesthood is not measured by the law of Moses. The law made man priest, who had infirmity; but the new covenant has made the Son of God high-priest, who has no infirmities. The priests under the law were many, because of death; but Christ has an unchangeable priesthood. "Wherefore, he is able to save to the utmost all that come to God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. vii.)

EVANGELISTS : THEIR POSITION AND WORK.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN we depart from Scotland, or from the late religious abode of Archibald M'Lean, and journey to Ephesus in Asia, and accept the privilege of looking upon the Lord's congregation in that city, we hear Ambassador Paul begin a letter to the brethren thus—"To the saints who are at Ephesus." The apostle, while remembering that all the saints in Asia and in Europe are one body, remembers that they are not all at one place, and therefore he immediately addresses that portion of them dwelling in that city. Afterwards he says, "You are of the household of faith," clearly suggesting to us, that they did not constitute the household, but were of the household—a difference as great as that between a whole and a part. Again, "I, Paul, the prisoner for you Gentiles." This is worthy of note, for the term, "you Gentiles," has reference not alone to the few at Ephesus city, but to all the Gentiles with whom, as a workman for Christ, he was connected. Further on he says, "Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it." The apostle certainly had his eye upon more than the friends in Ephesus while using this language. "Pray for me . . . that as an ambassador, (now a weak prisoner) I may speak (not timidly, but) boldly, as I ought to speak." They therefore had an interest in the apostle's speaking, wherever he spoke. "That you may know my affairs, how I do, Tychicus (an evangelist) will make known to you all things."

From these, and from other plain words in this one brief Epistle written by an Apostle, we come to the grave conclusion that Brother M'Lean, with his independence of each church, and the inspired Paul, with all the saints and a portion of the saints before him, do not exactly agree. We have not the slightest hesitancy in telling friend

M'Lean, although we only find him in his writings, that we have more confidence in the apostle as a teacher than in him. It appears to us conclusive, that no one could ever gather from the Epistle to the friends of the Lord at Ephesus, that churches were then independent : and hereafter we may have occasion to examine whether any of the other inspired letters will permit us to speak of church independency. When the apostle says to these same relatives, "There is one body and one spirit," we almost feel like asking an independence advocate if they had an independent spirit at Ephesus in those days.

It being no virtue to cultivate the spirit of fear, let us calmly look into the citadel of independency from another angle. The cardinal service of the sentiment that each church is independent, is to prevent a tyrannical bishop from growing, or from using power if he should grow. There are so many errors branching out from this one root of a foreign vine, that it would require many pages to enumerate and illustrate them. For, does the making of every company of brethren independent preclude ecclesiastical tyranny ? If tyranny we are to have, why cannot a score of tyrants in as many churches work as much mischief as one tyrant among the same number of churches ? But we sweep the whole of this reasoning into the same waves that rolled over Pharaoh's perished army, and then stand up for the enactments and sanctions of Jesus, apart from all dominancy, whether by a little or a big pope.

But what about the authority of the church ? In offering a few words in this chapter, let it be noted that we are not particular whether the church is interpreted as referring to the believers in one city, one province, or the whole world. The question is, Has the church authority ? We answer, It has not, and never had. We mean the church of Christ, for the church of Rome has always had authority, and always will while it exists. One of the archbishops puts it down in strong orthodoxy when he states — "The church was prior to the Bible: we believe in the church first, and we believe in the Bible which the church presents to us. If there is anything clearly taught, it is the authority of the church." We trust that this hint from the archbishop will moderate the ardor of fervent friends who talk so fluently concerning papalism; for if there be any virtue in a good Roman sentiment, our friends who speak of the authority of the church have this virtue. With us it proves nothing one way or the other, to agree or disagree with Rome; for if we should find a jewel in the Pope's inner parlour, or in a font of holy water, we could not think that Popery had gone so far into the jewel as to spoil it. There is both despotism and democracy at Rome. The ecclesiastic chairman, the avowed occupant of Peter's seat, is elected!

Carefully have we searched the oracles for something like "authority of the church," either as it respects terms or signification; but up to this moment our search has been unrewarded. The reason, we must think, is, that during the labours of the apostles before their personal departure, the church was a democracy. When we hear wise men telling us about the authority of the church to meet at a certain hour for worship, or to erect a place for the purpose of worshipping comfortably, or some other expedient, we cannot help thinking of a person explaining to us the authority he has to dress himself every morning, or his authority to sit at his table to partake of food. There is as much authority in the one case as in the other. Authority has reference to the making of law, or the enforcing of law with appropriate accompanying penalties. Hence, the assembly we call the church, whether a church or the church, has not one particle of authority, so far as we have learned.

The authority of the Head of the church is all-sufficient—and that there might be enough of this authority on earth for all practical purposes, he imparted authority to certain inspired men, and thus stereotyped and fixed fast his authority on earth for all people and all time. The church therefore is built upon, and is presided over by, both the Lord and his chosen apostles. We need authority above, and we need authority below. The Lord in person exercises the requisite authority in heaven—the Spirit-endowed ambassadors exercise the necessary authority on earth. We ask nothing more as it respects authority. Will any one explain to us what other authority is required?

But an intelligent and worthy company of evangelists speak here, and inquire if they also are devoid of authority. Yes, brethren, you also are without authority. You have no power to make a law—no power to enforce a law by penalties. The reason is clear: Christ never gave you this power, and what you have not received you do not possess. This may be a hard lesson to learn—but be patient, brethren, and we will very composedly bring out what has been avowedly learned from the Master relative to the place that you fill. And if you feel aggrieved, speak up. You shall have the hearing ear. Meantime we centre everything in the exalted Lord, who is at the base, the top, and in the midst of his temple composed of the precious materials called believers.

Next, then, for the sake of brevity, let us ask the question, If it be correct that the church has no authority, what is the value of the church's decisions? The authority of the church, and the decisions of the church, evidently go together—if the one can be made good, so can the other—if the one hangs on nothing, the other hangs on the same left the mountains of Bashan stretched far away to the south, their summits clothed with forest trees, their sides green with pastures and dotted with flocks. On the right rose the lofty peak of Lebanon, but little inferior in altitude to Hermon itself. Like it, its top was one untrodden field of virgin snow. Like it, it had its zone of lofty cedars. But these, the glory of Lebanon, were even more beautiful than those of Hermon. Of vaster extent, these noble forests swelled and rolled away till they seemed to dip in the flashing bosom of the Mediterranean. From the foot of Lebanon several spurs shot forth in nearly a southerly course. Between these mountainous ranges, and the hills of Bashan, lay a fertile vale, the commencement of the fair Valley of the Jordan. Through its midst wound a small stream, the parent of the holy river of Israel.

Farther on, in the midst of velvet pastures, and shaded by groves of lofty palms, lay the Lake of Merom, the receptacle of the infant stream. Still beyond was the larger Sea of Genesareth, skirted on either side by a range of low, red hills. Into its peaceful bosom the Jordan fell, and again issuing from its southern bound, in greater strength, it wound away, till lost in the distance. The forests of Gilead on the one hand, and the palm-clad heights of Manasseh on the other, closed the view.

All over this lovely valley, as far as the eye could reach, were scattered numerous cities and hamlets. The former, with their glittering domes and spires, lay chiefly in the plain, while the latter nestled amid the wooded dells of its skirting hills. Eminent among them all for the beauty of its situation and the splendour of its habitations, was the City of Dan. Lying upon the slope of one of the spurs of Lebanon, from which issued the crystal fount that formed the source of the Jordan, it looked far over the adjacent plain. From its western wall rose a lofty grove, containing the tabernacle of the Danites. There, the worship of Jehovah was first set up, when the children of the land were driven out by the chosen people. And here, still, there was an ephod and teraphim, and a priesthood, though of an irregular creation. As the southern tribes went up to Shiloh to worship, so the Danites once gathered here to celebrate the solemn rites of their religion. The time, however, when all thronged thitherward to serve the Lord was past, and now there were few who sought His courts. The children of promise had become estranged from their holy worship, and followed eagerly after the sensual rites of Moloch and Astarte. And the few who still clung to the religion of their fathers, were now an obscure and persecuted sect.

But the beauty of earth and sky seemed to have no charms for the gazing youth, for his eyes swept the whole scene with a careless and listless glance. They lighted up, however, as they fell upon the distant heights of Manasseh. Bending eagerly forward, as though to pierce the soft mist that hung over those forest hills, and see, far beyond, the cities of that favoured southern land. But even his keen vision could discern nothing; and his gaze strayed back to the foreground of the picture, and fixed itself upon a distant cluster of olive and fig-trees, from the midst of which peeped a low white dwelling. It was the home of Manoah.

The soft light came back to those dark orbs, and the long lashes drooped pensively over them, as they rested upon that fair home. For it was his home. And it was dear to him too. There was love in the fixed attention that fastened itself upon every feature of its familiar haunts, and drank in the soothing influence of its quiet beauty. His young life had all been passed there, and his fond heart had grown to it. "Yet I must leave thee," he murmured, "and seek another home; one far hence. Thou art very dear to me, fair land of Hermon; still, it is best."

A distant shout rose on the air, and he looked to see the cause. Up the high road that led to the city of Nazareth, a train of camels and asses were briskly marching. Behind them came a company of mounted troops. The scarlet trappings of the beasts, and the peculiar dress of their drivers, marked them the messengers of another nation. Full well the youth knew their country and their errand. A dark frown gathered upon his high brow, as he exclaimed: "Behold the emissaries of our taskmasters! The beasts that are to bear away the fat of our land for the nourishment of the proud Lords of Philistia ! The yearly tribute of corn, and wine, and oil, is lacking, perchance, and these slaves have come to claim it. Of old, our fathers bare the first-fruits of the land to the priests of the LORD, for their maintenance. But now, strangers—and they idolaters—devour the increase of our ground. How long shall this be ? Is Israel no more the chosen of God ? ”

He lifted his burning eyes heavenward—“ Oh LORD, how long shall the adversary do this dishonor ? How long shall the enemy blaspheme Thy Name ? Why deliverest Thou not Thy people ? They are Thine—they are called by Thy Name—and lo ! they are trodden down of all. This shall not be ! Strengthen my arm, O LORD, and I will go forth to fight against this people ! Let it be mine to release Thy servants from this cruel bondage. I will seek an opportunity to go forth against them, and do Thou deliver them into my hand. Here, before Thee, and in Thy sight, I devote my life to this thing. Thou helping me, my countrymen shall still be delivered.”

His voice, his manner, were full of enthusiasm and fire. And as he stood on that rocky pinnacle, his noble form thrown out in full relief against the dark forests that soared far up behind him, his arm uplifted to the clear heavens, he seemed one to prosecute and fulfil his high resolve.

For a moment only he stood thus, and then, with another glance at the caravan, now partly hidden by an intervening grove, he began a rapid descent. His feet soon trod the velvet turf below : and, with quick yet majestic steps, he proceeded in the direction of his distant home. His eyes were bent upon the ground, and his abstracted manner and working features indicated the revolution of some weighty project in his mind. Let us precede him to the humble abode from which we have been so long absent.

It is the hour of noon ; and upon the low seat before the shaded threshold Manoah and his wife are reposing themselves ere partaking of the mid-day meal, which a servant near them is busied in preparing. Time has touched them heavily since our eyes last beheld them. Manoah's once noble and erect form is now thin and spare, and somewhat bent with age. His eyes have lost much of their lustre, and his still bushy locks are of a snowy whiteness. His features have now an habitual shade of sadness, yet they are still the index of a calm and lofty mind.

Zillah is less changed. Her form is still unbent, and her hair dark and abundant. But her cheek is very thin, and its roses all faded away. There is still a light in her dark eye, but its glance is inexpressibly sad, and her pale lips have the patient compression of one who has known and endured much sorrow. Altogether she has the air of one who is living under the cloud of a great disappointment, yet through its thick gloom catches still some gleams of the sunshine of hope.

She is gazing with an earnest yet distrustful glance along the path that winds away through the shaded vistas of their orchard of fig and pomegranate-trees, and adown the green pastures beyond, as though in ill-founded expectation of the coming of some absent one. Turning to her husband, she said, in a somewhat anxious voice : “ Sawest thou the course our boy took when he went forth this morning ? ”

“ Nay, my Zillah. He attended me in my walk to the pasture ; but, when I paused to give some directions to the shepherd-boy concerning the flock, he left my side, and when I sought him he was gone.”

“ And thou knowest not when he may return ? ” she continued, musingly.

“ He told me nothing. Indeed, I doubt he intended to journey anywhere, when he strayed from me. But some fancy entered his young brain, I suppose, and he hath gone whithersoever it led. He useth not to think overmuch upon the inclination of the moment, as thou well knowest, but is roving as the mountain kid, and seemeth to feel quite as free to follow the promptings of his own will. And, for one so young, it is a wild and strong one.”

“ Thy words are but too true, my husband, as I have long known to the sorrow of my heart. It is very heavy, Manoah, and so it hath been long. Alas ! it hath learned much since the happy night when we walked together from the field whence the Angel of God had flown back to the sky. Rememberest thou not the pity—the almost sorrow—of his gaze, as he was parted from us? Did he not foresee the sorrow that hung its cloud over the future we thought so bright: the thorns that lurked in the path where we saw only flowers—the flowers of ungathered, untasted joys? It must have been so. I saw it, and wondered for its cause, but my heart was too happy to divine it aright. I thought only of the mother's bliss that was to be mine. I thought I could but be happy in my child."

"And hast thou not been happy?" asked Manoaah, half sadly, half reprovingly.

"Even so, my husband," she replied, thoughtfully. "I have known such joy as only mothers feel. His helpless infancy, his innocent childhood, were one long day, upon which the sun of my happiness never set. His affection, the dawning power of his mind, the hopes they kindled of a glorious future, were a well-spring of joy, at which my thirsty soul drank full deeply. Then, too, his beauty was for my fond eyes a continual feast. But another cup hath since been lifted to my lips, and from its bitter rim I have tasted such sorrows as wring only a mother's heart. His opening manhood hath not justified the promise of his earlier years. True, his affection seems undiminished; he is yet a duteous son, and, but that he has never learned to control the impulses of his impetuous nature, would be an obedient one. His mind, too, is one of wondrous quickness and intelligence. Wherever he goes, all eyes are fixed upon him with admiration, and every tongue is busy in his praise. Yet, thinkest thou, my husband," and the tears gushed from her eyes, "that he seemeth as he who shall be the Deliverer of Israel?"

"I share thy griefs and thy anxieties, my own Zillah," he replied, "yet I think thou errest in that thou dost already despair of the end. He is a child of promise, and the LORD is mighty to work His gracious ends by his hands. Perchance we did not rightly understand the words of the angel concerning him. He may be a deliverer, yet altogether a temporal one. And for such he seems fitted. His strength of body, his capacity for the endurance of hardships, the eloquence of his speech, the power he has over the minds of all, render him one to control and direct such a movement. And I think his desire to remove hence to the country of our brethren is the prompting of the Spirit of the LORD. In this remote part of Israel he is too far removed from our oppressors to do ought for our deliverance. There, from the mountains of Dan, he can overlook their rich plains and goodly cities, and like an eagle from his cliff swoop down upon them with the followers that shall be his, if so be that the LORD hath given this work into his hand."

"Thinkest thou this? Yet it is well said, my husband. He may indeed thus make him a great and glorious name. But, though I should hail the freedom of my people from their present bondage as an evidence of his returning favour, I would not regard it as the work for which my child was born. True, it is a part of it, an important part; but I looked that he should be the spiritual, as well as the temporal, Saviour of his people. I thought to see the idle shrines of our conquerors everywhere cast down, and the altars of the God of Israel reared in their stead. I thought to see our backsliding brethren, now almost entirely gone aside after these lying vanities, brought back to their duty and their God by his bright example, and the evidence that the hand of the LORD was upon him. To be released from the iron tyranny of Philistia will be a great deliverance; but to have our once fair land purified from its wicked idolatry, its violence and fraud, its unnatural feuds, would be a far greater. It was for this I chiefly longed; and it is hard, very hard, to think it may never be."

"Thou knowest the gracious will of God concerning us," said Manoaah, soothingly. "I trust the Lord will influence him for good, and make him the instrument of gracious purposes toward us. I fear lest we are to blame for his apparently wild and unstable character. He has been the child of our old age, and we may have been unwisely tender of his faults. A more judicious training would perhaps have developed a different character—one better fitted for the mission I still trust it is his to perform. Let us pray that such a neglect of our duty may not be punished by the blasting of our fair hopes. His attachment to the religion of his fathers, and the uncompromising hostility he has ever manifested toward our invaders. And I think it most wise that we should not thwart his desire for a sojourn among our distant brethren. Peradventure he is led by the spirit of the LORD, and we shall be found fighting against God. He shall go thither; we also will accompany him, and, if He so please, our bones shall rest there, for the men of the land are our brethren. We have kinsmen there also. But see, my Zillah, our boy is coming down the mountain path."

Zillah looked, and a mother's pride came back to her heart, the smile to her lip, as she gazed upon his approaching form. Every movement was full of eagerness and vivacity, and characterized by a wild and all-pervading grace. His cheeks were flushed, his eyes sparkling, and there was a bright smile upon his face, which was subdued as he drew near and saluted his parents with a manner whose affectionate warmth was tempered and restrained by a beautiful degree of reverential tenderness.

"Thy mother's heart hath been troubled concerning thee, Samson," said Manoah, gravely. "We neither knew thy departure, nor the time when thou mightest return. Thou dealest not well by us, my son."

"Thy rebuke is just, my father," replied Samson, while an ingenuous blush mounted to his downcast eyes. "Yet"—and he raised his clear eyes, the very mirror of truth, and bent them upon his father's face—"when I left thee I thought not to go farther than to drink at the brook. But I lifted up mine eyes, and they rested upon the high rock of Siddim. I knew that many had sought in vain to climb to its top, and I felt a longing to stand thereon. So before I knew my resolve I was on my way thither."

"And didst thou essay to scale its steep sides?" said Zillah, in a voice of ill-disguised wonder and alarm.

"I did, my mother."

"And wherefore?" she questioned. "What was to be gained by the perilous ascent? The enjoyment of a fine view for a moment! The empty fame of a foolishly daring exploit afterward! I would a nobler ambition were thine!"

Again a deep blush suffused his manly cheeks, and looking down he was silent.

"Then, too, my son," she resumed, it was a feat full of danger. Hadst thou accomplished it, the descent might have cost thee thy life. Didst thou have no thought of the grief that would then wring the hearts of thy parents? Had some great issue depended upon the attempt and its success—if it would have been productive of some real and needed good to thyself and others—I should applaud the daring spirit that undertook, the persevering labor that only desisted when thy powers of body failed. But there was nothing worthy of thy desire to be obtained; and to risk thy life in such an idle freak was sinful. But thy dress bears no mark of rough climbing, nor thy body of fatigue. I wist thy journey proved a bootless one. Didst soon leave off the task, convinced of thine own folly?"

"Not till I stood upon the summit," he replied with a quiet smile.

"And thou didst really reach the top!" she exclaimed, while a flush of gratified pride mounted her thin cheek, somewhat at variance with her former grave reproof. But she checked her involuntary admiration, and said, gravely, "Though I marvel at thy success, I praise thee not. Ah, my son, the child of many prayers, why dost thou not turn the talents God hath given thee to higher, nobler aims? Is there no work for thee to do? Is there no enterprise worthy of thy powers of mind and body? Have I not told thee, my son, the wondrous story of thy birth—of the words of the LORD by the mouth of His angel? By his command thou hast been kept a Nazarite from thy birth. But there is one thing I have never told thee. I have kept it from thee, for I feared lest I should err in revealing it. Yet thou art now grown well-nigh to man's estate; and, if thou hast a work to perform, it is time that thou address thyself thereto."

While she spoke, Samson's face had undergone a complete change. There was at first a half-restiveness at rebuke; then his impatience was melted by her tenderness, and his dark eyes became liquid in their soft light. As she proceeded, they lighted up with determination; and, when she spoke of the yet unrevealed page in his destiny, his whole frame quivered with the fire of suppressed eagerness. When she ceased, he said, in a voice of forced calmness—for in them the wisdom of age is blended with a parent's tenderness. Thy rebuke is deserved, and I bow before it. I feel that I have too long wasted time which is precious, for life is short. But this day I have resolved to devote my life to an end I trust thou wilt think a worthy one. I have chosen a service, and have sworn before the LORD that I will devote myself thereto. I may not draw back therefrom while life remains and the end is unattained. I would thou hadst made this thing known unto me, for how may I break my oath with Him, if it agreeth not thereto?"

"Thy words are good, my mother,

"Again thou hast been rash, my son," said Manoah, solemnly. "An oath is a sacred thing, and thou hast done ill in that thou advisest not with us, before thou didst bind thyself therewith. The LORD hath a work for thee to do, as He foretold us. We have waited to see in thee the spirit He would choose, before it was told thee. But now thou hast chosen another service for thyself. Tell me the burden of thine oath."

In a low but firm voice, Samson replied, "I have sworn to devote my life to the task of driving out the heathen from among us — to put down these proud idolaters, the Philistines—to set Israel free."

"Now may the LORD bless thee, my son, for these thy words!" cried Zillah, throwing herself upon his heaving bosom, and clasping his neck. "For it was even this that His messengers spake concerning thee. He said thou shouldst begin to deliver Israel from the hands of the Philistines. Go forth, my son, to conquer, for the LORD is with thee, and will abundantly bless thee."

A look of indescribable relief passed over the face of Samson, followed by one of deep thankfulness, of joyful self-surrender. "Then it was of the Lord I did this thing," he exclaimed, and my vow hath found acceptance in His sight."

"I humbly trust it is even so, my son," said Manoah, embracing him. "But thou hast entered into a solemn covenant — one that, neglected and broken, will recoil in fearful judgments upon thine own head. Mayest thou"—and he raised his trembling hands in blessing—"have strength from Him to fulfil thy mission faithfully, nobly, well! The LORD bless thee, my son! The LORD lift upon thee the light of His countenance, and give thee peace, now and for evermore!"

RUTH.

(KNEELING AND ROCKING THE CRADLE.)

WHAT is the little one thinking about?

Very wonderful things, no doubt,

Unwritten history!

Unfathomable mystery!

Yet he laughs and cries, and eats and drinks,
And chuckles and crows, and nods and winks,

As if his head were as full of kinks,
And curious riddles as any sphinx!

Warped by colic, and wet by tears,
Punctured by pins, and tortured by fears,
Our little nephew will lose two years;
And he'll never know

Where the Summers go;

He need not laugh, for he'll find it so!

Who can tell what a baby thinks?

Who can follow the gossamer links

By which the mannikin feels his way

Out from the shore of the great unknown,
Blind, and wailing, and alone,

Into the light of day?

Out from the shore of the unknown sea,
Tossing in pitiful agony—

Of the unknown sea that reels and rolls,
Specked with the barks of little souls—

Barks that were launched on the other side,
And slipped from heaven on an ebbing tide!

What does he think of his mother's eyes?

What does he think of his mother's hair?

What of the cradle roof that flies

Forward and backward through the air?

What does he think of his mother's breast—

Bare and beautiful, smooth and white,

Seeking it ever with fresh delight—

Cup of his life and couch of his rest?

What does he think when her quick embrace

Presses his hand, and buries his face

Deep where the heart throbs sink and swell

With a tenderness she can never tell,

Though she murmur the words

Of all the birds—

Words she has learned to murmur well?

Now he thinks he'll go to sleep!

I can see the shadow creep

Over his eyes, in soft eclipse,

Over his brow, and over his lips,

Out of his little finger-tips!

Softly sinking, down he goes!

Down he goes! down he goes!

"EVERY BULLET HAS ITS BILLET."

THERE is not a blow struck anywhere in the universe that does not tell. Force cannot be imparted without being received. Not a shot fired, whether deliberately aimed or discharged at random, but finds somewhere a body to which it imparts its momentum. The existence of an actor, implies the existence of something that is passive. Where there is a subject, there is an object; where there is a bullet, there is a billet.

The universe is made up of a grand series of reciprocal influences, and under a great variety of forms, continually exhibits a repetition of the radical ideas of action and reaction. In the midst of the grand network of systems and their centres, planets and satellites, we find nothing unnecessary or unimportant; no particle that does not play its part and sustain a fixed and necessary relation to every other division of the stupendous whole. In the vast circle of influences, centrifugal and centripetal, there is no force that is not felt. Natural Philosophy tells us that we cannot even spring upward without kicking the world from under our feet.

Every particle which assists in composing the mass of our globe, exerts an influence not only on other members of our system, but on every other body in the universe. It is a thought both curious and pleasing, that the material of our bodies assists in holding the queen of night in her orbit around the earth, modifies the motions of Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn, and extends its influence even to the last star—if such indeed there be—so that, physically speaking, our influence is felt throughout the universe.

The faintest vibration imparted to the air by a sonorous body, doubtless extends to the limits of the atmosphere, where it yields to boundless space and eternal darkness. It is true the effect produced soon becomes too faint to make any impression upon the gross ear of man; but no one dare say that infinite skill could not fashion an ear so delicate that it could not hear the tick of a watch, from one boundary of the atmosphere to the other, or from one point of its maximum to that of its minimum density. We are by no means justified in inferring from the fact that we do not hear it, that the vibration has ceased entirely. When once imparted it is probably never lost, so long as there is an atmosphere however rare to transmit it. Of the probability of this we are furnished with the strongest possible evidence from a case precisely analogous. Far the greater part of the heavenly bodies with which observation has made us acquainted, are invisible to the unassisted eye, but become visible with the aid of a telescope,—showing plainly that rays of light reach us from those orbs, but require to be concentrated before they make an impression upon our organs of vision sufficient to claim the attention of the mind. Viewing thus the mighty abyss of the worlds which rise successively to our sight, as the magnifying power of the glass is increased, we are at length forced to the conclusion, that the most remote body in the universe sends rays to our visual organs, though they have become so attenuated, that no glass that we can command possesses power of concentration sufficient to enable them to make any impression.

These illustrations borrowed from material nature, exhibit in the strongest light the universality, extent, and imperishability of influence. When man walks the earth, worm as he is, it trembles beneath him, and the universe vibrates in unison. It is so in the social and the moral world. There is not a thought that occupies the mind, that does not make its mark upon the mental constitution. The effect may be imperceptible—but it is like the dropping of water upon a rock—every drop must remove a particle, otherwise its continuance would not wear the mass away. There is not an emotion however faint and transient that stirs the breast, which does not leave its impress, more or less delible and durable, upon the moral character. No act is performed by any voluntary agent without affecting, for good or evil, in most cases, both the actor and others. There is not a word spoken, not a sentiment uttered, that does not tell for weal or woe on the character both of the speaker and the hearer. In the nature of things, the bullet must find its billet.

Most probably no one has ever fully esteemed and appreciated the possible influence and significance of a simple thought, word, or deed. A thought which has once gained possession of the mind, may haunt it like an avenging spectre, [during long, long years of wretchedness — driving the victim fatally onward to intemperance, madness, or crime—poisoning every source of pleasure, and dashing with its incomparable bitterness every cup of joy offered to his lips. One word carelessly, thoughtlessly, or foolishly spoken, may fall upon the ear of some one to whom it may become an adder, infusing its venom into all the warm currents of his being, twining its cold slimy folds around his vitals, and crushing slowly but steadily out all that is good, and pure, and noble in his nature, till he who was once a man of high and honorable feelings has become almost a fiend. Yet even when thus debased and degraded, a magic word which touches and thrills some chord away down in his heart, unswept for years, may break the spell and give the first impulse to a revolution which will restore to good the sceptre of his soul.

It is the characteristic only of a weak and narrowed mind to despise small things. There is nothing in nature so small as to be trifling, unimportant, or insignificant. Supposing light to be a material emanation, how inconceivably small must be one of its particles from the star of the fifteenth or sixteenth magnitude; and yet who can fully estimate all the direct and indirect consequences of its mission to us; upon our minds by giving them higher and more comprehensive ideas of the universe, and attracting them on from world to world, blazing upon their far off stations, till exhausted by their toilsome and interminable flight, they yield at last and grant that matter is boundless, and its Author infinite, perfect, and eternal? That little ray which has come from a region which thought in the midst of all its vast researches has never explored, opens to our expanding and delighted minds, a new field for investigation—a new ground for adoration and praise to nature's beneficent Author.

Those subtle and mysterious agencies around us called miasmata, too delicate to be grasped by any of our senses, and of which we would have no knowledge, but for an acquaintance with their causes and their effects, are found to exert the most powerful influence over our health and enjoyment. The grosser forms of matter are not to be compared with them in the might of their influence. There is a malaria precisely analogous in the social world. It is that which arises from stagnant hearts: where love of virtue, truth, honour and manly principle, is slowly drying up. It is vain to hope to be near them and not suffer in moral health from the exhalations. We cannot palliate or secretly sympathize with immorality or crime, without making a step toward loving and embracing them. Every man holds, to no small extent, in his own hands, the destinies of those with whom he associates. They may be guarded against any improper sentiment he may utter, or anything positively vicious in his conduct: but aside from all this, he exerts a mighty influence by the very smile that plays upon his lips, by the light that flashes in his eye, and by the expression which is spread over the whole countenance. There is an electric current of intensified mental feeling which is communicated to his associate, and affects the delicate poles of his susceptible nature. Better far to expose one in whose prosperity and happiness we are interested to a fatal malaria, than to the more deadly and deplorable influence of a corrupt and degraded associate. The tender mind of youth especially, cannot be too sedulously guarded from contact with evil—for a chord in its constitution once struck, may continue to vibrate for ever, and if snapped asunder can never be replaced. "Ce n' est que le premier pas qui coute," says a French proverb—it is only the first step in vice that is taken with hesitation. The second is easier, and the third easier still. Nothing, then, can be of greater importance than to guard the inexperienced mind against the influence of corrupt principles and corrupting examples, till it has acquired that firmness and stability necessary to a successful resistance. Let all whose task it is to educate the mind and heart, ever remember that here, as elsewhere, every shot is sure of its mark, that "every bullet has its billet."

LIGHT AND SHADOWS.

HARK! the bell tolls—my friend is dead. He was good and aged, and like a shock of corn fully ripe, he has been gathered in. He had his troubles and his triumphs. His days were not always days of sunshine; dark clouds often hung o'er his pathway, and the waves of trouble did frequently beat against his soul. He was often cast down, but not destroyed; and sometimes his spirit was bowed down within him. But his heart was right with God; he firmly held to the one hope, and though the world perplexed and Satan tempted, he could always say, "I know in whom I have believed." The shadow of poverty had cast its deep shades upon his prospects, and he was led for a moment to doubt; he dreaded the future, and his faith was almost dead. But the light shone, and he thought of and trusted in Him who heareth the young ravens when they cry, and in whose hands are the issues of life. The blessed truths and promises of the Bible proved to be a light unto his feet and a lamp unto his path, and he felt the presence and the love of God; and by the mercy of his Heavenly Father, he was enabled to continue in the good hope to the end of his journey, until his spirit, with all the strength and triumph of a conqueror, shook off the trammels of mortality, and winged its flight to glory and to God. There are shadows for us all; they constitute a necessary element in the Christian's experience. It is not always that the soul can rejoice in the God of its salvation. In this state we are not always free from the influence and power of the world. There are internal conflicts and external foes, and sometimes the solemn work of self-examination will make us feel how verily guilty we must be in the eyes of a pure and holy God. There may have been no actual sin committed, and to the eye of the world all may appear commending and beautiful; but there is a state of soul which presents itself to the eye of self-examination, which must be deeply deplored. When the soul is thus oppressed and afflicted, all things appear gloomy and sad. Nature, to a very great extent, loses her charms. The pure smile of friendship seems but to mock the feelings within, and the bright sun of day, and the beautiful stars of night, fail to quicken the spirit to the awakenings of rapture and love. The prayers of the church fall like lead upon the ears, and the praises of Zion have almost lost their charms. The bread of the sacred feast is taken with a trembling hand, and there is a great fear that the memorials of a Saviour's love may be taken unworthily. In the presence of the church the lips are sealed and the soul is sad. Deep shadows are in our pathway. The soul seems to be in a dark prison-house, where it is continually haunted by the fiend of despair, and the prospects are all gloomy. The Word of Truth becomes a two-edged sword; it is quick and powerful; it is a searching spirit, and with irresistible power it enters all the secret chambers of the soul. Evil passions and unholy thoughts dare not encounter the glance of its eye, and all that is sinful trembles at its holy rebuke. There is no secret recess of the heart, the door of which it does not open—no secret thought which it does not approve or condemn. It is the light of the Lord entering the dark soul of man, and it reveals to us the leaven of corruption, which, if not put away, must bring forth death. The Bible is divine. It comprehends all the affections, habits, and desires of the soul. Its truths purify the heart, and when improper feelings are cherished, they are immediately condemned by the law and the testimony. There is a state of the soul when its warnings paralyse and its promises pierce. But thanks be to God, the time of deliverance will come. In the deepest shades of sorrow it has not been all darkness; there was a faint ray of light from the Sun of Righteousness which penetrated the soul, giving evidence of its connection with God. It seemed almost a total eclipse, but it was not so; for when the dark shadows were full-orbed, we saw to our great joy that they were encircled by the light divine. It was the light shining in a dark place, and we heard a voice saying, "I am the light of the world."—"He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."—"Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." These are soul-cheering promises, full of life. What a happiness it is when the soul can fully realize them! Then it is when "the day breaks and the shadows flee away." His place is vacant on the Lord's day morning. What has detained him? He is not worshipping with those whom he loves. The trial of affliction hath fallen upon him. He is now prostrate and helpless. God is teaching him a deeper lesson of trust and dependence. He sees now how uncertain is health, and how quickly he may be brought to the confines of the grave. His body is racked with pain; his wife stands by his bed-side like a kind angel of love, and his soul feels near to the spirit-world. He seems to be close upon the dark shadow of the valley of death, but he fears no evil. Yet there are earthly ties which bind him, and the soul struggles between earth and heaven. Here in the dark school of affliction, what sad and practical lessons are taught. Man is made weak, that the strength and power of God may be seen—and when he cannot lift his head, the arms of Jehovah will encompass him. Thus when strength and health are fled, the faithful servant can say, "The Lord is my strength and my portion for ever." The shadow passes away—he is now again in the sanctuary of the Lord, and by his speech we learn that it has been good for him. His sentences evince that his heart has been greatly affected, and that all the loving and deeper sympathies of his nature have been exercised and disciplined with the happiest results; and the church can hear how the spirit felt when close to the eternal world. The heart of the restored one is filled with gratitude and love, and these, combined with the joy of the wife and the hope of the children, tell us that the shadows of night have fled, and joy cometh in the morning. See that fond mother; her heart is almost broken—her darling child is very ill, and of its recovery there is little hope. How suddenly the change has come; but yesterday, and the dear child was well. But now there is the burning flush of fever—the dry troublesome cough—the light of the eye has become dim—and the once active little hands are helpless. How she watches the object of her love! What care and intense anxiety are manifest! How she infolds the darling in her arms, and the watches of the night witness her unremitting care. The tear startles—she watches and sighs, and in the silence of midnight she thinks she hears the footsteps of the angel of death, who is coming to take up to heaven her darling treasure. "Yes, yea," she exclaims, "I am afraid my child will die.—And shall the darling object of my love be entombed?—shall my little, prattling, curly-haired, playful and happy child become the inmate of the cold and unsocial grave?" Be patient, mother—perhaps thou hast loved that child too much, and this affliction is sent to show you how uncertain all things are in this world. The shadows are falling upon you, but the dear child is not dead—it is sleeping—and soon, very soon, it shall awake therefrom. God shall be better to thee than thy fears. Can you trust in Him? Have you abandoned all earthly dependence? Do you feel that God only can bless you? Can you, in sincerity, pour out your soul to Him, and contemplating the most solemn issue, unite with good old Job in saying—“The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away—blessed be the name of the Lord!” When all earthly help has gone, the Christian’s soul will rest on God. Fond mother, place thy drooping head upon the bosom of thy Lord. Be strong in the faith, and He will never leave thee nor forsake thee. Thy spirit is now in the land of shadows; but the light will break forth, if not in this world, your spirit, if you are faithful unto death, shall be suffused with a flood of glory, and then in the light of heaven and the presence of God, thou shalt embrace thy little one in the realm of bliss. Though darkness may now surround His throne, and judgment be His strange work, then the throne shall be encircled with eternal light, and pure love shall reign for ever and ever. Here we weep—there we shall rejoice. Here death is before us—in that world there will be no more death. Here we are wanderers—there we shall be at home. Here death is our end—there will be eternal life. Here friends may prove false—there all are sincere. Here we have clouds to encompass us—there we shall live in the pure light of the Sun of Righteousness. Here we struggle—there we shall have become conquerors through the blood of the Lamb. What a solemn thought it is, that we are all travelling towards heaven or hell, and that a few moments may involve us in the issues which are eternal. Here we shall not escape from troubles—sin and death are the reigning powers of the earth; but the time will come when we shall be free. The church militant is the holy place where the soul can breathe freely, where it feels a sense of pardoned sin and forgiving love, and where it hopes for the joys which pertain to the kingdom of heaven. What plagues there are in this world through which we are passing! What lurking and unseen enemies! What a host of moral highway robbers! What dastardly assassinations of character—what cunning and deliberate perversions—what false professions—what treacherous plans—what secret schemes, and what questionable designs! Almighty Father! Thou who art the searcher of all hearts, we pray Thee to deliver us from such snares of the Devil. Keep our hearts from sin, subdue our evil passions, and enable us to forgive those who trespass against us, that we may be useful in our passing day, and do all to the praise and glory of Thy great name! This may be suitable language for some, who seem to flourish like a green bay tree, and whose rejoicings are seen in the sanctuary of God. Let us prize the precious volume, and hold fast the form of sound words. May its truths be bound to our hearts, and penetrate all the chambers of the soul. It tells us poor pilgrims of the rest which remains for the people of God, and it opens the gates of Heaven to all who believe and obey. It is our best and only certain guide. Its truths are brighter than the sun at mid-day, and its promises are full of life. It is our beacon, our life-boat, our anchor, our pilot, our compass, and our star. It is the guide of our youth, the strength of our manhood, the staff of our age, the light of our minds, the hope of our souls, and our comfort in death; and it ever points us to that world of bliss where there are no shadows, where the angels and happy spirits dwell. The church is on the border of the spirit-land. Death kindly opens the door through which we enter into the city of God. Let us be patient, and we shall soon join the glorified spirits of those of whom it is said, “Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.”

Spiritual death is a separation of the affections from God—physical death, or the extinction of bodily life, has no effect in changing the spiritual man into unconsciousness.

Never forsake a friend. When enemies gather around, and sickness falls on the heart, is the time to try friendship. He who turns from distress, was moved only by self-interest.

A. CAMPBELL'S PROPOSAL FOR DISCUSSION DISPOSED OF.

LETTER TO A. CAMPBELL.

I PERCEIVE by your Harbinger of this month, sent to me, I presume, by its conductors, that you have called upon me through its columns to meet you in a public oral debate, on the "positive issues" between the religious communities to which we respectively belong. I frankly avow the habitual sorrow I feel in view of the divided condition of the professed followers of Christ—and I yield not a whit to yourself in "most cordially desiring Christian union, communion, and co-operation with all the children of God." Nor would I be willing to yield to any, in honest, earnest, faithful efforts, on wise plans, and by effective means, to bring about such harmony of religious views and practices as might tend to reduce, if not destroy, the existing divisions and discords among all people calling themselves Christians.

While I hold myself to these professions, it is proper to say, that it has long been my settled conviction, that public oral discussions between champions of religious parties have always, in our day, been attended with quite as much evil as good. I, therefore, question both the wisdom and the effectiveness of such a method as you propose, for the adjustment of the actual issues between your people and us. I should do so, indeed, were the issues between us as determinate, definite, "positive" as you seem to suppose; but unsettled, indeterminate, unadmitted, as they generally are, a public oral debate would be likely to result only in increased discordance, alienation, and strife, particularly in the locality where it might be held.

Perhaps you may feel inclined to reject the idea that our differences are in such an undefined condition, for you speak of them as "positive issues" in your call upon me. But I assure you that no intelligent man among us would accept these issues as stated. And I have observed that no man among us has ever yet been able to state these issues as to be acceptable to you. Issues, to be debatable, must be conceded, as stated, by both parties. That we have not reached this definiteness in the issues between us must be obvious. Why else have the writers and speakers on both sides of these subjects, continual occasion to charge each other with either misapprehension or misrepresentation? Were the issues definite, the parties could surely apprehend them. The disagreement as to what we mutually hold and teach, cannot all be attributed to dishonesty and unfairness. While this state of things continues, it is hardly necessary to say that there can be no proper ground for either oral or written debate. I beg, therefore, to suggest, that if anything like a candid Christian effort is to be made, to harmonise the views of the two denominations, the first thing must be to endeavour to give definite expression to the true issues, as they actually exist, by the use of the common every-day language of men. These issues, whatever they are, doubtless originate in the difference of meaning we respectively attach to the language of Scripture. Language, whose import is the ground of the dispute, ought not, therefore, to be employed in the attempt to give one another our true conceptions of what the real points of difference are. This is too obvious not to be at once appreciated. All fair reasoners—all men who wish their thoughts to be distinctly apprehended—are willing to give their exact ideas in the plainest possible terms, so that the most ordinary mind can hardly fail to comprehend them.

If I mistake not, our best and ablest men have always complained of you on this score. They all, with one accord, allege that you express yourself ambiguously when writing or speaking on the questions in dispute. They generally believe, that under cover of adhering to Bible language in the expression of Bible things, as a fundamental principle of your reformation, you take advantage of the shelter its disputed meaning affords you. To this they ascribe their inability fairly to represent your views—and to this, also, they ascribe the advantage you often seem to gain, by making it appear that they have misrepresented you. To avoid all further imputation on this ground, and, if possible, to get the precise differences, that they may be fairly discussed, and with greater promise to the cause of truth in future, I propose that the issues be spread before your readers, not in Bible language, for the reason above given, but in the plain language of common life. To afford you the occasion for doing so fully, I will state the real points of antagonism between us, as they appear from our point of view, showing at the same time, their undebatable condition in their present form. Our respective communions ought to know, if possible, the exact state of their mutual positions and differences. This, of itself, would be a great advantage to truth. Indeed, nothing satisfactorily can be reached until this is done. In the positions I shall take, I will presume to give expression to the sentiment of my brethren in Kentucky, as it is with special reference to this State that you call upon me.

It may be in place to promise that your views of spiritual influence, as stated in your debate with Dr. Rice at Lexington, were hailed by us for a time, as giving promise of a return on part of yourself and people, to a more scriptural, and to us, more acceptable position on that subject. We observe, however, with regret, that the mode of presenting it there, seems to be neither current nor acceptable among you. I must, therefore, with frankness, present the issue on this point, as well as issues on other points, as they now present themselves to us.

First. We understand you to believe and to teach that the Holy Spirit, having furnished the inspired Scriptures, does nothing further by his personal, active agency, to prepare the sinner for baptism.

That you so believe and teach, we conclude from the frequency with which we hear such language as this: "The Spirit of God puts forth all its converting and sanctifying power in the words which it fills with its ideas." "If the Old and New Testaments contain all the arguments which can be offered to reconcile man to God then all the power of the Holy Spirit which can operate on the human mind is spent." "We plead that all the converting power of the Holy Spirit is exhibited in the Divine record."

This language first appeared in the Christian Baptist, pp. 350-1, and is now current among your people. We are aware that, after the manner of evangelical ministers and Christians generally, you and your brethren often say that "the Spirit operates through the truth." But you evidently do not attach the same meaning to the same language that others do. They mean by it that there is a present personal agency of the Spirit along with the inspired word, operating by means of the truth through it. We understand you to allow no present, active agency of the Spirit in producing faith and repentance. Your position is, as we understand you, that the sinner needs no present agency of the Spirit, and therefore, none is put forth to insure his conversion.

You have expressed yourself thus in the Christian Baptist, p. 259: "Can men, just as they are found when they hear the gospel, believe? I answer, boldly, yes;—just as easily as I can believe the well attested facts concerning the person and achievements of General Washington."

In Kentucky we join issue with your people on this point. We believe and teach that the Scriptures warrant the idea that there arises from man's sinfulness a necessity for a present, personal, active agency of the Spirit, operating with, by, or through the truth, on the mind of the sinner, and that such agency is actually put forth in every case of genuine preparation for baptism. The mode of the operation of this agency is not revealed, nor do we pretend to determine how it takes place. Thus far we perceive a distinct antagonism between you and us. But the antagonism becomes less distinct, and we, not a little puzzled, when we read in your debate with Dr. Rice: "I believe the Spirit accompanies the Word, is always present with the Word, and actually and personally works through it upon the moral nature of man," p. 745. And again, "I would not, Sir, value at the price of a single mill, the religion of any man, as respects the grand affair of eternal life, whose religion is not begun, carried on, and completed by the personal agency of the Holy Spirit," p. 614. This is precisely our ground, expressed in the very language we habitually employ. Abide by this view and by this mode of expressing it, and no issue exists between us on this subject. I cannot refrain, however, from saying that, were any writer among us to write as differently on this point as you have done in the Christian Baptist, and in the debate with Rice, we should all regard him as having irreconcilably contradicted himself; and that, were he persistently to adhere to both ways of writing, as either reconcilable or correct, we should regard him as placing himself beyond all the usual laws that govern men in expressing their thoughts.

Secondly. We understand you to believe and to teach, that under the Christian dispensation, no rational, accountable sinner can be pardoned, however he may believe and repent, till he submits to immersion.

That you so believe and teach we determine by such language as the following: "That it is not faith, but an act resulting from faith, which changes our state, we shall not attempt to prove" (Prop. 9, Christian System, p. 202.) As part of this proof (page 203) we read: "They ('the Pentecostian hearers') were informed, that though they now believed and repented, they were not pardoned; but must reform and be immersed for the remission of sins." Further on: "This act of faith was presented, as that act in which a change in their state could be effected; or, in other words, by which alone they could be pardoned." In Lard's "Review on Campbellism Examined," endorsed by yourself, (page 193) it is affirmed that Acts ii. 38 "makes remission depend on baptism in precisely the same sense in which it makes it depend on repentance." On page 197 we read: "The relation of baptism to remission of sins is such that baptism, like repentance, is necessary to remission."

We concede that there is here a "positive issue" between you and us. The only literal passages on which you claim to rest your position are these: "John did baptise in the wilderness, and preach baptisma metanoias eis aphesin amartion, the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins" (Mark i. 4.) "He came into all the country about Jordan, preaching baptisma metanoias eis aphesin amartion, the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins" (Luke iii. 3.) "Then Peter said unto them, (metanoesate) repent and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, (eis aphesin amartion) for the remission of sins" (Acts ii. 38.) There being no other passage, with a literal meaning, bearing on the subject, whether your view be correct depends on the construction put upon these three. Now, we maintain that the proper construction is, to connect eis aphesin amartion, for the remission of sins, with metanoias, repentance, and not with baptisma, baptism, in the two former of these; and with metanoesate, repent ye, and not with baptistheontes, be baptized, in the latter. John did, indeed, preach the "baptism of repentance" (Acts xiii. 24, xix. 4.) He even baptized "unto repentance" (Mat. iii. 11.) But he never preached the "baptism of remission," nor baptized "for, or unto remission." When, as in Mark i. 4, and in Luke iii. 3, he preached "the baptism of repentance," it was the baptism of such repentance as secures the remission of sins. It was the baptism of such "repentance" as was attended with "fruits worthy" of itself (Luke iii. 8.) John taught that repentance, evincing the proper character, secured remission of sins; that such repentance only was a qualification for his baptism: and his baptism was a baptism of such repentance only. This dependence of "remission" on "repentance," and not on baptism, is the uniform teaching of the Bible, as the following examples will indicate: "That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name" (Luke xxiv. 47.) "Repent and be converted — literally, repent and turn, that your sins may be blotted out" (Acts iii. 19.) "To give repentance to Israel and remission of sins" (Acts v. 31.) "Repent therefore, of — apo, from — this, thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee" (Acts viii. 22.) Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life" (Acts xi. 18.) A repentance unto life is certainly a repentance unto remission of sins. Now Acts ii. 38 is to be construed in harmony with the teaching of John, and the general tenor of Scripture as here given. Peter exhorted his inquiring auditors to repent for the remission of sins, and in a parenthetical clause, whose entire grammatical construction is different, enjoins each (hekastos) every one of them, thus penitent and forgiven, to "be baptized (epi) on the name of Jesus Christ." This construction is natural, and the sense is in harmony with the literal teaching of the Word of God everywhere else on this subject.

This view of remission, or justification, in opposition to yours, receives confirmation from the fact that Paul, neither in his Epistle to the Romans, nor in that to the Galatians, where he formally discusses the subject at length, ever intimates the dependence of justification, or remission, on immersion. The only act, on the part of man, on which he makes it depend, is faith. An act on which Peter also makes it depend (Acts x. 43), "Whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." The conclusion is irresistible, that the real conditions on man's part, in order to the remission of sins, are repentance and faith, and not immersion. We do not, however, undervalue immersion. It occupies its own important place.

Your position on this subject, if firmly adhered to, as God's only method of pardoning sinners under the Gospel, compels you to hold and to teach that no Congregationalist, Methodist, Presbyterian, or Baptist is pardoned; that, therefore, salvation is impossible in their several communions. To admit that pardon and salvation are, or may be, realized through the truth which they believe on this point, would be to admit, not only that contradictory truths may exist, but that they may and do produce the same effects. This would destroy the distinction between truth and error. This very admission, however, you make, and with it logically destroy this important distinction.

You say, in your "Christian Baptism," page 16, "Amongst them all," the communions (except the Baptist) just named, and others, "we thank the grace of God that there are many who believe in and love the Saviour, and that, though we may not have Christian churches, we have many Christians." You hold in this very number of the Harbinger, page 283, and correctly, that it is not the "mere act or fact of believing," but the thing believed that contains "the efficacy." Now, do you not by your admission, that "we have many Christians" in these religious communities, hold, also, that the contradictory things, or "facts" believed, have the same "efficacy," and produce identical effects; that, in short, views contradictory to yours are of the same "value" and efficacy with yours?—producing "many Christians," as well your own views. To maintain consistency on this subject, you must reverse your views of faith, and hold that it is not "the person, fact, or event believed," but the "act or fact of believing" that contains the efficacy.

Consistency demands that you shall uniformly inform all men, to whatever denomination they may belong beyond your own, as Peter did his "Pentecostian" inquirers. "They were informed," you say, Christian System, p. 203, "that though they now believed and repented, they were not pardoned; but must reform and be immersed for the remission of sins." You should faithfully and invariably present "this act of faith as that act by which alone they could (can) be pardoned"—and become entitled to the appellation, "Christians," in common with those "whose state is changed," and who are, therefore, "pardoned, justified, sanctified, reconciled, adopted, and saved"—Christian System, p. 101. You should fearlessly inform them everywhere, as you do on the same page, that this act of faith necessarily becomes the line of discrimination between the two states that, "on this side and on that, mankind are in quite different states. On the one side they are pardoned, justified, sanctified, reconciled, adopted, saved: on the other, they are in a state of condemnation"—or, as you say on the preceding page, they "are still unpardoned, unjustified, unsanctified, unreconciled, unadopted, and lost to all Christian life and enjoyment."

But this clear, definite, unmistakable, strong language, no one but yourself would attempt to reconcile with your avowal in your debate with McCalla, p. 135, that "Paul's sins were really pardoned when he believed;" that is, as the connection plainly shows, previous to his immersion: nor with your avowal already quoted, that "we have many Christians," who neither believe in, nor submit to immersion. The truth is, were any of us to hold, as you do, that immersion is "the act of faith by which they alone could be pardoned"—that that "act of faith is necessarily the line of discrimination between the two states"—that, "on this side, and on that, mankind are in quite different states"—that "on the one side they are pardoned, justified, sanctified, reconciled, adopted, saved"—that "on the other, they are in a state of condemnation"—were any of us to hold all this, and at the same time to maintain, as you do, that "Paul's sins were really pardoned when he believed," and that "we have many Christians," who neither believe nor practice, but scornfully repudiate and denounce as unscriptural, both the alleged truth and practice of baptismal remission, we would hardly expect you, or any sane man, to debate with him, for the reason that he sufficiently refuted himself. In our estimation, your open communion practice also, is a standing practical contradiction to your avowed sentiment, that immersion is "necessarily the line of discrimination between the two states," separating the "pardoned" and the unpardoned, the "sanctified" and the unsanctified, the "saved" and the unsaved. We cannot conceive it possible that you really believe that "remission of sins is, in the Scriptures, made to depend on baptism in precisely the same sense in which it is made to depend on repentance" or faith. We feel persuaded that you would hardly feel it to be justifiable to administer the supper to any who should avow their total want of repentance or faith. But if remission be as dependent on immersion as on repentance, and in "precisely the same sense," we cannot see how you can consistently administer it to such as not only do not submit to "immersion for the remission of sins," but do not even believe in immersion, in any sense, as a scriptural duty, and are, therefore, according to you, on the wrong side of "the line of discrimination," and are, of course, "unpardoned, unjustified, unsanctified, unreconciled, unadopted, unsaved." And yet, your inviting them to the table of the Lord in your churches, is necessarily a recognition of their being, without baptism, on the right side of the "line of discrimination," and consequently, and in contradiction to your professed belief of their being actually "pardoned, justified, sanctified, reconciled, adopted, saved," simply on their faith and repentance. We cannot believe that the legs of the lame are equal. Men cannot be pardoned and unpardoned, adopted and unadopted, saved and unsaved, at the same time. A Presbyterian or a Methodist, simply with repentance and faith, must be on this or that side "the line of discrimination." He cannot be on both sides at once. He is either pardoned without immersion, making your "line of discrimination" a mere figment; or he is unpardoned, unsaved, having not submitted to immersion: making your "line" a reality and condemning your open communion practice. Take which horn you please. There are but two sides, and you seek to us to occupy both; and while you do so, a debate with you would be absurd.

You will perceive that everything tangible in your first, third, and fifth issues has now been presented in the light in which it appears from our standpoint. Your fourth issue can have no application to us. Ours is no "Papal baptism." While the common version has given currency to the word "in" among many of our brethren, they use it in no "Papal" sense. Dr. Wayland and many others of our best men, have always preferred "into." I, myself, have never used "in." Though I use "into," probably in a different sense from that attached to it by you. Your second issue, which is a reprobation of our "experience" of a gracious and saving change previous to baptism, arises from your views of depravity, spiritual influence, and baptismal remission. We do wonder that you have no such experience of grace yourselves, for your system does not, cannot produce it. But we do not wonder that you condemn ours, as you must see that it is as inseparable from our system, as it was from Paul's (Rom. vii. 7-13, Tim. ii. 13, and from Peter's 1st Epistle iii. 15, and Philip's, Acts viii. 37.) Such experience, moreover, is a personal thing—a thing of consciousness—a personal cognizance of the fruits of the Gospel in the "inner man"—the interior life. Now you, whose system cannot produce it, cannot be expected to require it, or to have it. At the same time, you can hardly expect that we will allow you to be judges of it. We hold you to be incapable—judging from your mistaken views of it, your opposition to it, and from the tendency of your system—of forming any correct judgment, or of making any positive affirmation respecting it. The subject is, therefore, not debatable between us.

You are strangers to it, and, of course, cannot comprehend it.

Your sixth and last issue, viz. "Weekly Communion," is no issue farther than that we allow the largest liberty respecting it. We do not discover that the Scriptures enjoin its weekly observance; but we are far from believing that they condemn it. Individual churches must decide for themselves as to their duty.

I have now disposed of the call you have made upon me, with the issues specified. I hope you will do me the justice to let me appear over my own signature, and in my own way, before your readers, that they may understand my position respecting the debate you have called for, and the issues it involves. I have endeavoured to avoid the use of coarse or offensive language. I have simply presented the points as they appear to me. If I have mistaken or misrepresented you or your communion in any respect, no one shall more fully regret it than myself when it is pointed out. Indeed, I have no motive to do you any wrong. All the intercourse I have ever had with yourself or your brethren has been courteous and pleasant. I number some of your communion among my most intimate and dearest social friends, and nothing would be more unpleasant to me, than to find that this frank and faithful expression of my views, when left no alternative by the public mode of your call, should occasion any diminution of the intimate social friendship that has heretofore existed.—Respectfully your's

D. R. CAMPBELL.

LETTER TO DR. CAMPBELL.

Your favour of the 21st ult. was a few days since received. But my engagements and calls abroad have delayed my response till to-day. I have carefully once read your elaborate communication on the premises submitted. I desired and do desire, not a controversy with you, but a candid perspicuous discussion of any issues doctrinal, which may be formed by mutual consent. Not, indeed, for your own specially, nor my own; but for the sake of the communities to which we respectively belong. I have been, in my own weak and imperfect way, advocating a reformation, not so much in doctrine, but for the advancement of the best interests of mankind, for the honour of our Lord and Master, for the good of his people, for the union of Christians, and the conversion of the world. To this end I have for years been pleading for a catholic basis, broad as the foundation on which the Lord Jesus said he would build his church or kingdom. Tradition and philosophy, falsely so called, have been the obstructions which have stood in my way. I never thought nor intended to introduce a new or an improved philosophy, to annihilate any theory so called—any philosophy ancient or modern. I profess to apprehend, if not to comprehend, the materials of all the existing sectarian theories of any notoriety, domestic or foreign. Strictly educated in the science and details of Calvinism, the politics and politics of Calvinism in the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Congregational forms, and having witnessed as well as experienced much of its influences, personal and social, I was induced to substitute the Christian Scriptures alone, as all sufficient, and alone sufficient for the church and the world—Jewish and Gentile. Of course we have had to encounter fearful odds in power—indeed, the combined power of Papal and Protestant Christendom, so far as we came in contact with their respective idols. The only oasis in this desert that came within my horizon was the Baptist community. True, I found a number of my acquaintance in all the denominationalism of the day, with whom I cordially sympathized, and of these a considerable portion sympathized with me. A reformation, or a restoration of primitive Christianity, in letter and in spirit, in word and in deed, was proposed by my father before I left the University of Glasgow, but as then conceived, only in its pseudo-Baptist and political attitudes and gestures. This did not, by any means, satisfy the demands of my reason, my conscience, or my understanding of the teaching of the inspired Apostles.

I had, indeed, at an early period of my life, devoted myself to the Lord, his cause and people, and to try myself and my own sincerity in the matter, I put myself the question, Can I do this to without fee or reward, and throw myself entirely upon the guidance and providence of the Lord without any guarantee from mortal man? I thank the Lord that I was so disposed and determined, and made willing to devote myself to his service and that of my fellow men. I then, indeed, became a Bible student. I had studied theology to a considerable extent, had as good a theological library as any private library I have ever seen. A "thus saith the Lord," however, was my only authority, and is to this day.

But I have been opposed by my old friends and brethren of the Presbyterian forms of Christian doctrine, with a vehemence and zeal worthy of a better cause. My views of original Christianity have been assailed and travestied by the pulpit and press, and every form of heresy and error charged against me. Still the Lord has stood by me and strengthened me, and I have not now one regret in my retrospect of the past, except that I have been so unworthy of the position in which he has, in his merciful and sovereign providence, placed me. The Baptists in Scotland and in America, as you know, are generally nothing more nor less than immersed Calvinists or Arminians. Both denominations are purely sectarian, and do not build on the simple foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. They have some sort of Christian experience to narrate before their approved immersion "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," &c. and then they have their monthly Sabbaths or Sacraments, and in different localities a few et ceteras. Now, Sir, as I presume you know, I am caricatured in their synagogues in many regions every Lord's day, as a schismatic or some outlandish errorist.

Regarding you as I do, I propose a friendly discussion of the issues—the true and real issues, between them and my brethren. I desire this to be open, public, and candid. I therefore object to a mere written discussion, unless it be printed in your journals and ours. The Harbinger is, as you know, read by few Baptists, very few indeed, and it is only a monthly visitant. Besides, there is no telling where or when such a written discussion would end. They will not copy our essays pro and con.

An oral discussion is always most interesting and most effective. I desire not victory, but truth. The triumph of truth is eternal. The triumph of error is but for a moment. If, indeed, the Western Recorder will give us six columns a week for a few months, the affirmative and the negative simultaneously appearing, I would consent to it. You could employ an amanuensis, and so could I. Or one good stenographer, which is preferable. Still I presume an oral discussion, with two good stenographers, would be every way preferable. Please let me hear from you at your earliest convenience. — Very respectfully your's, A. C.

RESPONSE TO DR. CAMPBELL'S LETTER.

It will be recollected by our readers that in a recent number of the Harbinger we proposed to hold with Dr. Campbell, of Georgetown, Ky. an oral discussion of the real issues between ourselves and the Baptists. In the latter part of that month I received the communication from him which is now presented through our pages. At as early a date as many pressing engagements would allow, I replied in a letter of June 1st, which we now give, in which it will be perceived that I still insisted on an oral discussion. I have been expecting and waiting for an answer to this letter, but have yet received none. Meantime Dr. Campbell has thought it due to himself to publish, in the Christian Repository, his response to my original proposition. To this I have no objection, further than that a common courtesy might have suggested the insertion of the propositions from me, to which his ingeniously labored communication is a reply, and a suspension of the publication, at least, till the close of our preliminary correspondence. I am somewhat used, however, to such one-sided strategy, and of late, and especially from certain scribes and editors, and will not further complain. In a note, however, which is appended to Dr. Campbell's letter, he says, "Mr. Campbell has strangely taken no notice of it (the letter); hence its appearance in the Repository." This is, truly, strange enough! Was not my note of June 1st a notice? When I had proposed an oral discussion, and was still insisting upon it, with what propriety could Dr. Campbell expect me to commence, in the pages of the Harbinger, a written one? I was and am perfectly willing that all our readers should hear Dr. Campbell; but my paramount object was and is, to provide for myself being heard by the Baptists, before whom I believe myself to have been injuriously misrepresented, and by whom, therefore, I am grossly misunderstood. This one-sided publication in the Repository I hold, therefore, to be premature and unfair. But the step has been taken, and we willingly, though gratuitously, transfer the entire letter to our pages.

It is not our purpose, however, to make, at present, any detailed reply to it. What the future aspects of the matter may demand, we cannot say. We note now the facts that Dr. Campbell explicitly declines the proposed oral discussion, and that he does not even commit himself to engage in a written one. Neither is there any intimation that, were such a discussion to be undertaken between us, it would be published in such form and vehicle, as to reach Baptist readers. Under such circumstances as these, surely no impartial and candid man could expect me to publish or to reply to such a communication as the letter of Dr. Campbell. I did not seek a written discussion, but an oral one; neither did I propose the issues which he has raised and discussed, but a class of very different ones.

I fully agree with Dr. Campbell, that "if anything like a candid Christian effort is to be made to harmonize the views of the two denominations, the first thing must be to endeavor to give definite expression to the true issues as they actually exist by the use of the common every day language of men." This I have always sought to do, and it is quite a discovery which Dr. Campbell discloses, that "the ablest and best (Baptist) men have always complained of me on that score." This will scarcely pass current in Kentucky, I think! I have been engaged in many discussions, oral and written, and when have I scrupled to throw my positions into definite propositions, verbally plain and simple as my knowledge of the "common every day language of men" could make them? With the writings and other labors of near fifty years of my life before me, and in possession of the public, I dare challenge Dr. Campbell or any other critic of my opinions or style, to cite me to the writer who has more freely or fearlessly thrown his positions into all forms of expression that could simplify them; set them forth by every variety of illustration that could bring them within the intelligence of the unlearned, or condensed them into propositions of more precise and critically definite terms of common language than I have done. This is an apology for Baptist misrepresentation, offered in charity, and honestly, I doubt not, but surely not in truth.

This apology is an old resort of misrepresentation. Many a sceptic excuses himself with the assertion that the Bible is contradictory. He comes with his scraps and fragments, and shows us a wretched entanglement of contradictory propositions. How do we answer him? We tell him his purpose is dishonest. He is seeking objections against the truth, not the truth itself. So I answer the attempts to torture into inconsistency my writings, scattered as they are through the multiplied pages of thirty or forty years, and produced, as they have been, under every variety of circumstance and inconvenience that one can well be exposed to during such labors. Let any competent critic consider the point of view in which I may be regarding the subject, and the precise relations of thought involved in the connection, and then let him compare my words in the spirit in which Dr. Campbell would himself compare the words of Paul and James, and I have no fear but that he will find as little difficulty in harmonizing the one as the other.

But has Dr. Campbell, after all, found it so difficult as he would have us think, to understand the language in which I have stated the issues between us? We gave six, and three of them at least, appear quite intelligible to him! As to one-half, then, his complaint is unjust. Fifty per cent of error, in a matter so serious and grave as this, is even worse than fifty per cent of ambiguity! Well, we are glad to see that the Dr. agrees with us in the rejection of the Papal form of "in," in the baptismal formula, and the substitution of "into," though he may "use it in a different sense from that which I attach to it!" Can it be, that to even this little word, I have covertly slipped in a learned meaning not found in the "common, every-day language of men?"—Our issue on the weekly communion is also understood; and here again, in charity, Dr. Campbell is "far from believing that the Scriptures condemn the practice for which we contend." How far he is from this simple faith, is not precisely stated, but far enough, we presume, to warrant him in declining an issue with us on the question, and still near enough to justify him in becoming the apologist for the manifest neglect on the part of his Baptist brethren, of this most significant symbol of the life in Christ.

Again, there is no complaint of indefiniteness against our issue, on the use of what is usually called a "Christian experience." Dr. Campbell speaks as though he caught it at a glance, and by the way, we suppose, of throwing it into the "common, every-day language of men," says, "it is a reprobation of our (Baptist) experience, of a gracious and saving change previous to baptism." "This," he says, "is your second issue." Now we beg leave to say that "our second issue" is no such thing! These are our words, and though they may not be Dr. Campbell's "common, every-day language of men," it will be many a day before he can make his issue out of them! We say, as a corollary from the previous position, in which we assert that we preach simply faith in Christ, repentance towards God, and baptism for the remission of sins, that hence we reprobate a relation of what is usually called a "Christian experience" on the part of a candidate for Christian baptism, instead of a formal and sincere declaration of his faith in Christ. These are the words we used, be they "common and every-day" or not—and we submit it to the candid and thoughtful reader, if Dr. Campbell, in changing the language, has not misrepresented the meaning? Will he take shelter behind the charge that our language is ambiguous? He cannot. We reprobate the substitution of one thing for another. What is called "Christian experience," for a sincere confession of faith in Christ—and Dr. Campbell says, our language means, that "we reprobate 'Christian experience!'" This, he says, is our "second issue." Suppose that I should affirm that, "carbonic acid gas should not be substituted for atmospheric air in our bed chambers"—would this be equivalent to saying that there is no such thing as carbonic acid gas, or that it has no proper place and use in our chemistry? But this is too glaring to dwell upon; only we wish to notice, by way of illustration, how natural it is for prejudice to plunge into mistakes, and how very convenient it is, when called to account for them, to fly to the sweeping charge of ambiguity for deliverance.

Dr. Campbell's position on the subject of Baptist experiences is remarkable. It transcends transcendentalism! It is positively Quakerish! It is a personal thing—a thing of consciousness—a personal cognizance of the influence of the Gospel in the "inner man," the "interior life." This is not the "common, every-day language of men," nor is it quite the language of Scotch metaphysics. It is an effort that way, however—and we are thankful for so much. Now, how is this mysterious something, that we can know nothing about, in which we have neither part nor lot, how is it produced? Why just as we always said — by the Baptist system. We thank Dr. C. for the admission at last. "Our system," he says, "does not, cannot produce it," but from his (i. e. the Baptist system) it is inseparable! "It is a gracious and saving change previous to baptism." But we have no such experience of grace—cannot have. How then does Dr. C. by his rule of consistency, regard us as Christians at all? Again, "we are incapable of judging, we are strangers to it and cannot comprehend it!" Now this is precisely the ground of the Quaker, and is it not a high spiritual assumption? But let us see. Are not the Scriptures our rule of faith and practice? And is it not legitimate for me to enquire what they teach on this subject? The question raised by me, is not whether I have had, or can have this Christian experience, but whether the Scriptures warrant the substitution of a narration of fantastic, and often superstitious stories about such, instead of a simple and heartfelt confession of faith in Christ. This is a confession of fact, which any one capable of interpreting the meaning of language can decide.

It will not do for Dr. C. to try to hide himself in such mysticism. Though, with the old mystic shoemaker of Seidenburgh, Jacob Behmen, he might claim to have been "surrounded with a divine light for seven days, and stood in the highest contemplation and kingdom of joys;" I contend that it would still be a legitimate question for one, even so spiritually dead as myself, to ask, Do the Scriptures warrant the narration of such idiosyncratic dreams by candidates for baptism, in the stead of a confession of their faith in the Messiah? Cannot Dr. Campbell understand this?

It will not be thought strange, after this palpable perversion, and misrepresentation of my "second issue"—if I decline to accept as my own, the two propositions in which Dr. Campbell expresses his conceptions of my views on the subjects of spiritual influence, and the remission of sins. His own quotations from my published writings are enough to satisfy a candid mind, that these propositions as given in the language of Dr. Campbell, do not fully or adequately represent my views on these subjects. I have no time or disposition at present to write a commentary on my own writings, nor a vindication of my own consistency; but this I am prepared to do.—To state my positions on the points of difference between us, in language as perspicuous, definite, and positive, as Dr. Campbell or anybody else can command, and then to meet Dr. Campbell in his own church, and before his own congregation, in oral discussion of them, so soon as, and whenever he may think fit, and find it convenient to engage me, and we will modestly leave it to the public to say who is ambiguous, as well as who is in harmony with the teachings of the inspired Word of God.

Pressed as we are for space, we feel that it would be improper were we to close this article without at least a passing respect to Dr. Campbell's display of Greek criticism, not only because he is a reputed scholar, but because of the total originality of his ground.—Let the reader turn and read the paragraph on the construction of the passage baptisma metanoias eis aphesis amartion, the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, &c. Read it carefully and thoughtfully reader, for it comes from the pen of a scholar. It is an assertion, not of doctrine, but of grammatical construction, from the President of the Baptist College of Kentucky! What does he say? Why "that the proper construction is to connect eis aphesis amartion, for the remission of sins, with metanoias, repentance, and not with baptisma, baptism," &c. That is, metanoias, repentance, which any lad who has been three weeks at the Greek grammar knows is in the genitive case, is to be made the proper object of the verb (keerussion) preach; and that baptisma, baptism, which is in the accusative, must be degraded into a mere attributive, qualifying the kind of repentance, and showing what character it must evince to secure remission of sins. Well, if Dr. Campbell will stand by this conclusion in fact, we might be disposed to forgive the crudity of the criticism by which he has reached it. "Only a repentance evincing the proper character, secured remission"—but this proper character is that it leads to baptism! Precisely the conclusion we could have desired! Does not Dr. Campbell suspend remission on baptism? Suppose the repentance does not lead to baptism—why then does it not secure remission? So that baptism is still the turning point towards remission. The repentance of the sinner is to be tried by it, and the remission of his sins suspended on it, as the practical and outward test of the genuineness and sincerity of his repentance! Will Dr. Campbell stand to this? Nous verrons!

But to return to his criticism. How would common Greek scholars, trained under such a master as Kuhner, construe this passage? Would they not say that baptisma, baptism, is in the accusative case, and the proper object of the verb preach, and that metanoias, is an attributive genitive, qualifying it? That therefore repentance is a characteristic of the baptism, and not, as Dr. C. strangely contends, baptism a characteristic of repentance. To reduce the matter to the "common every day language of men," for which indeed we have indeed a special partiality—suppose I were to say, "That the Governor executes the laws of Kentucky, for the conservation of the peace"—would it not excite a smile with men of common sense, were one to say that the proper construction of this sentence is to connect "for the conservation of the peace" with "of Kentucky," and not with "laws," and therefore interpret me as saying, "That the Governor executes Kentucky, evincing the character of a law-maker, for the conservation of the peace!" The cases are precisely parallel. In each the genitive is substituted for the accusative and the accusative for the genitive. It is necessary, indeed, in order that the execution of Kentucky may procure the conservation of the peace, that she shall evince the proper character, the law-making character—still it is Kentucky, and not her laws, that the Governor must execute to this end!

Verily, the legs of Scotch Calvinism and Greek criticism are not equal!

We forbear to push our reply any farther at present. This may suffice as a specimen both of Dr. C.'s theology and scholarship. If Dr. Campbell wishes to sustain himself as a theologian and a scholar, and to vindicate his own position and that of many of his brethren towards us, let him abandon this petty business of special pleading, the resort always of the narrow-minded and weak, and come out manfully upon a few definite and comprehensive propositions upon which we may mutually agree, and meet me in the oral discussion to which I still, with increased earnestness, politely invite him. ### THE REQUIREMENTS OF THE CHURCHES.—No. I.

HOWEVER far any congregation of the saved may have advanced in the knowledge and grace of the Lord, not one can say, "I have need of nothing." However much the faithful witness had to say in commendation of the seven churches, none of them was without need of the word of counsel and warning. Acknowledging, then, with all gratitude the knowledge, faith, love, labor, and patience possessed and manifested by those churches among whose membership these pages are read, we may, without fear of the charge of querulousness or impertinence, urge attention to such items as occur to us, as eminently needful to their perfection according to the will of God.

In offering these suggestions, we of course wish to bear in mind, that our knowledge of the churches is not so extensive or so intimate as to warrant our speaking with such directness of language as might become other brethren. And with this feeling it is proper also that we submit, that those things which we urge as requirements of the churches, are certain to be much more needed in some quarters than in others. While, then, our object will be, to submit only such matters as, generally speaking, all New Testament churches should strive after and seek to excel in, it will be for the brethren reading our suggestions, to judge for themselves as to how far they are applicable, and necessary in their own individual case. No one need put on the cap that does not fit him.

But in these days of writing and speaking, reading and hearing, we cannot too strongly urge the habit of the personal practical application of whatever is ascertained to be the will of God. What is the use of reading and hearing, if they end not in practice? Where is the propriety of our protesting against merely theoretical systems, if ours be not a practical godliness?

The first general requirement, therefore, which we suggest is

GODLINESS.

God-likeness must ever be required of all the children of God. To produce this character in man, is a primary purpose of the Gospel. In Jesus we have an express impersonation of the divine character, and we are informed that Gospel predestination has for its object the conforming of the called to the image of the Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren. And it is the hope of the ultimate and perfect realization of this conformity, which the Apostle John presents in argument for present sanctification; for, says he, "Beloved, now are we the children of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him; that we shall see him as he is: and every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." To be pure as God is pure—holy as God is holy—perfect as God is perfect—is the end and aim of all the purposes and appliances of the evangel of the favor of God. Had man been God-like, there could have been no gospel of the grace of God. It was purposed, and has been consummated, expressly to create man anew after the image of Him who did at first create him in the likeness divine. To this superlatively grand consummation, therefore, every gospel fact, truth, command, example, duty, privilege, ordinance, ministry, threatening, and promise, tend to bring the holy brotherhood; so that if the clearer perception of the truth of God do not produce a correspondingly greater conformity of character to that of God, as manifested in Christ Jesus, the knowledge gained is as good as lost. If the observance of the scriptural order and ordinances of the house of God, do not develope in those who are exercised thereby, more of the perfect will of God, then indeed may the worshippers as well have ceased to worship.

Now it is not an impossible thing to mistake the means for the end. Indeed this has always been in every attempt at rectification not only a possible, but a common error. The unenlightened Heathen, the superstitious Papist, and the misdirected Protestant, alike commit the error of confounding the end sought with the means employed. The Pagan and Papist, by the mere performance of their pilgrimages, penances, and prostrations, and the Protestant by the mere act of "saying prayers" or of reading a chapter, suppose themselves to have "already attained" that for which their practices at best are but means. Thus, whether in the case of those who adopt means utterly unsuited to the end, or of such as have recourse to measures wisely ordained of God to the given object, but conformed these measures with the object itself, the result is alike disastrous. The Protestant, reading nightly his self-prescribed number of chapters, being simply a hearer, and not a doer of the word, is no more conformed to that character which the living and potent word is calculated to develope in the doer of it, than is the Papist, sanctified by the counting of his beads. In like manner a man may discard infant sprinkling as a weak and beggarly element, and be immersed with the strictest accord to the Messiah's commission, and after all fail to walk in that newness of life which his baptism into Christ requires of him. He may glory in his baptism as scriptural, but regarding it as an end rather than a means—a conclusion rather than an argument—he may altogether fail of the grace of God. So with all the ordinances of the Christian ecclesia. It is only as we realize them to be divinely-appointed, and therefore wisely-adapted means to the one great end of the ever increasing sanctification, on until the entire perfection of the worshipper, in his complete conformity to the likeness of God, that their true use and benefit are attained.

This accomplished, or in satisfactory process of accomplishment, churches of scriptural order and practice could not fail to be felt as the very power of God. Godliness is the greatest of moral potencies. The most abandoned character is not insensible to its mighty influence. But a form of godliness without the power, is of all things the most contemptible. It is a mockery, a delusion, and a snare—a reproach, a byword, and a hissing. There is no doubt that the "having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof," so common in these days, has done incalculable evil. Besides driving multitudes altogether away from the consideration or acceptance of the gospel, this mere profession has brought even the true form of godliness into such disfavor, as to lead many more into either a partial or total disregard of its ordinances. It is forgotten, that while the true is certain to have counterfeits, and that while the base coin is sure to bear the image and superscription of the true, the genuine would not be genuine without the proper outward impress. In other words, while there are many forms of godliness without the power, the true power of godliness never is without its appropriate form. To the extent that there is deficiency in the form, there is defect in the power. It is then of vast moment that the correct form stand associated with the living power. Such churches must of necessity be victorious over all the power of darkness.

Space forbids that in these papers we enter into lengthy detail, but it may be well here to note, that as respects not a form, but the form of godliness—that form, which God has given, the Scriptures of the New Institution alone exhibit it pure and entire, wanting nothing : so that any one who would have his godliness appear in robes bright and clean, must adopt the habit and fashion there set before him. And as respects the power, Paul pronounces the Gospel of Christ to be the power of God unto salvation to all the believing, coincident with Peter's words to the effect, that the elect are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. The power divine to save man from sin—to transform him by the renewing of his mind, till he becomes a living demonstration of the good and perfect will of God, takes effect through Christ by the Gospel. The character of God is manifested in Christ, and Christ is made manifest in the Gospel, so that he will place himself pupil-wise under the training of the evangel of Jesus, changed from glory to glory, even as the Spirit of the Lord ; for the favor of God that is saving to all men has appeared, training us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly. The discipline indeed is one thus trained.

O ! what a transforming power the churches of God would have upon the world lying in the wicked one, were the membership truly God-like—were each disciple a living epistle of Christ—were each in character a likeness of God—were each just Jesus over again ! Brethren, let us press towards the mark.

STORY FOR YOUNG HUSBANDS.

(We commend this truthful and well-written narrative to the attention of our readers from which some very salutary and important lessons may be learned by husbands and wives, whether young or advanced in life.)

"WHERE are you going, George ?" asked Mrs. Wilson, as her husband rose from the tea-table, and took his hat.

"Oh, I'm going out," was the careless response.

"But where ?" asked his wife.

"What odds does it make, Emma ?" returned her husband. "I shall be back at my usual time."

The young wife hesitated, and a quick flush overspread her face. She seemed to have made up her mind to speak plainly upon a subject which had lain uneasily upon her heart for some time, and she could not let the opportunity pass. It required an effort, but she persevered.

"Let me tell you what odds it makes to me," she said, in a kind but tremulous tone. "If I cannot have your company here at home, I should at least feel better if I knew where you were."

"But you know that I am safe, Emma—and what more can you ask ?"

"I do not know that you are safe, George. I know nothing about you when you are away."

"Pooh ! pooh ! Would you have it that I am not capable of taking care of myself ?"

"You put a wrong construction upon my words, George. Love is always anxious when the dearest object is away. If I did not love you as I do, I might not be thus uneasy. When you are away your place of business, I never forget, thus, because I know I can seek and find you at any moment ; but when you are absent during these long evenings I get to wondering where you are. Then I begin to feel lonesome ; and so one thought follows another, until I feel troubled and uneasy. Oh, if you would only stay with me a portion of your evenings !"

"Aha ! I thought that was what you were aiming at," said George, with a playful shake of the head. "You would have me here every evening."

"Well—can you wonder at it ?" returned Emma. "I used to be very happy when you came to spend an evening with me before we were married, and I know I should be very happy in your society now !"

"Ah !" said George with a smile. "those were business meetings. We were arranging then for the future."

"And why not continue so to do, my husband ? I am sure we could be as happy now as ever. If you will remember ber, one of our plans was to make a home."

"And haven't we got one, Emma?"

"We have certainly a place in which we live," answered the wife, somewhat evasively.

"And it is our home," pursued George. "And," he added, with a sort of confident flourish, "home is a wife's peculiar province. She has charge of it, and all her work is there; while the duties of the husband call him to other scenes."

"Well, I admit that, so far as certain duties are concerned," replied Emma. "But you must remember that we both need relaxation from labour; we need time for social and mental improvement and enjoyment; and what time have we for this save our evenings? Why should not this be my home of an evening, as well as in the day time and in the night?"

"Well—isn't it?" asked George.

"How can it be if you are not here? What makes a home for children if it be not the abode of the parents? What home can a husband have where there is no wife? And—what real home comfort can a wife enjoy where there is no husband? You do not consider how lonesome I am, all alone here during these long evenings. They are the very seasons when I am at leisure to enjoy your companionship, and when you would be at leisure to enjoy mine, if it is worth enjoying. They are the seasons when the happiest hours of home life might be passed. Come—will you not spend a few of your evenings with me?"

"You see enough of me as it is," said the husband, lightly.

"Allow me to be the best judge of that, George. You would be very lonesome here, all alone."

"Not if it was my place of business, as it is of yours," returned the young man. "You are used to staying here. All wives belong to home."

"Just remember, my husband, that previous to our marriage I had pleasant society all the time. Of course I remained at home much of my time, but I had a father and a mother there, and I had brothers and sisters there, and our evenings were happily spent. Finally, I gave up all for you. I left the old home, and sought a home with my husband. And now have I not a right to expect some of your companionship?"

How would you like to have me away every evening, while you were obliged to remain here alone?"

"Why, I should like it well enough."

"Ah—but you would not be willing to try it."

"Yes, I would," said George, at a venture.

"Will you remain here every evening next week, and let me spend my time among my female friends?"

"Certainly I will," he replied; "and I assure you I shall not be so lonesome as you imagine."

With this the husband went out, and was soon among his friends. He was a steady, industrious man, and loved his wife truly; but, like thousands of others, he had contracted a habit of spending his evenings abroad, and thought it no harm. His only practical idea of home seemed to be that it was a place which his wife took care of, and where he could eat, drink, and sleep, as long as he could pay for it. In short, he treated it as a sort of private boarding-house, of which his wife was landlady; and if he paid all the bills, he considered his duty done. His wife had frequently asked him to stay at home with her, but she had never ventured on any argument before, and he had no conception of how much she missed him. She always seemed happy when he came home, and he supposed she could always be so.

Monday evening came, and George Wilson remained true to his promise. His wife put on her bonnet and shawl, and he said he would remain and "keep house."

"What will you do while I am gone?" Emma asked.

"Oh, I shall read and sing, and enjoy myself generally."

"Very well," said Emma. "I shall be back early."

The wife went out, and the husband was left alone. He had an interesting book, and he began to read it. He read till eight o'clock, and then he began to yawn, and look frequently at the clock. The book did not interest him as usual. Ever and anon he would come to a passage which he knew would please his wife, and instinctively he turned as though he would read it aloud, but there was no wife to hear it. At half-past eight he rose from his chair and began to pace the floor and whistle.

Then he got his flute and played several of his favourite airs. After this he got a chess-board, and played a game with an imaginary partner. Then he walked the floor, and whistled again. Finally the clock struck nine, and his wife returned.

"Well, George," said she. "I am back in good time. How have you enjoyed yourself?"

"Capitally," returned the husband. "I had no idea it was late. I hope you have enjoyed yourself."

"Oh, splendidly!" said his wife. "I had no idea how much enjoyment there was away from home. Home is a dull place, after all—isn't it?"

"Why — no — I can't say it is," returned George, carelessly. "In fact," he added, "I rather like it."

"I'm glad of that," retorted Emma, "for we shall both enjoy ourselves now. You shall have a nice, comfortable week of it."

George winced at this, but he kept his countenance, and determined to stand it out.

On the next evening Emma prepared to go out again.

"I shall be back in good time," she said.

"Where are you going?" her husband asked.

"Oh, I can't tell exactly. I may go to several places."

So George Wilson was left alone again, and he tried to amuse himself as before, but he found it a difficult task. Ever and anon he would cast his eyes upon the empty chair, and the thought would come, "How pleasant it would be if she were here!" The clock finally struck nine, and he began to listen for the step of his wife. Half an hour more slipped by, and he became more nervous and uneasy.

"I declare," he muttered to himself, after he had listened for some time in vain, "this is too bad. She ought not to stay out so late!" But he happened to remember he often stayed away much later than that, so he concluded that he must make the best of it.

At a quarter to ten Emma came home. "A little late, am I not?" she said, looking up at the clock. "But I fell in with some old friends. How have you enjoyed yourself?"

"First rate," returned George, bravely. "I think home is a capital place!"

"Especially when a man can have it all to himself," added the wife, with a sidelong glance at her husband. But he made no reply.

On the next evening, Emma prepared to go out as before; but this time she kissed her husband ere she went, and seemed to hesitate.

"Where do you think of going?" George asked, in an undertone.

"I may drop in to see Uncle John," replied Emma. "However, you won't be uneasy. You'll know I'm safe."

"Oh, certainly," said her husband; but when left to his own reflections he began to ponder seriously upon the subject thus presented for consideration. He could not read—he could not play—nor enjoy himself in any way while that chair was empty. In short, he found that home had no real comfort without his wife. The one thing needed to make home cheerful was not present.

"I declare," he said to himself. "I did not think it would be so lonesome. And can it be that she feels as I do, when she is here all alone? It must be so," he pursued, thoughtfully. "It is just as she says. Before we were married, she was very happy in her childhood's home. Her parents loved her, and her brothers and sisters loved her, and they did all they could to make her comfortable."

After this he walked up and down the room several times, and then stopped again and communed with himself.

"I can't stand this," said he. "I should die in a week. If Emma were only here I think I could amuse myself very well. How lonesome and dreary it is! And only eight o'clock. I declare—I've a mind to walk down as far as Uncle John's and see if she is there. It would be a relief if I only saw her. I won't go in. She shan't know that I hold out so faintly."

George Wilson took another turn across the room, glanced once more at the clock, and then took his hat and went out. He locked the door after him, and then bent his steps toward Uncle John's. It was a beautiful moonlight night, and the air was keen and bracing. He was walking along, with his eyes bent upon the pavement, when he heard a light step approaching him. He looked up, and—could not be mistaken—saw his wife. His first impulse was to avoid her, but she had recognized him.

"George," she said, in surprise, "is this you?"

"It is," was the response.

"And you do not spend your evenings at home?"

"This is the first time I have been out, Emma, upon my word; and even now I have not been absent from the house ten minutes. I merely came out to take the fresh air. But where are you going?"

"I am going home, George. Will you go with me?"

"Certainly," returned the husband.

She took his arm, and they walked home in silence. When Emma had taken off her things, she sat down on her chair, and looked at the clock.

"You are at home early to-night," remarked George.

The young wife looked up into her husband's face, and with an expression half smiling and half tearful, she answered, "I will confess the truth, George; I have given up my experiment. I managed to stand it last evening, but I could not bear it through to-night. When I thought of you here all alone, I wanted to be with you. It didn't seem right. I haven't enjoyed myself at all. I have no home, but this."

"Say you so?" cried George, moving his chair to his wife's side, and taking one of her hands. "Then let me make my confession. I have stood it not a whit better. When I left the house this evening, I could bear it no longer. I found that this was no home for me, while my sweet wife was absent. I thought I would walk down by Uncle John's and see your face, if possible. I gazed upon your empty chair till my heart ached." He kissed her as he spoke, and then added, while she reclined her head upon his arm, "I have learned a very good lesson. Your presence here is like the bursting forth of the Sun after a storm; and if you love me as I love you—which, of course, I cannot doubt—my presence may afford some sunlight for you. At all events, our next experiment shall be to that effect. I will try and see how much home comfort we can find while we are both here to enjoy it."

Emma was too happy to express her joy in words; but she expressed it, nevertheless, and in a manner, too, not to be mistaken.

The next evening was spent at home by both husband and wife, and it was a season of much enjoyment. In a short time George began to realize how much comfort was to be found in a quiet and peaceful home; and the longer he enjoyed this comfort, the more plainly did he see and understand the simple truth, that it takes two to make a happy home, and that if the wife is one party, the husband must be the other.

"THE MESSIAH'S MINISTRY."

To the Editor of the Millennial Harbinger.

PRIME, me to repeat in the pages of the Harbinger, the expression of my great general approval of Bro. Milner's new book, "The Messiah's Ministry," previously expressed to himself in a private communication.

I have not yet had time to give it a second perusal, but my impression derived from a first reading, which was not very cursory, is that we have all great cause to thank God, and take courage on receiving such a production from his pen. We may well begin to think of storming the enemy's entrenchment, with such a polished well-adjusted weapon in our hands. As to style, it must please the most fastidious, its smoothly flowing sentences not being more ostentatious than its vocabulary is select. Its matter must have been prepared with much care; in every chapter the student is delighted to find even philological enquiry brought to bear on de novo examinations of the materials to be employed, so that the reader returns with keen relish from the racy arguments and bold assaults of the finished chapter, to the calm lexicographic preparations with which the next opens. Nor does the animus of the book fall short of that combination of courtesy and courage—the former disarming, the latter dismantling—which adds so much to the grace and utility of such a production. My approbation is hearty, and shall be proved by my readiness to promote the circulation of the new work, to the full extent of my opportunities.

That one finds himself now and then unable wholly to accord with the author's conclusions, is no more than might have been anticipated. Assuredly, I, for one, feel indebted even when most convinced; and the suggestiveness of "Messiah's Ministry" is to me one of its highest commendations.

Being wishful to improve the appearance of this admirable book, and at the same time to contribute an additional item of interest to the Harbinger, it is my purpose, with your generous permission, in a short series of short epistles, to prompt Brother Milner to the fuller development of a few important enquiries, in which I doubt not your readers will be considerably interested.

First, then, and with the utmost brevity, this further aid in settling the meaning of the ancient, and do doubt significant, Divine names—JEHOVAH. Bro. M. observes in a note on page 5, "Messiah's Ministry," that "Hebrew scholars agree that this [Yahveh] is the correct rendering of Jehovah"—that it does not signify self-existence, as I am, but future appearing, as He that will come; that it is the equivalent of "Ὁ Ἐρχόμενος, the coming one of the New Testament Greek, and that it is fulfilled in Christ." In the above extract, I presume, that by "rendering" he intends "pronunciation"—indicative of derivation; a translation of the sacred name, of course, it is not. My difficulty, however, does not connect itself with the pronunciation, Yahveh, which, as far as I can judge, is in all likelihood correct. My difficulty arises from the statement that "Hebrew scholars are agreed that Yahveh signifies 'the Coming One.'" That some are so agreed is scarcely to be questioned; and, perhaps, when we are favoured with information as to their number, we may find the language not too strong. So far as my own humble means of ascertaining the truth in this matter are concerned, I am constrained to say that Hebrew scholars seem far from agreed that Yahveh means He who will come—the Coming One; indeed, I cannot find them at all unanimously agreed, even in the pronunciation Yahveh, though, to my own mind, this appears far more simple and probable than any other.

Opening, first, Bagster's Analytical Heb. and Chald. Lexicon, compiled by B. Davidson, I find as follows—"Jehovah, the most sacred name of God, expressive of His eternal, self-existence." The derivation adapted is that combining a future and a past from the verb Havah—to exist, to be. Turning, next, to Gesenius' Lexicon, edited by Dr. Tregelles of Plymouth, I find a mass of conjectures respecting the pronunciation of this name, three modes being specified, viz: YAHVOH, YAHVEH, and YEHOVAH, each with something more or less plausible in its favour. Gesenius, it appears, at one time of his life, sought the origin of this name among the relics of Egyptian idolatry. Of this unseemly course he afterwards repented. But in his Lexicon he proceeds to say—"To this origin allusion is made, Exodus iii. 15, 'Ehyeh asher ehyeh,' 'I (ever) shall be (the same) that I am (to-day)'; compare Apoc. i. 4-8, ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος: the name Jehovah being derived from the verb to be, was considered to signify God as eternal and immutable, who will never be other than the same. Allusion is made to the same etymology, Hos. xii. 6, Jehovah zikro, 'JEHOVAH (i. e. the eternal, the immutable) is his name.' Thus far the learned Gesenius. His editor, Dr. Tregelles, (himself a living Hebrew scholar, and no mean one either) throws in a note confirming this meaning, in the following terms:—"We have thus the authority of God in His word, that this name is derived from the idea of being, existence, and not from any relics of Egyptian idolatry."

In the next place, if we consult Hengstenberg's lengthy investigation, contained in his "Dissertations on the Genuineness of the Pentateuch," we shall gather that he decides for the pronunciation Jahveh-Yahveh—that he derives the name from the root Havah-Hayah, to be, of which, he says, "the form would be the regularly formed future in Kal"—that thus deriving it he regards it as signifying "He who is to be (for ever)"—and that, thus, Hengstenberg also (a living Hebrew scholar) decides for the meaning perpetuity or eternity of existence!

I am aware that Alex MacNhorter, New Haven, U.S. inserted an elaborate article in the Bibliotheca Sacra for January, 1857, to prove that Yahveh denotes The Coming One—"is the great Messianic name of the Old Testament—and there represents the same Divine Person who afterwards appeared in the world's history under the name of Christ." It further appears that a work has been published by the same author, entitled Yahveh Christ, or the Memorial Name, having the same object. But in this month's Journal of Sacred Literature appears a short article subscribed "T. T." the writer of which reminds the Editor that he ("T. T.") had inserted a paper in the J. S. L. for Jan. 1854, of which he charges MacNhorter of availing himself without due acknowledgment—"T. T." then proceeds in the following terms—"But though Mr. McNhorter has adopted the theory I had suggested, to account for the origin of the word Jehovah, or Yahve, and for the time and manner of its becoming a divine name, he has reproduced it with a modification which seems to me likely to render it somewhat less acceptable. Jehovah is with him not simply the name of God viewed as the Redeemer of men, but 'is the great Messianic name of the Old Testament, and there represents the same Divine Person who afterwards appeared in the world's history under the name of Christ.' (Preface.) To this it has been replied, (Evangelical Magazine March, 1858) that there are passages in the Old Testament in which Jehovah is distinguished from the Son or Messiah. Psalm cx. and Isaiah liii. 6, 10, are adduced in support of this assertion. And certainly it would seem difficult, if not altogether impossible, to bring these passages into harmony with the position, that Jehovah is the Old Testament name of Christ. But this difficulty disappears if Jehovah is taken simply as denoting God the Redeemer of men; if it is admitted that it is because God is Jehovah, that he unfolds the plan of salvation; that the Messiah is bruised, put to grief, and bears away the sins and sorrows of men; that he is constituted a priest after the order of Melchisedec; that he ascends his mediatorial throne to await the period when his foes shall be trodden beneath his feet."

If I understand them, Hengstenberg regards Yahveh as denoting, He who will BE—"T. T." takes it to mean, He who will BECOME—and McNhorter understands it to signify, He who will COME.

On two or three points I am satisfied—viz. (1) that the true pronunciation is Yahveh; (2) that this is a verbal noun formed from the third person, masculine singular, future of the old verb Havah; (3) that the old verb Havah is in all likelihood of the same meaning as the later Hayah; (4) that Hayah signifies, 1, TO BE, TO EXIST; and 2, TO BECOME, TO BE MADE, TO COME TO PASS.

But I am not yet satisfied that Hayah or Havah means TO COME; and, consequently, not satisfied that Yahveh means The Coming One.

And yet this is a most intensely interesting enquiry: no one can fail to see it such who will only in his ordinary reading in the Old Testament, substitute, in every place, The Coming One instead of LORD (in capitals)—Jehovah in the Hebrew. If The Coming One is the true meaning of Jehovah, we may most or all of us open the Jewish Scriptures and read with new eyes. But, let us make haste slowly. Brother Milner, you find you have helped one of your readers (perhaps more) into a little trouble: is it more than Christian love demands, that you should do what you can to help him out again?

INFLUENCE OF THE SPIRIT.

To the Editor of the Millennial Harbinger.

THANKS for inserting my hasty lines. Your note, however, requires, I think, a passing notice, for it might prejudice the minds of some against my communication, and whatever of truth it might contain. Your note is as follows:—"From what source Bro. Wraith obtained a knowledge of our faith as to the Holy Spirit, we are at a loss to know. The terms 'influence,' or 'all the influences' of the Holy Spirit, are not found in the Bible, and therefore form no part of our creed. We read of the power, wisdom, love, and purity of the Spirit, but never of his influences." Will you please allow me to state, that the source from which I drew the inference referred to is the Harbinger, in which, if my memory does not deceive me, appear repeated avowals of the doctrine spoken of—these avowals being editorial, and therefore naturally to be considered as yours, or sanctioned by you. I have not time to search out every case of this kind, but I will adduce one which I think furnishes sufficient ground for what I wrote. In the February number for 1857, page 98, is the head, "Man in his relation to the Holy Spirit and divine truth." Under it, among other remarks of unqualified approbation, we read as follows:—"We shall let the volume speak for itself in a few acceptable extracts, not however so much for the purpose of commending the book, as with the intention of influencing the reader by its truth." Further on, among these acceptable extracts whose truth is thus avouched, after speaking of the supernatural origin and attestations of Christianity:—"So far the agency of the Spirit must be special, immediate, and in every respect supernatural; but here we believe such agency terminates, and the ordinary, or purely instrumental grace of the Spirit comes into operation." A few lines further on—"And hence we conclude, that all the divine influences (mark the terms) we now have a right to expect, are those which proceed from that system of truth which was proclaimed by Christ, exemplified by his life, sufferings, and death, and afterwards preached and confirmed by the Apostles."

Now here are the very words which you repudiate when written by me, avouched as truth in an editorial of the Harbinger!

As for your objection to my use of the word "influence," you will find by referring to standard English dictionaries—instance Walker's—that "influence" is one of the meanings of "power," and may therefore be used interchangeably with it. Is not your objection, therefore, hypercritical? Your's in Christian affection,

JOHN HOPE WRAITH.

St. Owen's, Island of Jersey,

January 2, 1859.

[We have referred to the page indicated by Bro. Wraith, and can see nothing in the extracts, when read in their several connections, contrary to the truth revealed in the Bible. Nevertheless, we did not write the essay in question. We have often heard the influences of the Spirit spoken of, and prayed for, that they might be sent down from heaven on churches and individuals like rain on the mown grass; but meaning intended to be conveyed by such expressions, we have found it difficult to determine. Far more apposite and intelligible words, as we conceive, were chosen by the Apostles when approaching the Heavenly Father in prayer. They knew that the blessed fruits of the Spirit had already been deposited in the Christian's heart, and their desires were that all the disciples might understand, appreciate, and enjoy them. (See Gal. v. 22-26, Eph. 15-23, iii. 14-21, Phil. i. 9-11.) More on this subject in our next number.—J. W.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB.

"The marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready"—(Rev. xix.)

O BRIDE of Jesus! through long weary years
Hast thou kept watch, with many sighs and tears:
Waiting for Him in thy first virgin love,
Now far away in yon bright world above.

Afflicted one! thy Jesus crucified,
Will soon descend to claim His dearest bride;
His own soft hands shall wipe thy tears away,
And Heaven with shouts proclaim thy nuptial day.

Wife of the Lamb! though earth and hell combine,
Yet none can tear thee from those arms divine;
No enemy His faithful heart shall move,
His bowels yearn with everlasting love.

Weep not! thy Bridegroom is but gone before
To clear thy way to yonder peaceful shore;
Gone to prepare, in His dear Father's house,
A mansion for His blest immortal spouse.

Though now thy weary longing heart may brood
O'er earthly woes in thy sad widowhood;
Thine eyes may fail with frequent looking up
For his return, the day-star of thy hope:

But what a glorious destiny awaits
Thy raptured soul within the pearly gates!
The days of absence, and of parting o'er,
The bride of Jesus, his, for evermore!

He will present thee, His blood-purchased bride,
In faultless beauty, sinless, glorified;
Of royal favourites beloved the most,
His Queen Elect before the heavenly host.

Then bright thy smile, and sweet thy song shall be,
And glad thy heart, when Him thy eyes shall see:
Who on the cross his precious life laid down,
To win for thee, this glory and renown!

"DON'T."—A CAUTION.

"PROVE all things," said Paul ; but our neighbour Jones says, "Don't, for his minister considers that those people who are for ever proving are exceedingly troublesome, and that if this disposition to test every practice be encouraged, it will be impossible to keep our church together." And he begs that we "do not introduce those peace-disturbing periodicals which are ever finding fault, and demanding the restoration of this practice because it has apostolic sanction, and the abolition of that because it has not." And neighbour Jones further says, "He is sure that his good minister is quite right, so far as their church is concerned, for though it is a large one, influential, and peaceful, yet there are elements of partyism which would come into manifested antagonism, were questions of church polity, and considerations relating to the value and force of apostolic arrangements encouraged. Hence the pastor carefully avoids all topics of that class, confines himself to inculcating individual piety, and as far as possible dispenses with church-meetings. Thus we get on, and any other course would be to us dangerous, so you will please excuse us from taking your periodical." Certainly, friend Jones, for if you decline to circulate our pages, we have no alternative : and if you consider that a commotion in your church, arising from truth's assault upon error, would be a calamity, and disastrous to the kingdom of our Lord, you do well to avoid it. For ourselves, however, though we love peace and pursue it, as did our Divine Master, we should prefer a calm and prayerful examination of things held sacred, a testing of them by a "thus saith the Lord," even though a church be convulsed, divided, or dispersed, to what you call living in peace, which means shutting out the light lest dark spots should be seen. In a word, we don't think the existence of your church essential to the glory of the Redeemer, the progress of truth, or the salvation of sinners ; but we do think that if its existence depends upon saying DON'T, when the Apostle says DO — upon preventing investigation—it may not be a bad result when you are forced to surrender. "Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good," which, if it has any meaning, must include give up the bad. By all means avoid vain jangling and questions of mere expediency when they engender strife, but at all times have an open ear to the Word of the Lord, and ever stand ready to be taught by apostolic teaching and example. Remember that "Christ laid down the corner-stone of His kingdom on earth, and marked out the boundary between it and the kingdoms of this world most definitely, and that the 'field-notes' of that survey, describing the original landmarks, are recorded in His last Will and Testament.

The old monuments and landmarks have been obscured by the rubbish of human opinions, which for centuries has been accumulating about them ; and human creeds and human doctrines have grown over the old marks, so that it requires careful observation to enable us to find the true line.

Theologians, with their human theories and human science, have been running the line with sectarian compass, without consulting the old notes, and the consequence is, that there are now as many different lines marked out as there have been different surveyors, each one has followed his own compass, without making the proper calculations for local attractions and variations. Hence many really honest and pious people are occupying 'grounds' which were never granted to them by the Lord of the vineyard — they have got the wrong line, and do not know it.

Others know better, having had the old bounds pointed out to them, yet from selfish motives and worldly desires, they are not willing to give up their possessions, and the result will be, loss of claim to Christ's kingdom, for

'where their treasure is' their heart will be also."

Our chief business is to point out the old lines; we wish not to offer new things. If they are not as old as the acts and letters of the Apostles, reject them. It may be some encouragement to know, that on every hand we find admissions which, if only carried to their legitimate boundary, reach entirely to our stand. Take a few examples.

REV. C. STOVEL — "It is a fearful fact, that the influence of the general apostacy is seen in nothing more strikingly than in changing the sense of terms found in Scripture, even when their meaning and use have been determined by divine authority. What, then, may we not expect in technicalities that have not been so defined or authorized? Hence the title Christian is now taken by any party that chooses to assume it; and it is assumed generally with the greatest effrontery, where the most vital truths taught by our Lord and the Apostles are denied, and where the most obvious duties imposed by God in the administration of his mercy, are to be trampled under foot. The word 'charity,' and the phrase 'Christian charity,' are thus made to conceal habits of compromise which are most unjustifiable. 'Christian liberality' is a phrase which often means a contempt of all truth. The word 'conscientious' is frequently so used as to show a habit of voluntary and determined self-deception, which, in its rise and operation, clearly indicates the maturity of self-will. Persons are now found ostentatiously appealing to Scripture, who have never studied the passages which throw their light on the duty in question, and who, when the meaning of those passages is, by their own confession, stated, will not submit to that authority. The error in all these cases consists, in paying to the sentimental feelings of men a deference which is not paid to the teaching Spirit and his written authority; and in withholding from the Divine will, however expressed, that supreme regard which, as the will of God, it justly claims. * * We can do nothing but by conviction, and act on nothing but on faith. How, then, can we prevail? It is answered, Let our conformity to the written law be unimpeachable, and let our maintenance of that conformity commend us to the maintenance of the living Spirit. Then shall the feeble be as David, the house of David shall be as God.

JOHN MACNAUGHTAN, A.M. on Sabbath question. — "This question to be settled by positive and explicit Scripture law; or, what is equivalent thereto, the recorded example of the Apostles, with whom our Lord left authority to organize his church — if we find that they sanctioned change of the day, and that, in point of fact, before the last of them died it became universal, we have the evidence of apostolic arrangement, which, with the Christian, is as authoritative as apostolic command." To which he adds from JONATHAN EDWARDS — "The word and will of God, concerning duty to be performed by us, may be sufficiently revealed in His Word, without a particular precept, in so many terms, respecting it."

Dr. BENNET, in the Congregational Lectures, says, "The individual, society, that would find a resting place, must retreat through ages of altitudes, to build, as the earliest fathers professed to do, on 'the foundation' the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone" (Vol. 8. p. 281.)

Dr. CHALMERS, in his Evidences of Christianity, says, "Had no message come to us from the fountain head of truth, it were natural enough every individual mind to betake itself to its own speculation. But a message has come to us, bearing on forehead every character of authenticity; and is it right now, that the question of our faith, or of our duty, should be committed to the capricious variations of this man's taste, or of that man's fancy? . . . The Bible will allow of no compromise. It professes to be the directory of our faith, and claims total ascendancy over the souls and the understandings of men. . . . Close as ever lawyer stuck to his document, or to his extract, must we abide by the rule and the doctrine which this authentic memorial of God sets before us."

Dr. WARDLAW, writing on National Establishments of Religion, says, "It would seem as if the subjects of Christianity felt themselves at liberty to dissent from his judgment; and even when they are satisfied that he has given a decision, to decline compliance, and to hold by the existing system. They follow custom. Habit is strong, faith weak. The system is wrong, they allow; but they don't like change. But is this the amount of submission that is due to the King of Zion?"

Dr. INNES says, "I have no ambition, however, to possess the praise of that kind of steadiness of principle, and uniformity of conduct, which I could not maintain without either shutting my eyes against evidence that on any particular subject presents itself; or acting in opposition to that evidence after I see its force" (Euge. and Epe. p. 207.)

Dr. BROWN, in his Discourses and Sayings of our Lord, after saying that the Lord's Supper, "in the primitive age, was observed every Lord's day," says, "The Christian church is even yet but very imperfectly freed from the unholy influence, and the mischievous operation of human authority. The house requires to be more carefully swept than it was at the reformation from Popery, and a more thorough search must be made for the old leaven, that it may be more completely cast out. Let all individual Christians, let all Christian churches, learn to act on principle, that in reference to Christian faith, and duty, and worship, the question is not, How thinkest thou? but 'How readest thou?' not, What is use and wont? but 'What is written in the law?' not, How is it to be arranged by us? but, 'How has it been settled by our Master?' Let us 'seek out of the book of the Lord and read'" (vol. i. p. 500.)

After referring to the conduct of Christ, recorded Mat. xv. 1-14, he says, "Our Lord's conduct here shows us that we are not, from the fear of giving offence * * * to refrain from speaking the truth, especially with regard to doctrines and usages, unsanctioned by Divine authority, which men endeavour to impose as articles of faith and religious ordinances, and by which they cast into the shade doctrines plainly revealed, and substantially make void ordinances clearly appointed by the Lord." * * * Some very well-intentioned persons, like the disciples, are disposed to say, 'It is a pity—would it not have been better to avoid such subjects?' But is the truth to be concealed? This would be on the part of him who knows it, unkindness to the mistaken brethren, injustice to truth, treason against the God of truth. To all men, especially to well meaning though mistaken brethren in Christ, we ought to avoid giving unnecessary offence. We ought to be ready to sacrifice personal comfort, to a great extent, rather than incur this evil. 'If meat make my brother to fall, I will eat no meat while the world standeth.' But we must not sacrifice a jot or a tittle of Christ's truth to gain this or any other end, however apparently desirable. The 'teaching for doctrines and commandments of men,'—the 'making void God's command by man's tradition,' we must clearly expose, and strongly condemn, undiverted from our course by the fear of shocking the prejudices even of 'genuine Christians'" (p. 504, 505.)

So let it be! "Contend earnestly for the faith!!" "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams!!!" D. K.

THE NAME OF THE LORD— BAPTISM—REMISSION.

In The Truth Promoter (February 15) is an article from which we give the following:—

"In an article in this month (1st month, 1859) The British Millennial Harbinger contains a challenge to an American minister from A. Campbell, in which, p. 24, he thus speaks—'We preach no theory of faith, repentance, and baptism for the remission of sins; but simply faith in Christ, repentance towards God, and baptism for the remission of sins.' Now in opposition to this statement, and scores of the same import, in this periodical, we maintain that there is no text, or doctrine in the Scripture which teaches 'baptism for the remission of sins.' The very next text on which they rely, they have to misquote, garble, and misquote, before it will serve them. Here are the words of Acts ii. 38, 'Then Peter said unto them, Repent, and be baptized every of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost;'—which I translate thus: 'Change your minds and be immersed every one of you, upon the name of Jesus Christ into the taking away of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit.' The six words omitted are most important, 'in (upon) the name of Jesus Christ.' There is great power and salvation in this name, as the following texts demonstrate. Acts x. 43—'To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins.' Now if 'who-soever believeth in his name, shall receive remission of sins,' whom do you immerse—believers or unbelievers? If the former, then faith in the name, brings remission, even before baptism or the Lord's Supper.

"2. Very definite is 1 John ii. 12—'I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake.' The last words, 'for his name's sake,' dia to onoma autou, may be rendered more literally 'through the name of him.' Then if it is on account of his name, and through faith, before immersion, that sins are forgiven or taken away, why should any wait for baptism or water to remove them? Believe, enjoy remission, then be immersed. This is God's order."

The above is enough to establish two things—first, that this self-called Truth Promoter is a Truth Perverter; and second, that not content with mutilating apostolic teaching, it, with right-down good-will, enters upon the work of calumniating its neighbors.

Noticing the last of these allegations first, be it observed that the editor of the Truth Promoter charges the British Millennial Harbinger with relying upon one text ("the very text upon which they rely") to sustain its view on the doctrine of baptism, whereas no one text, chapter, or apostle is pre-eminently depended upon—Paul is as much regarded as Peter, and the Lord's own words are deemed second to none for setting forth what the Harbinger desires to teach. This is Truth Promoter's calumny No. 1. The said article is charged with mutilating, garbling, and misquoting Acts ii. 38, whereas it does not either quote, or pretend to quote, that verse, or any part of it. The writer merely says, "We preach no theory of faith, repentance, and baptism for the remission of sins; but simply faith in Christ, repentance towards God, and baptism for the remission of sins." He thus gives a summary of our preaching in his own words, without quoting or professing to quote one line of Scripture. Here, then, is Truth Promoter's calumny No. 2.

In concluding, the Truth Promoter says, "A man may profess to believe, depend upon baptism for the remission of sins, and never get what he seeks, because he trusts in the water, rather than the name of the Lord Jesus. Those teachers who thus lead souls to trust, will have a fearful account to give the day of God." And what account will the Editor of the Truth Promoter give, when at that day he is charged with writing the above, well knowing that the parties referred to teach nothing of the kind, but plainly set forth that baptism is only into remission, which is the result of faith and repentance. Will he say that he wrote it, wanting such like matter to create a little prejudice just now in Dundee? This is Truth Promoter No. 3.

But let us pass to the Truth Promoter's own view of Acts ii. 38. "Repent, and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins," &c. This, according to Truth Promoter, teaches that "faith in the name, brings remission, even before baptism," to which is added, "I believe, enjoy remission, then be immersed. This is God's order." We reply, It is man's perversion. But upon what does Truth Promoter seem mainly to rest its conclusion? Upon such texts as, "I write unto you little children because your sins are forgiven you through the name of him"—"Justified in the name of the Lord Jesus"—all of which, according to Truth Promoter, mean faith alone. Even repentance, upon his mode of reasoning, must be excluded, for as repentance is not faith, and the mention of faith without any act or result of faith, means faith only, then, of course, both repentance and baptism come after remission, and baptism has nothing to do with remission, just as the ark had nothing to do with saving Noah from the deluge. Indeed, we can imagine Truth Promoter and good old Father Noah in conversation thus.

T. P.—You are the good old patriarch that was saved from the flood.

Noah.—I am.

T. P.—Tell me, then, how yourself and family were saved.

Noah.—We were saved by the ark.

T. P.—By the ark! I say you were saved by faith. Did you not believe in God, and did not those who perished disbelieve him, and was that not all the difference? They were lost through unbelief, you were saved by faith.

Noah.—You state the truth as far as it goes. I was saved by faith, and the were lost through unbelief, but my first statement is nevertheless true—I was saved by the ark. When you imply that my faith and their unbelief presents all the difference, you err—my faith and obedience, the result of it, led to the building of the ark, by which ark I was saved, and consequently, by obedience and faith.

T. P.—Well, all this relates to your salvation from the flood, but let me have a word now upon justification before God. Here, of course, you agree with me, that in your time, as now, sinners were justified by faith alone—you, of course, admit that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law.

Noah.—Without the deeds of the law certainly, for I was justified before the law was given. I also admit that I did not become an inheritor of the righteousness which is by faith, on the ground of my own perfection, for I had “sinned and come short of the glory of God,” but yet you seem to mean something which I don’t understand at all when you separate faith from its acts.

T. P.—“Acts of faith.” One would think you had been reading the British Millennial Harbinger, the Quo Warranto, or some such trash. I mean that you became heir of the righteousness which is by faith by believing, and by nothing else. Is not that plain?

Noah.—Yes, I understand you, but I do not believe you. As, however, you do not display the calmest temper, I will say no more, but hand you over to one of my descendants—you have heard of him, and I fear sometimes distorted his words—I mean Paul, who set forth my case with all clearness when he said—“By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith” (Heb. xi. 7.)

But to return to Acts ii. 38. We object to the interpretation of Truth Promoter, because it implies that repentance and baptism, though tied together by the Apostles, are to be put asunder, one to precede and the other to follow remission, and because it makes the “for” (eis) in construction with “remission of sins,” relate to a past remission. On these points we will hear Dr. Halley, now principal of the Congregational College, London, who of course has no leaning to us, but whose unanswerable truth and logic on this verse should compel the editor of the Truth Promoter either to baptize for “the remission of sins,” or to adopt the only alternative, infant baptism.

“Not only does the preposition eis refer to the future and prospective relation of the remission of sins, but it does so with the same dependence on baptism as on repentance. The signification of eis must correspond in its relation to both words, ‘repent’ and ‘be baptized.’ In what sense does the apostle use the preposition, when he says, ‘Repent,’ ‘for the remission of sins?’ The remission of sins is obviously represented, not as preceding repentance, but as subsequent to it. The preposition has its meaning clearly defined, by its relation to the word ‘repent.’ Used only once, it cannot have two interpretations thrust upon it. It must connect the remission of sins with both words, ‘repent,’ and ‘be baptized,’ by one and the same relation. If it be, ‘repent for the remission of sins,’ it must also be, ‘be baptized for the remission of sins.’ Let those who deny this, say by what canon of syntax they can construe the passage, so as to obtain the interpretation, Repent, for the remission of sins, and be baptized after this remission. The Baptists have in no sense a baptism for the remission of sins. The Tractarians have it in a bad sense. We have it as designating the introduction into a course of instruction, in which the whole doctrine of the remission of sin is fully explained.

“In a similar manner, we explain the passages which speak of being ‘baptized unto Christ,’ being ‘baptized unto his death,’ i. e. being baptized with a view to the redemption procured by his death, proposed in baptism as the object of the religious instruction connected with it. There, as everywhere else, eis must denote a prospective, not a retrospective relation to the noun with which it is construed.”—Page 117, Halley on the Sacraments, part ii. second edition, 1855.

This is refreshing when compared with the meaningless nonsense of certain truth promoters.

Another testimony to the prospective relation of eis is given in a note upon the verse in question in the translation of the Acts recently issued by the Bible Union.

“Eis ἀφ' ου. We enter into contracts, states, conditions—into marriage, into servitude, into freedom, into Christ, into the church, into heaven. Eis and en can never be substituted the one for the other. As any one in any state cannot enter into it, so he that is commanded to repent, or to reform, is to be baptized eis—for, in order to, or into any state, condition, or relation, into which he is commanded to enter; or for which, as a subject, he is to become, he is to do, or he is to suffer anything. Hence those immersed by Peter were immersed into Christ, into a relation and into privileges not secured to them before. — Eis immediately following and indicating transition, not rest, like ev, intimates an important change, if not in the character, at least in the state of the proper subject of this divine law, or ordinance of admission."

But Truth Promoter replies — It is the name of the Lord that is for remission of sins. Let it be so—only do not bring in the word alone, because the name does not exclude repentance, and if not, why should it baptism? "The name," "glory in the name," say we—"that's the charm," as an opponent said some time back; but then men of the Truth Promoter school assume that they hold the name up higher, or depend more upon the Saviour than do not. They treat us as though we said, "we, by the name," whereas we attribute to it everything that they do. But let us enquire what should be understood by "THE NAME"—and how sinners are brought into such relation to it, as to warrant the declaration, "Our sins, which were many, are all forgiven."

"To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name, whosoever believeth in him, shall receive the remission of sins."

In quoting this text Truth Promoter does not mutilate it, but in interpreting it, very serious mutilation is indulged in with perfect ease. His words are—"Now if whosoever believeth shall receive 'remission of sins,' whom do you immerse, believers or unbelievers?" By this interpretation, the above text means no more than it would were the words through his name omitted, as it would then say, whosoever believeth in him shall receive the remission of sins. But we urge that the words cut out by this interpretation, do mean something—that Truth Promoter must not be allowed to mutilate the text—and, we now contend for the name against Truth Promoter, who has thrown it out.

Through the name, redemption comes to the believer. Only in the name is redemption promised. With the name it is enjoyed. In the name denotes authority, but the name also stands for the manifestation of God's favour, which comes to us in the LORD JESUS CHRIST—the administration or dispensation of the Gospel. In him all things in this dispensation are transacted—everything is done in his name, but not one of Adam's sons—not the most devout Gentile or the most pious Jew that ever lived can—do the smallest thing in the name until he enters into a new relation thereto, which new relation brings with it the pardon, adoption, hope, authority and protection of the name. Thus repentance and remission were preached in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, by those who had entered into the new relation, and who, therefore, acted under his authority (Luke xxiv. 46.) Thus believers obtaining remission by entering into that relation are said to have it "through his name," (Acts x. 43, John xx. 31) and thus those who proclaimed the Gospel, having themselves come under the name, in it, immersed confessors. In his name prayer is presented, and praise offered—which means far more than merely repeating the name Jesus, Lord, or Christ—in that new relation, out of which sinners are not commanded to enter the holy place, or to stand as worshippers before God.

Now, then, everything hangs upon the question—How can the sinner enter into this blessed name—how put it on, so as to be covered with its authority and protection? Will not a few plain passages of the Word answer this question?

"These things have I written unto you that believe into (eis) the name of the Son of God" (1 John v. 13.)

"Whosoever believeth into (eis) him shall receive the remission of sins" (Acts x. 43.)

The above texts shew that "into the name of the Son of God" and "into him" are used interchangeably—so that whether we say into the name or into him, amounts to the same. Men who do not believe, and infants who cannot believe, enter not into a relation which can only be realized through faith. But may it not be here as with Noah's salvation from the flood?—That salvation depended on faith, and without faith he would have been lost, yet his believing alone did not save him. Let the answer come from the word of truth.

"Go ye therefore and teach (disciple) all nations, baptizing them (the believers) into (eis) the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" (Mat. xxviii. 28.)

"Repent and be baptized every one of you, upon the name of Jesus Christ, into (eis) the remission of sins" (Acts ii. 28.)

"Were ye baptized into (eis) the name of Paul? I thank God I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; lest any should say I had baptized into (eis) my own name" (1 Cor. i.)

It will be admitted, that whatever is intended by the name of the Lord, it is included "in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

It is, then, just as true that we are baptized into him (the Lord Jesus) and into his name, as it is that we believe into his name.

Let the reader recal a statement made a few paragraphs back, that "as any one in any state cannot enter into it, so he that is commanded to repent, or to reform, or to be baptized (eis) for, in order to, or into any state condition, or relation, cannot be supposed to be already in that state, condition, or relation, into which he is commanded to enter; or for which as a subject, he is to become, he is to do, or he is to suffer anything.

We have then salvation through the name, and the name through faith, repentance, and baptism.

Truth Promoter takes one of these classes of texts, because it suits his theory—we take both, because we have no theory to support, and are willing to say, not, what only the one affirms, but to take them all. But are there any inspired declarations in which we find not merely faith, but both faith and baptism, as saving and introducing into Christ? Take the following—

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved" (Mark xvi. 16.)

"Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus, for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ" (Gal. iii.)

"That he might sanctify and cleanse it (the church) with the washing of water, (baptism) by the Word" (by the Word believed, or through faith) Eph. v. 26.

With Paul then we baptize not into our own name, but into the name of Christ—into him—not those who depend upon water and who do not believe—but those who having faith can say, they believe into him, because that faith moves them to be buried by baptism into his death. Truth Promoter transposes the Lord's words, and puts He that believeth and is saved, shall be baptized, we accept the Lord's own words, "He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved." ### CONFESSIONS OF A FOOLISH MAN.—No. III.

To return to my friend Joseph Jenkinson. Joseph left the church where there was such a to-do about that poor girl; and in process of time settled as minister with another church in a rather considerable town. Now, thought he, I shall have a fair chance; the cause is low, but there are plenty of people round about to work upon: true, there is a debt, yet who can say but that soon we shall wipe it off. He had read the New Testament a little, and had there seen what a church should be; he had read facts too, a little, and he again had to feel how that between what ought to be in the church, and what is in, exists a considerable contrast.

He had not been in this new place long ere he heard that the chief men in the church had a very bad name in the town. But what of that, thought he; many good men have bad names given them, and not until they are dead do people speak well of them. So he let it rest awhile, hoping there was nothing in it. But there it was again, this report, buzzing in this street, then in that, and often buzzing in Joseph's home and ears. Poor fellow! he was in a strait. Experience had taught him at the other place that it was a dangerous thing to touch a chief man's sore place. He knew, too, what was said by some quaint divine of the Rowland Hill description—"Resist the devil, and he will flee from you; but resist a deacon, and he will fly at you." "Now, conscience, do be quiet," he would sometimes say, and almost pettishly; "you made me uncomfortable before I came here, and now you are going to make me uncomfortable again." But that disturber, conscience, would let him have no peace ; night and day it was at him, till he was weary of his work and his life. Then he remembered the saying of good John Berridge, when threatened by the bishop with imprisonment for preaching in other parishes than his own—"I don't like jail better than other people, but I would rather be in jail with a good conscience, than out of jail with a bad one." Come what will, then, determined he, I must speak or write to this chief man.

He preferred to write, for he fancied that if he had a personal interview, hard words and angry might be thrown at him. He couched his letter in as gentle words as faithfulness would allow him ; he declared the charges, but was careful to express how glad he would be if they could be disproved : and he meant the exhortation to be a private one, for he did not wish to make the exposure more public than it was.

The very day the said letter was sent, walking in the town, he met with another of the deacons, by whom he was thus accosted—"You've written to Mr. R. I suppose."

"How did you know that?" enquired he.

"He has just been in to tell me so, and I assure you he feels very offended about it."

"I am sorry for that," was the reply—"I hoped he would take it in the spirit in which it was written. I did it because I considered the Word of God obliged me to do it, and I did it for his good."

"Well, but," said he, "we must remember the cause."

"What do you mean?" asked Joseph. "Do you mean that because he gives some of his money to the cause, he is to be allowed to do as he pleases?—to be exempted on this account from faithful rebuke and discipline?"

"Well, I think it would have been better to say nothing about it. We can't afford it."

Joseph said no more. He broke off the conversation, took a quiet walk, and thus mused :—

"We can't afford it! So this is the plea for tolerating any false profession, or barefaced hypocrisy, is it? Here's this man, charged by many with gross immorality, of ungovernable temper, and cruel to his wife and children—I must not say a word to him—I must let his soul go blinded to the judgment-seat—I must wink at his iniquities, at last be chargeable with his blood, if he perish, because we can't afford it. Have I mistaken Christianity? Is this ministry upon which I have entered the smothering up of sin, rather than for its destruction? Must I be driven from pillar to post in this way, because I will make no distinction in the church between the rich and poor? I am sure there's no more peace for me here. My first place I was expected to advocate the exclusion of a poor girl on the ground of charges which, when investigated, turned out to be utterly untrue ; and because I would not do it I gave offence. Here, for writing even a private expostulatory letter to one against whom many and credible witnesses found to testify most seriously, I should be maligned, abused, and made miserable. I see it all. I know what's coming. We can't afford it! Yes! and I see that it's the fashion thus to build up a wall, and to daub it with unpurged mortar. I see that spiritual pride of mind in church members is reckoned as a thing of secondary importance to respectability of position. And I see that many pastors are too willing to have it so."

To be brief with this event in Joseph's history, I will tell the issue. The treasurer of the church could foresee the change coming : he had just received the pew-rents and subscriptions due for the minister's support. Several pounds were owing to the said treasurer when Joseph went, so the first payment must be—Mr. Treasurer paid himself that old debt out of the money that had been specially assigned to Joseph's use, and then Joseph and his family have some five pounds handed over to pay for keeping their bodies and souls together for the three months. Joseph complained to the church, the chief man's clique could always succeed in throwing a full church meeting into confusion, that nothing should be done ; and though there was a major who would maintain the right, he did not see how God's work could proceed amid such disorder and confusion. He resigned his office, convinced that peace but a false one could exist with this sentiment was so powerful, "we can't afford it."

QUERIES AND REPLIES.

"THE SEVEN SPIRITS OF GOD."

What are we to understand by "the seven spirits of God," as recorded in Rev. iii. 1?

We have other similar passages—"And from the seven spirits which are before the throne" (Rev. iv. 4)—"And I beheld and lo! in the midst of the throne and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders, stood a lamb, as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God, sent forth into all the earth" (Rev. v. 6.) Let it be remembered that seven is a sort of sacred number, and occurs in the New Testament some 90 times, and much oftener in the symbolical language of the Old Testament. Thus we read of seven spirits, seven loaves, seven baskets, seven times seven, seven brethren, seven demons, seven years, seven men of honest report, seven sons, seven days, seven churches, seven golden candlesticks, &c. From these and many other examples found in the Old Testament, of the use of the number seven, it must be apparent, we think, that it is used indefinitely to express perfection. The expression, therefore, "seven spirits of God," must be regarded as merely indicating the perfection of the Spirit of God in all His manifestations, powers, gifts, and graces. "The Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God," and reveals them to us. "It is the Spirit that beareth testimony, because the Spirit is truth."

PUNISHMENT OF THE WICKED.

Have the wicked received the punishment pronounced against them in the following scripture, or is it still future and to be accomplished at the general judgment? "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life everlasting" (Mat. xxv. 46.)

Nothing is clearer to our mind than that the Saviour in this, and all similar passages, speaks of what will be inflicted upon the wicked at the time of the general judgment, which is yet future. It can apply to nothing in the past history of our sinful world. At the 31st verse the Son of Man is described as "coming in all his glory, and all the holy angels with him; then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations." Certainly such a scene as this has never yet occurred. The righteous and the wicked are separated for the reasons shown in verses 34 and the following. The life and happiness of the righteous are represented as "eternal," in antithesis to the punishment of the wicked, which is "everlasting." This fearful sentence will be executed on the wicked at the judgment of the great day.

"THE WHITE HORSE."

Who are represented by "the white horse and him that sat upon him," spoken of in Rev. vi. 2?

The white horse is generally understood to be a figurative representation of the gospel of peace. Among ancient warriors it was considered very dangerous to ride a white horse in battle, as such a horse would be a conspicuous mark for the archers. A warfare commenced at the opening of the first seal, between the army of heaven (the church) and the kingdom of darkness under the leadership of Satan. Jesus Christ, the crowned head of the church, with the bow of truth in his hand, is here represented as sitting upon the white horse, the gospel, going forth to the mighty conquest, conquering and to conquer. As a moral hero, certain of victory, he fears not to mount the white horse, and lead the victorious army; and though the pale, the red, and the black horses come out against him under the opening of subsequent seals, yet he will eventually conquer every foe, and his cause over all prevail.

REVELATIONS XVI. 16.

Please give us your views of Rev. xvi. 12-16.—A. B.

The reader must follow us in our consideration of the passage referred to. "The sixth angel poured out his vial." It fell on the great river Euphrates. As the Turkish empire took its rise on this river, we suppose this vial will affect that power—will dry up its strength, to make way for the kings of the East. The Turkish empire now stands in the way of the return of the Jews to their own land. The destruction of the Turkish power will prepare the way for their peaceable return. Next we have "three unclean spirits like frogs coming out of the mouth of the dragon, out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet." That is, the three great powers of evil will combine for the great battle against the truth. The dragon is Satan, the beast is the Papacy, and the false prophet is Mahomet or Mahometanism. These are the spirits of demons, working miracles to deceive the nations, and gather them together for the final struggle. These pretended miracles may be found at Rome, at Mecca, and even in Protestant Christendom, among the believers in modern spiritualism. All these combine in opposition to Christ. At the 15th verse the fact is announced, that the Lord will come upon them as a thief in the night, at a moment when they least expect it, — while a blessing is pronounced upon those who have kept their garments unspotted until the coming of the Lord. At the 16th verse the gathering of the wicked through the field of Armageddon is represented as preparatory to the great battle, and the coming of the seventh angel.

ITEMS OF NEWS.

CAMDEN HALL, LONDON.

Since our last report (December, 1858) we have immersed eleven, and received four others who had been previously immersed elsewhere. Several of these are very young — still in the Sunday school; and (in each case) one or both parents are members of the "one body." We hope that they will become very useful, walk circumspectly, and "give all diligence to make their calling and election sure."

GLASGOW.

The church meeting in 41, Brown-street, Glasgow, having had before them for some time past, the subject of church order, with the view to having that order established among them found in the Scriptures of Truth, have, after much consideration, and in the best of Christian spirit, almost unanimously come to the conclusion, of inviting six of their number to take office among them, three of the six as overseers, and three as deacons; and those brethren being thus invited by a considerable majority, and with the willing consent of the minority, after considering the matter among themselves, agreed to acquiesce in the wish thus expressed. Accordingly the church met for the purpose of setting them apart, with fasting, prayer, and the right hand of fellowship, on first-day morning, January 16th, when about fifty of the brethren and sisters were present, our much-esteemed brother, John Gray, president on the occasion. After reading portions of Scripture, and delivering a short and appropriate address, as well as engaging in prayer to Almighty God to guide, direct, and bless them, the president called on two other brethren also to engage in prayer; and then, in the name of the church, and in the most solemn manner, gave the right hand of fellowship, first to Bros. William Linn, John Brown, and John Clark, as overseers; and second to Bros. Robert Lambie, John Wood, and Thomas Millie, as deacons. The brethren and sisters present afterwards did the same, and ended the duties of the morning in an agreeable manner, all seemingly gratified with the proceedings. Afterwards retired to the hall adjoining the church, and partook of breakfast, enjoying themselves in Christian and social intercourse.

NEWTOWN.

Although we have no additions to our number this month, yet we feel that we may properly say, that our prospects improve. An increased amount of inquiry is awakened by our movements, and we have more hearers. The brethren, too, evince much zeal, unity, and comfort in the way of the Lord, and His ways. Hence, though our progress is much slower than we could desire, we infer that continued labor and patience will not fail of securing, ere long, a abundant reward.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

We extract the following items from the Evangelist of February, 1859:—

ARKANSAS. — Bro. J. S. Robertson, returning from Murfreesborough, under date of December 20, says—You are aware that we have changed my field of labor, and that I am now in the Southern portion of the State, and have been since July last. We have had about 75 accessions since I commenced in this region, with flattering prospects of much more to be done. Our brethren have great reason to be zealous, wherever the truth is presented with fullness, it never fails to gain access to the hearts and consciences of the intelligent.

CALIFORNIA. — Bro. Thomas Thompson, writing under date of Santa Clara, N.

13, states—Within the last twelve months I baptized 44 persons, and had some 15 additions otherwise. We had a most glorious state meeting, 92 additions, about 70 being by immersion. We have determined to sustain a paper, and to build up a Christian college in California.

ILLINOIS.—Bro. Thomas Goodman, writing from Edgar county, under date of December 31, states that in the course of the year, at the many meetings which he had attended, there have been at least 850 additions to the army of the faithful, namely, 250 from the world, 75 reclaimed either by letter or relation, and about 50 received from the different denominations.

IOWA.—Bro. Simeon Jessop, under date December 14, writes:—The congregation where we live in Polk county, numbers 50 members, and since June 22 eleven have been added by confession and baptism. Two congregations have been organized in Story county; the first at New Philadelphia, which numbers 23; the other seven miles further up the Skunk river, with 8 or 9. There is a small congregation near Story city, and I visited them, when 5 made the good confession. There have been 50 or more brought into the ranks of the faithful since May last.—Bro. S. Knight, writing from Farmington, on Dec. 16, reports an addition of 15 at the Bales Schoolhouse.—Bro. J. C. Porter, writing from Leon, in December, states that after a meeting held at Clinton, in the county of Leon, 23 were immersed, and others added from different denominations. Since the meeting 7 more have been immersed by Bro. French.—Bro. B. F. Snook, writing from Sandyville, in the same State, on Dec. 29, reports a meeting in that town, which terminated with an addition of 15.—Bro. T. K. Hansberry, writing from Hampton, under date of December 25, reports several protracted meetings which had terminated with about 100 additions.

WISCONSIN.—Bro. J. Miller, under date of Monroe, Green co. Dec. 16, reports between 70 and 80 additions to the cause since last Spring.

TEXAS.—Bro. L. J. Sweet, writing from Seyene, Dec. 26, reports an addition of 50 to the cause of Bible Christianity since June last, and the organization of three new congregations.—Bro. Eli Thomas, of Grason county, writes under date Dec. 27, that a congregation had been formed there composed of 26 members.

FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE TEACHER.

The modern schoolmaster is expected to know a little of everything, because his pupil is required not to be entirely ignorant of anything. He must be superficially, if I may so say, omniscient. He is to know something of pneumatics, of chemistry, of whatever is curious, or proper to excite the attention of the youthful mind; an insight into mechanics is desirable, with a touch of statistics; the quality of soils, botany, the constitution of his country, &c. All these things—these, or the desire of them—he is expected to instil, not by set lessons from professors, which he may charge in the bill, but at school intervals, as he walks the streets, or saunters through the green fields with his pupils. The least part of what is expected from him is to be done in school hours. He must seize every occasion, the season of the year, the time of day, a passing cloud, a rainbow, a load of hay, to inculcate something useful.

five minutes yourself you lead some one else to waste five minutes, and that makes ten. If a third follow your example, that makes a quarter of an hour. Now if there were one hundred and eighty of you together, and if every one wasted five minutes in a day, what would it come to?—Why, it would be fifteen hours; and fifteen hours a day would be ninety hours—about eight days' working time in a week, and would give a year of four hundred days. Do you think such waste as that could be borne by any establishment? Now go and think how fast five minutes can be multiplied.

BELLS.

Paulina, Bishop of Mola, is said to have been the inventor of bells. The Jews used trumpets instead of bells, except in the garments of the high priest. The Turks do not permit them. Our ancestors kept good hours in consequence of bells, for William the Conqueror commanded the curfew, or cover fire bell to ring at eight in the evening, so that all should then put out their fires and go to bed. The curfew bell is still rung in some parts of England.

THE VALUE OF FIVE MINUTES.

You say, if you waste five minutes, it is not much; but probably if you waste

FLOWERS.

How the universal heart of man blesses flowers! They are wreathed round the cradle, the marriage altar, and the tomb. The Persian in the far East delights in their perfume, and writes his love in nosegays, while the Indian child of the far West claps his hands with glee as he gathers the abundant blossoms—the illuminated Scriptures of the prairies. The Cupid of the ancient Hindoos tipped his arrows with flowers; and orange-flowers are a bridal crown with us, a nation of yesterday.—Flowers should deck the brow of the youthful bride, for they are in themselves a lovely type of marriage. They should twine round the tomb, for their perpetually-renewed beauty is a symbol of the resurrection. They should festoon the altar, for their fragrance and their beauty ascend in perpetual worship before the Most High.

PRESENT NUMBER OF JEWS.

How surprising it is, that amidst all the causes operating to decrease and wear out this wonderful people, they should still remain in number very much as they have been for ages. It appears that the Jewish nation, dispersed in almost every part of the globe, without forming anywhere an independent nation, amounted in 1858 to 4,658,800, not comprising 30,000 Samaritans, and 1200 Ishmaelitea, which would make a total of 4,690,000. The total number of Jews in Europe is stated at about 2,451,179, making the 110th part of the whole population of Europe.

JEWISH COLONY.

The Jewish Chronicle tells us that the remnants of a Jewish colony have been found at Ral-fung-foo, China. A communication is about to be opened with these sons of Israel by their British co-religionists, and they will be requested to send two youths to England to receive a European education. They have been separated from all intercourse with the remainder of their race for a period of six centuries.

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.

Go out beneath the arched heaven in night's profoundest gloom, and say, if you can, "There is no God." Pronounce the dreadful blasphemy, and each star above you will reprove you for your darkness of intellect—every voice that floats upon the night will bewilder your utter helplessness and despair. Is there no God? Well, then, unrolled the blue scroll, and there upon its bright frontispiece the legible gleamings of immortality? Who fashioned the green earth with perpetually rolling waters, and its lovely expanse of island and main? Who gave to the eagle a starry eyrie, when the tempests swell and the strongest, and to the dove an abode in the forest that ever echoes to the wail of the straits of her moan? Who made light pleasant to thee, and darkness a covering, a herald to the first flashes of morning? Who gave to thee that matchless symmetry of sinews and limbs? The irrepressible and daring passion of ambition and love? And yet the thunders of heaven and waters of earth are chained. They remain but the bow of reconciliation hangs above and beneath them.

GLASS.

PLINY tells us the art of making glass was discovered in the following way: "Some merchants were carrying nitre, they stopped near a river issuing from Mount Carmel. Not readily finding stones to rest their kettles on, they used some pieces of nitre for that purpose; the fire gradually dissolving the nitre, it mixed with the sand and a transparent matter flowed, which, in fact, was no other than glass." Chronology says that glass was invented in England, by one Benalt, a monk, A.D. 600, and that it was first used in private houses in 1180. Lord Kaimes, however, observes "The art of making glass was imported from France to England, A.D. 674, for the use of monasteries, and that glass windows in private houses were rare even in the twelfth century, and held to be a great luxury."

HOME.

HOME is the residence not merely of the body, but of the heart. It is a place for the affections to unfold and develop themselves—for children to love, and learn, and play in—for husband and wife to be smilingly together, and make life a blessing. The object of all ambition should be to be happy at home; if we are not happy there, we cannot be happy elsewhere. It is the best proof of the virtues of a family circle to see a happy fireside.

HEARERS AND SPEAKERS.

HEARERS will always give speakers their attention, if speakers will give hearers something to attend to. That the former may be interested, it is necessary that the latter be interesting.

SCRIPTURE DIFFICULTIES, No. XXXVII.

FIRST FRUITS

"of the Spirit" (Rom. viii. 23)—"of Israel" (Rom. xi. 16)—"of Achaia" (Rom. xvi. 5, 1 Cor. xv. 16)—"of them that slept" (1 Cor. xv. 20, 23—"of God's creatures" (Jas. i. 18)—"unto God and the Lamb" (Rev. xiv. 4.)

It will not be denied by the judicious that a knowledge of the laws and types of the Old Testament, is indispensable to a proper understanding of many allusions in the New. Indeed, it will be admitted that the pleasure and profit of reading the "word of the kingdom," depends much upon our acquaintance with what is written in the Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms concerning the Lord Jesus Christ and his saved ones.

In the eight texts of our motto, five of the great facts or truths of God are presented under the type or figure of first-fruits; and it is, I fear, too true, that whether from defective teaching or from inattentive reading, few, very few, clearly understand the mind of the Holy Spirit in those texts.

The explanation offered by nearly all critics and commentators is, that first-fruits were, in the type, and are, in the reality, "the earnest and pledge of a future abundant harvest." According to them, "the first-fruits of the Spirit" are our "having within us an earnest of future glory."—Stuart. The first-fruits of Israel being holy, "are pledges that God will, in process of time, admit the whole Jewish nation into his favor."—A. Clarke. The "first-fruits of Achaia" are, "the earnest of his (the Apostle's) future usefulness."—Scott. The "first-fruits of them that slept"—"the earnest pledge and insurance of their resurrection who slept in him."—Wesley. And the first-fruits of his creatures, "An earnest of a vastly larger increase from the Gentile world in that and future ages."—Scott.

It must be admitted that the air of probability in these explanations seems to account for the fact, that nearly all religious persons adopt them; and it also seems to prove how sheep-like we are, in leaping after daring leaders, instead of searching for ourselves, as true Bereans.

Against fearful odds I must beg to deny that the word ἀναρχή, first-fruits, has any such meaning as earnest, pledge, foretaste, or insurance; and to suggest that the mere sound of the word first, may have occasioned the thought of second, or future fruits; such ideal connection of "first" with "second" being the only ground I am able to discover for this notion, that first-fruits are the earnest, or pledge, of a future harvest. Barnes, indeed, admits on Rom. viii. 23, that "the word does not seem to be used in the sense of pledge, earnest, or foretaste of joys to come."

The law of God applicable to Jewish harvests had two principal features,—1st, That at harvest a sheaf as first-fruits thereof should be the Lord's, to be brought (with offerings) by the husbandman to the priest, and to be by him waved before Jehovah. 2nd, That the remainder of the harvest should then wholly belong to the husbandman (Lev. xxiii. 9-14.) There was no future harvest, looked to; it was the then harvest—the crop then ripe that was to be thus divided. But first-fruits to God were not only of corn: they were also of bread, (Lev. xxiii. 17) of oil, of wine, of wool, &c. (Deut. xviii. 4); and all these, being Jehovah's share of the produce of the ground, were by him given to his priests, saying, "The first-fruits of them which they shall offer unto the Lord, them have I given thee" (Num. xviii. 12.) And it may be further noticed, that these first-fruits of the harvest, vintage, &c. are so frequently coupled with the first-born of men and beasts, (Ex. xxii. 29, Num. xviii.) as to lead to the thought that they may have had the same origin, and that to both may be applied the emphatic language of Jehovah, "They are MINE."

Doubtless the first-fruits were not only such as were first ripe, but were also the very best of their kind — the choicest samples that could be selected of all the produce of husbandry. And the divine appointments are equally indisputable;—1st, that by God's own law, a part of the harvest, vintage, &c. belonged to Jehovah; and 2nd, that the residue (after first-fruits had been offered) belonged to the people. These being established as first principles, the difficulties begin to vanish as we thus approach the application of them to the several New Testament cases.

The first case is Rom. viii. 23, "And not only they (the whole creation) but ourselves also, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption—the redemption of our body." On this it may first be remarked, that we cannot, with Parkhurst and others, say these first-fruits are "those gifts of the Spirit which believers obtain in this life, as a foretaste and earnest of their eternal inheritance," because, as we have observed, first-fruits went to one party, and the remainder of harvest to another party; so that the former could not be a foretaste of the latter, simply because there could be no after-taste. Nor could the Apostle here mean that believers in general had these first-fruits of the Spirit, as in that case it would be impossible that any of mankind could have the residue; for the Lord himself, speaking of the Holy Spirit, says, "whom the world cannot receive." We are thus compelled to say, taking the Holy Spirit to be the harvest, that the Apostles of Christ only received the first-fruits of that harvest. The Apostles are here designated by the word "ourselves also"—"even we ourselves." Upon eleven of them the Holy Spirit had in largest and richest measure been shed forth on the memorable Pentecost, and had afterwards, in at least equal measure, been poured on him who was as one born out of due time: and being thus blessed with the best gifts of God, the very first-fruits of His own Spirit, the Apostles might well be thought less likely to groan within themselves than those on whom similar gifts had not been bestowed. Yet even Apostles thus super-eminently favored, groaned as well as less favored saints, waiting for adoption in the glorified body! Here a reader starts, to exclaim, do not all obedient believers, as well as apostles, receive the gift of the Holy Spirit? I beg in all kindness to reply, most certainly; yet let us remember all such are not apostles. It is this one fact that makes all the difference. Under the Mosaic law the first-fruits were the Lord's, and he gave them to his own priests. All Israel were not priests—the first-fruits were not given to all Israel; God gave to his priests the first-fruits, and to his people the residue. So, under the New Institution the Apostles were peculiarly God's own. In prayer the Lord Jesus says, "Thine they were, and thou gavest them to me." "I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me, for they are thine." To them he did indeed abundantly give the first-fruits of His Spirit, while to other believers He merely gave of the residue of the same Spirit. The first-fruits given to the Apostles, taught them all things directly from Heaven—guided them into all truth—enabled them to glorify and justify Christ—opened to them the deep things of God—qualified them as ambassadors of Christ to transact the great business of salvation and eternal life — sent them to turn sinners from Satan to God, and accompanied all with confirmatory signs, wonders, miracles, and gifts of the Holy Spirit. They could truly say, "We have the mind of Christ"—"He that is of God heareth us," and might therefore add, "We ourselves," and we only, "have the first-fruits of the Spirit of God."

The second case is Rom. xi. 16, "For if the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also holy." This is probably an allusion to the first-fruit of the dough or bread (Lev. xxiii. 17, Num. xv. 20, Neh. i. 37, Ezek. xlv. 30) brought as an offering to the priests, in order that the remainder of such dough or bread might be consecrated to the use of the offerers. And the Apostle's argument is, that as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were holy and greatly beloved of God, so Israel at large, the fleshly children of Abraham, and nationally the people of God, were regarded as in some divine sense holy, and even "beloved" for their patriarch-fathers' sakes. In this we perceive on God's part more than regret at their continued unbelief, and much more than willingness to receive them in love on their turning to and obeying his Son. It would be somewhat absurd here to say, the first-fruit of the dough was an earnest and pledge of future dough, or that the priest's portion was to him a foretaste of the remaining lump which the people were to eat.

The third case is Rom. xvi. 5, "Salute the well-beloved Epenetus, who is the first-fruits of Achaia (or Asia) unto Christ;" and 1 Cor. xv. 15, "I beseech you, brethren — ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the first-fruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints — that ye submit yourselves unto such." In these passages the disciples in Achaia are taken as the harvest, and the eminent persons named as the first-fruits of that harvest unto Christ; implying that they were Christ's choicest and best servants, devoting their lives and means to his cause and people—to feeding the minds and bodies of saints and sinners. They were to the disciples in that district what the priests were to Israel, and what the Apostles were to all the churches—the chief and leading men, the overseers, rulers, or elders who watched over, guided, and fed the flock of Christ. They thus were the first-fruits — not merely the first converts — not the earnest of some future harvest, but the Lord's peculiar portion of the then harvest of souls.

The fourth case is 1 Cor. xv. 20, "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept." 23, "But every man in his own order, Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." It is observable that Jesus arose on the very day on which under the Law first-fruits were offered to God. The great harvest here is "of those who slept," including Christ himself. Of this harvest, Christ is the first-fruit unto God, having risen and ascended to His right hand to die no more. The rest of the immense harvest of righteous dead, who are to rise at his second coming, are "Christ's," to be ever with him, and to die no more. The division in this case is between the Father and the Son. Of all the righteous dead the Father has Christ for His first-fruits, and Christ has the rest as his portion—his very own. This exactly corresponds with what the same Apostle writes in the same Epistle, (iii. 23) "Ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

The last case is James i. 18, "Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures;" and Rev. xiv. 4, "These (the 144,000) were redeemed from among men, being the first-fruits unto God and the Lamb." This is well illustrated by Jeremiah concerning Israel, (ii. 2) "Thus saith Jehovah, I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness ;

Israel was holiness to the Lord, the first-fruits of his increase." We all remember that after the flood, (as well as before) God repeatedly commanded man to be fruitful and multiply. They did so, and mankind at large were the fruits; but of all this increase the children of Israel were the first-fruits, the choice ones, God's portion. He himself styles them "holiness to Jehovah," and says, (Ps. cxxxv. 4) "The Lord hath chosen Jacob unto himself, and Israel for his peculiar treasure." Now what the national Israel were typically, the Israel of God, the true "Abraham's seed," are in reality. Having been begotten by his word of truth, and enrolled as the redeemed from among men, they are first-fruits of mankind unto God and the Lamb;—are his chosen generation, his royal priesthood, his holy nation, his peculiar or purchased people, and continuing to fear the Lord, to meditate upon the great name which has been named upon them, and to exhort one another daily, the remembrance-book of them is written before him, "AND THEY SHALL BE MINE, SAITH JEHOVAH OF HOSTS, in that day when I make up my jewels."

We farther learn from this significant ordinance, the way to become spiritually minded. As the Israelite's residue of the harvest was in some proportion to his good husbandry, so each disciple's residue of the Spirit will, in measure, be in the ratio of his diligence in its culture. If he neglect the gift, grieve the Holy Spirit, or defile the temple of the Divine Guest, his portion will be next to nothing, and himself be stunted and poor; but if he diligently cultivate and stir up that "earnest of his inheritance," his profiting will be apparent, and "the fruit of his increase" be an abundant produce of love, joy, peace—goodness, righteousness, and truth.

And we still farther learn, the way to get rich. He who sows sparingly will reap sparingly, for the niggard toward Christ, his people, and his cause, is never to be rich. But "he who soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully"—shall indeed have abundance. The grateful, and therefore liberal contribution, "as God hath prospered," for the needy brethren of Christ and for the spread of his gospel, is "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God," who can and will, in return, "make all grace abound"—agreeably with the words of the man of wisdom, "Honor Jehovah with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of thy increase; so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine."

THE CONTROVERSY ABOUT THE SPIRIT.

OUR brethren are emphatically an investigating people. The prime movers of this reformation were bold and independent thinkers. They studied the Word of God earnestly and prayerfully—they expressed their honest convictions freely and fearlessly. In getting out of Babylon, they had suffered too much at the hands of domineering opinionists to feel any desire whatever to abridge the liberties of their brethren, or to impose upon their necks a yoke, which they, themselves, had been unable to bear. They encouraged, therefore, both by precept and example, the utmost freedom of inquiry. They had dug down the accumulated rubbish of ages, to the foundation stone of the Christian Temple; they had learned to separate the true faith of the Gospel from the opinions and philosophies of men; the original and scriptural bond of union was fully disclosed to their view, and they saw clearly how the unity of the body of Christ could be maintained, without circumscribing the liberties of the Lord's people. Following the example of these great and good men, our brethren have become noted for their zeal in religious investigation. The spirit of free inquiry has taken possession of the entire community; and no man, however learned or wise, need expect his notions to pass current among us without investigation. It is well that this is so. It may subject us to occasional inconveniences, but upon the whole, the result is bound to be good. True, as there were some in ancient days, who turned the liberty of the Gospel into licentiousness, so there may be instances now, in which this order of investigation, so praiseworthy in itself, has been allowed to degenerate into a vicious and depraved taste for vain jangling and foolish controversies. But when earnest men are prayerfully engaged in the investigations of great questions, the result cannot be otherwise than good.

The recent discussions among our brethren, in reference to the presence of the Holy Spirit in the Christian, have excited great regret in the minds of some good men. Misunderstandings appear to have taken place. Unkind feelings, in some instances, have been engendered. And upon the whole, Old Adam has been permitted to have far more than his share of influence in the controversy. These things are certainly unfortunate. But when the smoke of the conflict has passed away, we shall be able to survey the ground more calmly. "The sober second thought" will correct, among good men, these little aberrations, and the light which has been elicited by the collision will still remain to brighten our pathway to the Celestial City.

The reading of a long communication in the Review of the 7th inst. from the pen of Bro. R. Richardson, of Bethany College, has given rise to these reflections. Bro. Richardson continues to think that he has noticed, among the brethren, some dangerous speculations upon the subject of the Holy Spirit. Listen to what he says:

"Here one of our South-western editors attempts to show, that 'God has promised no influence, independent of human understanding and his own Word;' thus denying that God has promised to give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him. In another periodical, we have labored essays, from a correspondent, to prove that 'the Holy Spirit cannot dwell in the heart, except by ideas.' In a third one, printed even in a distant land, there appears a well written series of articles, to show that there is no personal and actual indwelling of the Spirit, but that he acts on men by 'influences;' and these speculations are commended by the excellent and influential editor as giving the best view he has yet seen!"

Bro. Richardson imagines that he sees in the words which he has alluded to, rather than quoted, (as I presume) some fearful heresy, and does not doubt for a moment that the "sensuistic philosophy" of John Locke is to blame for the whole of it. He believes in an influence that is "independent of the human understanding and the Word of God"—there is no mistaking it, for these are the very words to which he takes exception—and sagely concludes that all who differ from him must certainly deny the plain words of the Saviour, that "God will give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him." This is not the first instance in which men have mistaken the cogitations of their own brain for the veritable teachings of the Word of God. But Bro. R. finds no fault with Bro. Campbell. He seems to suppose that upon the whole subject of the Spirit's influence, he and Bro. Campbell are fully agreed. But, unless I am greatly mistaken, Bro. Campbell has used language quite as clear, and much stronger, than that which has so much alarmed him. I do not know how others may regard it, but for myself, I must declare that I have seen nothing further from the position of Bro. Richardson, than some of the teachings of Bro. Campbell. I earnestly

"But besides this indirect and figurative reception of the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit, by the Gospel; these gracious influences, suggestions, illuminations, consolations, and invigorating impulses of the good Spirit of God, by and through the Gospel, in the heart, making the heart a cistern, a fountain whence living waters constantly flow; is there not a substantive, a real, unfigurative reception of the Holy Spirit himself, in the sense of the question Paul as ed the Galatians (iii. 2.) 'Did you receive the Spirit by works of law, or by obedience of faith?'"

"Such a reception of the Spirit there certainly was; and of this 'gift of the Holy Spirit'—this 'demonstration of the Spirit'—this 'manifestation of the Spirit'—these 'spiritual gifts,' we have already spoken as conferred upon the first fruits in the last days of the Jewish age—in the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah; but of such a reception of the Spirit since the LAST DAYS of the Jewish age, since the creation of one new man of believing Jews and Gentiles, and the breathing into him the Holy Spirit of this new life, THERE HAS BEEN NO SUBSTANTIVE ABSTRACT AND LITERAL COMMUNICATION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT TO ANY MAN. Such is the experience of the Catholic congregation of Christ," &c.

"Where the Word, the written Word, has not come, has not been heard or preached, there is not one spiritual idea in the human mind. By this Word, and in this Word, the Spirit works; and without it he works no good view, feeling, or desire in any human being. As all the influence which my spirit has exerted on other spirits, at home or abroad, has been by the stipulated signs of ideas, of spiritual operations, by my written or spoken word—so I believe that all the influence of God's good Spirit, now felt in the way of conviction or consolation in the four quarters of the globe, is by the Word written, read and heard, which is called the Living Oracles."

"Nor do I believe that now, in nature or in grace, God EVER works but by means. But yet, by the means of his own selection, he works all goodness in all good persons; for they 'are the workmanship of God.' The idea of the naked Spirit of God operating upon the naked spirit of man, is the creation of one immersed into seven-fold mysticism, and believed only by those who believe in a priesthood directly called, qualified, and commissioned by the sovereign will of the Master, without the intervention of man, angel, spirit, or letter."

"Strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man" (Eph. iii. 16.) Paul implores this blessing from God upon the Ephesians. There is much to be learned from the prayers of the apostles, both for themselves and their brethren, as to their views, their practical views, of the influence and aid of the good Spirit of God.

That the Apostle expected the strengthening of the faculties of the mind, by the Spirit of God in the hearts of these saints at Ephesus, cannot be doubted; BUT THAT THIS WAS TO BE EFFECTED BY FAITH—BY CHRIST DWELLING IN THEIR HEARTS BY FAITH, IS NOT TO BE QUESTIONED."

Surely the imports of these extracts cannot be mistaken. I feel somewhat curious to know how Bro. Richardson understands them.

We all know somewhat about the "generalizing tendency" of Bro. Campbell's mind; but this will not be of any service to him here. The very subject now undergoing investigation among us, the presence of the Holy Spirit in the Christian, was before the mind of Bro. Campbell when he penned these expressions. He has spoken out clearly and fully. He believes that God "in nature or grace NEVER works but by means—that the idea of the naked Spirit of God operating upon the naked spirit of man, is the creation of one immersed into seven-fold mysticism—that all the influence of the Spirit of God now felt in the way of conviction or consolation, in the four quarters of the globe, is by the Word written, read, and heard; that the Spirit, in mightily strengthening the saints at Ephesus in the inner man, effected it by faith—by Christ dwelling in their hearts by faith; and finally, he boldly avows his belief, that "since the creation of one new man of the believing Jews and Gentiles, and the breathing into him the Holy Spirit of this new life, there has been no substantive, abstract and literal communication of the Spirit to any man." But Bro. Richardson does not regard the matter in this way. I do not think it possible that I misunderstand him, and I know that I do not desire to misrepresent him. He believes that the Spirit dwells in the Christian "literally" and "personally ;" but Bro. Campbell says—"not in his abstract personality." He, Bro. R. believes that it is wrong to restrict the influences of the Spirit to a particular channel, to the written Word ; but Bro. Campbell believes that all the influence of the Spirit now felt in the way of conviction or consolation in the four quarters of the globe, is by that written Word. Nor do I believe he has ever written anything that conflicts with this position. I do not desire to magnify the differences which obviously exist between these great and good men. They both rejoice to believe in the presence of the Spirit in the Christian, as a matter of fact. They both agree that He graciously aids and mightily strengthens the child of God in the great struggle for eternal life. They differ only as to how He works. And here I will take occasion to say, that this, I have no doubt, is the real difference between Bro. Richardson and the brethren with whom he is finding so much fault. And is this difference one of such great magnitude? Surely Christian men may differ about a matter of this sort, and still manage not to fall out and indulge in harsh expressions over it.

The brethren who contend so earnestly for this literal indwelling, seem to think that any other view of the matter amounts to a denial of the fact altogether. To talk about the Spirit's dwelling in Christians metonymically or figuratively, they regard as equivalent to saying that he does not dwell in them at all. They plead the express words of the book. But the Bible says that Satan entered into Judas. Do they understand the expression literally? Surely not! Then why plead for the literal interpretation of passages exactly similar in reference to the Spirit of God in the Christian? Moreover, it is not quite as true, that the wicked one is in the hearts of wicked men, as it is that the Spirit of God is in the hearts of Christian men? But who believes that the Devil is literally present in the hearts of all his children? Surely no one entertains any such absurd notion as this. But until some one shall show that Satan entered literally and substantively into Judas, I must be excused from receiving the notion advocated with so much zeal and ability by Bro. Richardson and other brethren, for whom I entertain the very highest regard. May the Lord speed the triumph of His Truth! DISCIPULUS.

THE TWO COVENANTS.—No. III.

4. To continue our comparison between the two covenants, I refer to the blessings of these institutions.

The blessings of the first were all temporal and earthly. "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great." In obedience [to the command of God Abram took Sarai, his wife, and Lot, his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran ; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan, and into the land of Canaan they came. * * * And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land" (Gen. xii. 2-7.) Three years after this, "The Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward, for all the land that thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever" (Gen. xiii. 14-15.)

In the twenty-eighth chapter of Deuteronomy, Moses sums up the blessings of the old covenant, which are too numerous to be mentioned here.

The reader is requested to turn to this chapter, and read it carefully, to learn the blessings and curses which were promised and threatened in this institution. On obedience to this law they were to be blessed in the city and in the field—blessed in the fruit of their body and in the fruit of their ground—blessed in their basket and in their store—blessed in coming in and going out. God promised to protect them against their enemies; they should come against them in one way, and should flee before them seven ways. But, on disobedience, curses the opposite of all these should fall upon them. Their enemies should prevail against them; their olive trees should cast their fruit, the heavens should be brass over their heads, the rains should not fall upon their fields, so that "they should carry much seed into the field and gather but little in."

In all this there is nothing said about future rewards or punishments. Heaven is not promised in obedience, and hell is not threatened in disobedience. All these blessings and curses belong to this life.

Because there is nothing said in the law of Moses about hell, some have gravely concluded there is no hell. That all punishment for sin is confined to this life. But by the same mode of reasoning we might conclude that there is no heaven; for there is as much of hell and of future punishment in the old covenant, as there is of heaven and future happiness. Neither the one nor the other belonged to that institution.

But Jesus, the author of the new institution, based on the second, or new covenant, prepares it with these awfully glorious words: "The time is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation" (John v. 28-29.)

In developing the characteristics of the new covenant, Christ says: "Let not your hearts be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go to prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there you may be also" (John xiv. 1-2-3.) In view of this, an Apostle, speaking of the blessings of the new institution, says: "Ye know that if our earthly house of tabernacle ("this" is a supposition) were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (2 Cor. v. 1-5.) Again: "For our (politeuma) citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our (kataiketos) depressed body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body" (Phil. iii. 20-21.)

What a glorious contrast! O how bright and spiritual are the prospects unfolded by the new covenant, compared with those of the old. The first belongs to time, the second to eternity—the first belongs to earth, the second to heaven—the first was offered to a nation, the second is offered to all the nations of earth. "In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed," said the charter.

5. In perfect accordance with the difference of blessings, is the difference in the remissions, purifications, and service of these two covenants. The Apostle Paul, in his inimitable letter to the Hebrews, draws this contrast to the life. He says: "Verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary." After naming the arrangement of the earthly sanctuary, he proceeds thus: "Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always into the first tabernacle accomplishing the service of God. But into the second went the high-priest alone, once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people. The Holy Spirit thus signifying that the way into the holies of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing, which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, pertaining to the conscience; which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances imposed on them until the time of reformation." So much for the service of the old covenant. But now comes the contrast.

"But Christ being come, a highpriest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; neither with the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption," ("for us" is a supplement.) "For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of a heifer, sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God, cleanse your conscience from dead works to serve the living God" (Heb. ix. 11-14.)

Thus it is seen that the service under the old covenant was fleshly, but the service under the new was spiritual; the remissions under the old were legal, but the remissions under the new are real; the purifications under the old pertained to the flesh, but the purification of the new pertains to the heart and conscience; the priests under the old officiated in a house made with human hands, but the High-priest under the new officiates in a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; under the old, the priests offered the blood of mere animals, under the new Christ offers his own blood; under the old, a temporal redemption was enjoyed; under the new, we have the promise of eternal redemption.

But am I asked, had the ancient servants of God no spiritual enjoyment? Had they no hope of future good? No prospect of heavenly bliss? I answer, they had—but not by virtue of the old, but by virtue of the new covenant.

We have already seen that the family of Abraham enjoyed the hope of Canaan, and were cheered in all their sufferings by that hope for four hundred and thirty years before they were brought into the actual possession of the promised blessings. So in reference to the second covenant. Its blessings were enjoyed by faith and anticipation many long centuries before it went into actual operation. And this shows why God committed these two charters to Abraham at the same time. By this means the pious and believing could draw only consolation from the second, notwithstanding it lay concealed from the nations, waiting the fulfilment of the first covenant.

Hear what the Apostles say on this subject:

"These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. xi. 13.) "All these having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise; God having provided some better things for us, that they without us should not be made perfect" (verses 39-40.) Now, that these worthies, in common with their nation, had received the promises contained in the first covenant is certain, but the promises embosomed in the second, Paul declares they had not obtained, but they saw them afar off, and by faith they embraced them, and under their comforting influence they acknowledged that they were strangers and pilgrims on earth; that their home, their final home, was in heaven.

Peter, speaking of the salvation under the new covenant, says: "Of which salvation the prophets having inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you; searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Unto whom it was revealed that not unto themselves, but unto us, they did minister the things which are now reported unto you by them that have preached the gospel unto you with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven; which things the angels desired to look into" (1 Pet. i. 10-12.) On this same subject Christ himself testified, saying:

"Verily I say unto you, that many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which you see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which you hear, and have not heard them" (Matthew xiii. 17.)

Thus we see that these holy men and prophets, who lived under the old covenant, looked forward to the blessings of the new, as glories that should follow the sufferings of Christ. They know that the promise of blessing to all nations through the seed of Abraham, formed no part of the first covenant; and hence, while enjoying all the blessings of the first, they looked, by faith, through the dark ages that were between them and the development of the new institution, and saw its glories, and longed to be there. Even the angels of heaven desired to open this new covenant and read the glories of its great salvation. But all had to wait until the time appointed of the Father, and only enjoy its blessings by faith in a Saviour yet to come.

As to future bliss, those who believed in God and kept his commandments, from Adam to Christ, shall enjoy heaven, by virtue of the blood of the new covenant, and not of the old, for the death of Christ was "for the redemption of the transgressions under the first covenant," as well as for those committed since the covenant passed away. (See Heb. ix. 15.) E. G.

THE PROMISES OF GOD.

"For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him amen, unto the glory of God by us" (2 Cor. v. 20.)

PROMISES are of untold value. We rely upon them, and rejoice in them from the early years of childhood till we stand upon the brink of the grave. A little paper, with the words, "I promise to pay," may cause its possessor to feel himself worth his thousands. In matters temporal, as well as eternal, we are sustained by hope; but well grounded hope is based upon reliable promise. Hope, indeed, is often based upon conjecture, or probability; but only that hope, which is based upon immutable promise, can be a "steadfast anchor of the soul." In consequence of the unfaithfulness and inability of men to fulfil their obligations, confidence is often misplaced; so that, in human affairs, the most buoyant hopes are often crushed, and the fairest prospects blighted, and the spirit is made to groan under the burden of sad disappointment. Again, there are objects around us, to which our hearts and our hopes may twine, with a tenacity such as fervent love alone can command, that a kind Providence may bear away from us; and,

"Leave us weeping on the shore,
To which they can return no more."

How much of life's treasures and hopes are associated with a friend, a brother, a parent, a child! Still, if the dearest objects could be retained, and men should fulfil their every promise, there still would be a void, deep, vast. All are inadequate to supply the needs of fallen humanity. The world, and the things in the world—all that man has, and can bestow of temporal good, are insufficient to supply the wants of our spiritual nature. There is One who is fully acquainted with us—He knows our wants better than we know them ourselves—"He knows our frame, that we are but dust"—He knows our miseries too—He has furnished us with "glad tidings of great joy," which abound in "exceedingly great and precious promises." He that can claim these is rich indeed, though he can say in truth,

"No foot of land do I possess, Nor cottage in this wilderness."

But without them, and with the wealth of the Indies at his command, he is a pauper to all intents and purposes. No one can feel rich in mind and heart, for time and for eternity, until he is placed in a position in which he can claim the promises of God as his. Happily for us, God has a depository for his gifts and promises, into which we are invited to come and partake freely. All the promises are in Christ Jesus: "In him we have redemption through his blood, even the remission of sins" (Eph. i. 7.) In him we are new creatures (2 Cor. v. 17.) In him is life, eternal life (1 John v. 11.) To be in Christ, to walk and abide in Christ, is to be a recipient of the rich blessings of the covenant of mercy. The whole of the duty of man may be included in the two thoughts, viz: To be introduced into Jesus Christ; and then to abide in him. To settle the questions, then, How shall I come into Christ? and, How shall I dwell in him? is to settle the comprehensive question as to the means of entering "in through the gates into the City" of the New Jerusalem. The destiny of man depends upon his character. The denizens of the better world are defined to be, "they that do his commandments." The Scriptures are equally explicit in defining the character of the man coming into Christ: He is a believer, and not only such, but a penitent believer; and beyond this, a baptized penitent. And as both belief and repentance precede baptism in the Gospel order, no one is said to believe into Jesus Christ—because he is not introduced into him simply by faith—nor is any one said to repent into Christ—because he is not introduced into him by believing and repenting only. But twice is it recorded, (Rom. vi. 3, and Gal. iii. 27) that we are baptized into Jesus Christ; because baptism is, to the penitent believer, the means of induction into Christ, the Scriptures being true.

Now, if the sin-sick alien would enjoy the promise of pardon, let him meet the promise of Jesus Christ, by this compliance with God's own method of induction, and the veracity of heaven is pledged for its fulfilment. Remission of sins is not in faith, nor in repentance, nor in the waters of baptism; but in Jesus Christ; and all that the sinner can do, is to become the character which God pronounces worthy of this state; that is, become a baptized, penitent believer. Does the sinner desire the aid and strengthening influence of the Spirit of grace? It, too, is received and enjoyed in Christ. An inspired Apostle said to inquiring penitents—"Repent and be baptized, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit" (Acts ii. 28.) This is not of man, nor from man; but from God—his own method of introducing men into that state where sin is pardoned, and where the Holy Spirit is freely given. The believer, obeying these precepts—"repent and be baptized"—can doubt his own existence, as soon as he can doubt the fulfilment of these rich promises. Faith is worthless—it is not faith, unless it confides in promises where they are given.

SAMSON.

CHAPTER VI.

A LITTLE train is winding slowly down the western slope of the mountains of Benjamin. There are two camels laden with household stuff, followed by four asses, upon one of which sits an aged woman, closely veiled. The remaining three carry large sacks of provisions, and by them walks a venerable man. Still behind comes a small flock of milch kine, goats, and sheep, driven by a shepherd boy.

The travellers are evidently seeking a new home, and their soiled garments and weary gait tell they have come from far. That they have still some distance to go is also plain, for the hired camel-driver is urging his patient beasts to a quicker pace, and the old man lifts an anxious gaze to the sun, already some hours past his meridian. It is late Autumn, and the country they are traversing has lost its Summer glory. The fields are all reaped, and the stubble is brown and dry, with only here and there a straggling growth of weeds. The vines, too, are stripped of their clustering fruit, and the few leaves they boast are faded and scere. The pastures are short and but indifferently green, for it is not yet the time of "the latter rain." But the forests are still lovely, for what they have lost of their first Spring freshness is hidden by the soft blue mist that ever glorifies the Autumn of Palestine.

Behind the travellers the mountains of Benjamin raise their red and imperfectly wooded peaks. In some places little rivulets steal forth and course quietly down their sides, giving freshness and verdure to the parts through which they flow. Several of these unite in the long valley that stretches away before them to the distant sea, and form the stream that waters its winding course and scatters fertility on every hand. It is the brook and valley of Eschol, and from its banks the spies sent out by Moses to examine the promised land, cut down the cluster of grapes which two men bore on a staff between them. Its wondrous richness seemed to exceed the promises of Jehovah concerning that goodly land, and at the time of which we write it was the same marvel of productiveness.

To this favored Southern land, Manoaah and his family were now journeying. This was the fourth day of their travel, and several leagues were still between themselves and their new home. The road which lay near the banks of the stream they were now approaching, was good, however, and they might hope to reach it soon after nightfall.

"The way hath been long, my husband," said Zillah, drawing back her veil and bending her earnest eyes upon his: "surely thou art tired. The mountain road, too, was very rough, and wearying to the feet. Let me alight, and I will walk through this shaded vale, whilst thou ridest in my stead. It will be better for both."

"Nay, dear Zillah," he replied with a smile, "I am strong, and heed not the few miles I have walked. Beside, I question whether thou be not the wearier of the two. Thou art little used to travel, and methinks it were ill to exhaust thy remaining strength by a needless exertion. The road here is pleasant, and I care not to be borne over it save by my own limbs, aided by my good staff. So keep thy seat and thy vaunted strength. Thou hast need of both."

"I am younger than thou, Manoah," she answered playfully. "Am I not also more vigorous? But let me leave my saddle, and lay aside my long mantle, and thou shalt see how able I am."

"Cease thy boasting," said he, in the same light tone, "I, as thy lord, bid thee retain thy seat; I need only the aid of my staff. But we are now in the Valley of Eschol. What thinkest thou of the land which must now be our home?"

"It is a fair one," she replied, half sadly; "but though we see no such vines and fruit trees on the sides of Hermon, I would that I might have passed the remaining years of my pilgrimage there—save for one thing," she added hastily, "the LORD hath called our son hither, and it is my duty and thine to accompany him. Peradventure we may curb his follies, and rightly direct his zeal."

"May He grant it!" exclaimed Manoaah fervently. "We know not what the gracious will of God may work in him. In Him we must trust."

"Thou hast well said," Manoah. Of himself he can do little. With all the elements of power, and grown well nigh to man's estate, he is yet a child."

"Even so. He is manly in form and bearing; he is manly in boldness of design and fearlessness of execution. In eloquence, in ardent zeal, in high and noble feeling, he is a man; but he is a child in stability of purpose. A wave of the sea were more to be depended on. He enlists in an undertaking, and his skill in design, his subtle penetration, his bewildering quickness, his iron endurance of every hardship it may impose, are the wonder and admiration of all—so long as his end is kept in view. But let a butterfly float athwart his path, and he forgets all in its pursuit. True, he will scale dizzy heights and leap whirling torrents to secure it, but what is its worth when gained—if, indeed, he persevere so long? Thou rememberest his anxiety to set forth this morning. In his haste to reach his journey's end, he would scarce wait to partake of needed food; yet, as we passed out from Bethel, he spied a company of youths and maidens dancing to the sound of the tabret in the vale below. So, with them he tarried, leaving us to enter a strange land alone. He thought not of danger from the enemy who hold this vale, as the fairest part of Israel, in special thrall. The pleasure of the moment beckoned him, and to it he hastened."

"I wot no nobler youths were there," said Zillah musingly.

"When he will overtake us, if at all," continued Manoah, "I know not. But see! yonder troop of horse are coming toward us with a speed that argues no good intent."

Zillah looked quickly up, and saw a score of horsemen, led by one whose rich dress betokened high rank. "They are Philistines," she said, in a voice whose cold, proud tones gave an evidence of alarm.

"They are," returned her husband. "Draw thy veil about thee, while we pause as though to let the cattle drink from the stream." And he signed the shepherd boy to drive them thither, calling at the same time to the camel-driver to halt.

The troop drew nigh. The leader was a powerful man, with a heavy black beard and a lowering cast of countenance. He was splendidly dressed, and his neck was encircled by heavy links of gold, while precious stones flashed from the hilt of his heavy sword. "Who art thou, and whither dost thou travel?" he demanded of Manoah.

"I am a man of the tribe of Dan, and am journeying toward my kindred, who dwell in this vale," was the calm reply.

"Thou art but on the borders of their land, and hast come from beyond. These flocks and herds, also," he continued, glancing contemptuously upon the handful of cattle, "have come from far. How art thou a Danite? Hast thou been sojourning abroad?"

"I am from the North, even from Mount Hermon. Yet am I a Danite, for half the tribe of Dan abide there. I have brethren here, and come to sojourn among them."

The dignified tone, the absence of any cringing servility, were not unnoticed by the proud lord of Philistia. He resumed in the same imperious tone. "Ha, a portion of your robber band penetrated so far, when ye swarmed up from the slavery of Egypt! But wherefore comest thou thence, with these thy possessions? Perchance this land is goodlier than that."

A flush half rose to Manoah's cheek at these taunting words, but he checked it, and replied as calmly as before.—

"We have kinsmen in this valley, and it seemed good that we should return and dwell among them. So we are come thus far."

"And ye think to go on, doubtless," was the mocking rejoinder.

Manoah saw the desire to do him a disfavor, and he replied with dignity, "There being no hindrance, we do."

"But, should I oppose thee?" sneered the Philistine.

"I am a man of peace, and may not withstand force. Yet, as such, I look not for it."

"Well said; we will not oppose thee. But I, Arenael, am lord of this province, and to me thou shalt pay tribute. And, methinks this is a fitting season to receive a part of thy yearly offering. What wilt thou render unto thy lord?"

"I know not thy right to exact aught at my hand," said Manoah firmly. "But I wot thou art not one to seek for lawful pretext whilst strength is on thy side. All that I have is before thee. I am a poor man, and now a stranger in the land; therefore, I shall have need of all."

"Nay, but thou art miserly, old man—I may not encourage such parsimony. Yet, I will deal gently with thee. Thy kine are goodly—howbeit, I will take but two. Four sheep, and as many milch goats with their kids, is all I will demand beside." And he signed one of his followers to separate the number designated from the herd.

Knowing he was powerless to resist this robbery, and scorning to bow in entreaty to an uncircumcised Philistine, Manoah looked on with an unmoved countenance while the servant of Arenael selected the best of his cattle. His flocks, small before, looked meagerly so when fourteen animals were separated from it. Arenael ordered his servant to drive them to one of his own folds, and detaching six of his band to serve as a guard for the spoils, they crossed the brook and moved away southward, while he and his remaining followers disappeared in a direction opposite to that which Manoah was travelling.

As they turned into the road again he bade the camel driver quicken the pace of his beasts—for the Sun was sinking, and his recent adventure disinclined him for travelling after nightfall. Putting aside her veil, Zillah was the first to speak.

"And how art thou affected now, my husband," she asked in a bitter tone, "toward the land to which we are come? Surely we shall not speedily grow rich if such a tribute be often levied!"

"It is a good land, for it is the LORD's," he answered mildly. "But, it is cursed with evil rulers. See the fruit of sin! Our fathers forsake their God, and we reap the harvest of their misdoing."

"Yea! and it is a bitter growth of evil seed."

"Even so. But though my loss is heavy, and I can ill bear it now, when I am yet without a home in the land, the event of this hour tells me it is well I came hither. Our enemies seem to dwell securely in the land—and here, if anywhere, the blow that sets Israel free must be struck. I would my son had witnessed this act of tyranny."

"Ay! It had perchance roused him to a preparation for the fulfilment of his vow. He reveres his parents, and to behold their wrongs would have fired his soul with a thirst for vengeance. But, perchance, he tarrieth still with the dancers of Bethel."

"And a second thought tells me it were better so. Thou knowest his hot blood, my Zillah, and though his single arm could have availed him nought against so many, I doubt he would have borne it quietly. That haughty idolater would have brooked little resistance, and his blood might have been shed before our eyes."

Zillah shuddered. "It were indeed best, Manoah. In this the LORD hath doubtless guided him. How know we, my husband," she continued with sudden animation, "whether in all his doings he be not influenced with His wise hand? The acts we think so vain and puerile may all be threads in the woof that is yet to glow with the colors of a great and glorious design. Let us trust Him, for—

" 'Shall mortal man be more just than God? Shall a man be more pure than his Maker?'"

"My heart is glad because of thy thought," returned her husband, "and blesses thee for it. There is wisdom in it. If He who made him, and fashioned all his parts, cannot guide him aright, how much less may we? Our duty is to keep the fear of God before his eyes by precept and example, and leave the rest to Him. If he performs his mission, well; if not, it is ours to bow in all humility to the heaviest stroke, the bitterest grief earth can have in store for us. We shall at least find peace at last, for, earth's troubled warfare ended,

" 'There the wicked cease from troubling,
And there the weary be at rest,
There the prisoners rest together;
They hear not the voice of the oppressor.
The small and great are there—
And the servant is free from his master.'"

The moon was shining brightly when they neared the village of Azmaveth, the residence of Mahlon and Zephrou, the two cousins of Manoah. It was very fair to look upon as it lay bathed in the pale moonlight; its white dwellings half buried in embowering trees. Situated on the banks of the Eschol, here a moderately sized stream, it was surrounded by verdant pastures and fruitful fields. Its low, but convenient dwellings, were so arranged as to front on a hollow square, and each were furnished with walled gardens in the rear, which joined one another, forming a kind of fortification. Within this general enclosure the flock the inhabitants were kept by night the only entrance to it was by means of a gate on the side next the stream whence the villagers brought water.

The gate was closed when Mahlon approached to seek admission, but soon appeared at the top, who managed his business.

"I desire to pass the night here with my kinsmen, Mahlon and Zephrou," replied Manoah.

"They spake but this day in my presence of one who was about to come to them from our brethren who dwell in the land of Hermon. Art thou even Manoah, the son of Barzillai, who went hence in his youth?"

"I am."

"Then, come in, thou blessed of the LORD. Thou art one of the true of Israel. And bring in with thee all that thou hast, for ye are welcome."

All passed within the gate, which was then closed. An animated scene presented before them, for the smooth green square was dotted with flocks, and many men with their wives and children were walking about, or gathered in groups for conversation. Though the corners at once excited considerable attention, there was no indecent display of curiosity, but each kept his place while the strangers passed on through their midst, under the guidance of the gate-keeper.

As Mahlon was the elder of the brothers, Manoah sought his house by means of a travelling merchant who sent a letter to Azmaveth, apprising his kinsman of his intended removal, requesting them to secure a habitation for the reception of his family.

Mahlon received them with a demonstration of kindness and affection, and Zephrou soon came to his warm welcome. Both were men, the heads of large and prosperous families; and both were high in the estimation of the inhabitants of Azmaveth. Manoah found a house prepared for his reception; and pleading weariness sought permission to retire to it at once. But Mahlon insisted they should occupy it that night, and it was finally settled that their goods should be located there, while they rested under this hospitable roof.

Let us now return to Samson, whom his parents left with the dancers in the vale before Bethel. His eminent beauty and manly grace secured him a ready welcome from the fair maidens there gathered; while his engaging manners and ready wit soon conciliated the sterner portion of the assemblage, who, to say the truth, regarded him at first as a dangerous rival. Time would seem to have moved to the merry measure of their music, for it was high noon before the thought of his journey intruded itself. Declining the refreshment of which all were about to partake, he set forth on the mountain path. But it was devious, and wound hither to avoid a huge rock, or thither to escape a sudden steep. Disdaining such impediments, he left it and took a straight course: thus shortening the distance. The ruggedness of the way, and the meridian heat of the Sun were alike disregarded, and so vigorous was his pace, when his parents resumed their course after their conference with Arael, he had nearly overtaken them. The band of Philistines passed him on the road at a rapid pace, and he was not without some fears lest his aged parents and suffered somewhat at their hands, while conscience reproached him keenly for his neglect in allowing them to enter a land overrun by the enemy alone.

It was not long before he reached the scene of the robbery, and the confusion of footprints in the dusty track soon told him that the travellers had been stopped by the troop of horse. Unable to determine the result of the interview, and perceiving the camels and asses had gone on, followed by the cattle as before, he resumed his pursuit of them. But, that the herd had been lessened, he soon discovered by the fewness of their tracks, and suspecting the truth, returned to the scene of the halt. A closer examination revealed the marks made by a portion of the cattle in fording the stream; and the fact that they were accompanied by several horsemen disclosed the truth. Wrenching a stout sapling from the trunk of an oak, he plucked the branches therefrom; and armed only with this rude staff, he set forth to overtake the stolen cattle. Following their course without difficulty, he came up with them in an open field, and sternly demanded the restitution of their plunder. The only answer he received was a menaced thrust from the spear of the nearest horseman. Almost before the weapon was poised in the trooper's grasp, Samson lifted his heavy staff, and with a lightning stroke, felled him like a reed to the earth. The remaining five charged upon him, but as a mighty rock calmly stands to meet the shock of the waves that break with unavailing thunder against its base, so he stood and rolled horse and rider lifeless in the dust as they came on. One turned to fly, but a few giant strides brought him within the sweep of that wand of destruction, and his body whizzed through the air, while his steed galloped riderless away. Then, as though it were a shepherd's crook, Samson gathered the flock therewith, and drove them back to the ford of Eschol.

Seated at the generous board of Mahlon, his guests were partaking of some refreshments, when a servant entered and announced that the gatekeeper stood without, desiring to speak with the master of the house.

"Bring him in hither," said Mahlon, and the man appeared. Making a respectful obeisance, he stood in silence. "What wouldst thou, Elnathan?" inquired the venerable householder.

"A young man, my lord, came but just now to the gates, and asked if his parents lodged in the village. I made inquiry concerning them, and found he sought these, thy kinsfolk. So I unbarred the gate and have brought him hither: behold, he standeth without. Also, he hath cattle with him."

"Doubtless it is my son," said Manoah, in answer to an inquiring glance from his host. "He tarried behind us at Bethel, this morning; and I wot he hath but just made the journey. Howbeit why he hath cattle with him I find not."

"I knew not thou hadst a son," replied Mahlon. "But, I have joy therein, for a wise son is as a goodly prop unto an aged tree. Bring the young man in," he continued, addressing the servant; "do thou, also, fold his flock. Thou hast leave to depart, Elnathan: I will also reward thee for that thou hast done."

In a few moments Samson entered.

Making a low reverence he was received by his aged kinsman, who embraced and kissed him. Saluting his parents, he was then presented to others of the family, and this ceremony being ended, a place was provided for him at the board. His noble form and extreme beauty, joined to a most becoming modesty of deportment, fixed the admiration of all present. His body bore no marks of fatigue; his dress, too, was singularly neat. Well used as his parents were to the singular fact that exertion of any kind seldom left its mark upon him, they gazed at him now in some astonishment.

"Whence are the cattle thou broughtest, my son?" asked Manoah.

"They are thine own," answered Samson with a quiet glance.

"Mine?" questioned the amazed father.

"Even so. I met the Philistines as they journeyed along the road thou camest, and when I reached the ford of Eshcol I perceived they had taken somewhat from thee. So I pursued after them, and have brought their prey unto thee again."

"But how didst thou do this? They were well guarded, and that, too, by armed horsemen."

"The LORD helped me, and they were discomfited before me," replied Samson.

"Yet, I understand thee not! Wast thou alone?"

"As thou sayest: I was alone."

"Then how didst thou prevail against so many?"

"Said I not, the LORD helped me?" he inquired, in a tone and manner that deprecated further questioning.

Despite his astonishment, Manoah desisted from seeking a further resolution of the mystery at present, and the conversation again assumed a more general tone, till the lateness of the hour warned them to seek repose.

It was long, however, before sleep visited the eyes of the parents of Samson. There was a mystery, a portent in his late feat, which, all unacquainted as they were with the manner of its execution, they could not disregard. They hoped it was a presage of future greatness, but trembled, even while they hoped—and prayed.

THE VAIL

WELL for us it is that we have bestowed upon us the power of shutting down the vail that comes between our souls and the souls of every other. "Men are all wild beasts, and would devour one another were it not for this protection."

There is not a person on the face of the earth fit to have the whole confidence of any other person. There are none so true and noble that in some way, or at some time, they would not take undue advantage of such confidence. There is no one worthy to be trusted with all that the heart knows, but the One who made the heart, and who fully understands, truly loves, and purely pities it.

Alas! for the brotherhood of man! Is it not pitiful that each one counts his fellow his enemy until he has long known and proved him? How each distrusts and misjudges each—how ready is the condemnation and the scandal—how common the cold shoulder, and the colder eye—how hard, how proud, how selfish we worms are with our fellow-worms. We sit side by side in the house of God even, and there is not one throb of love in our hearts for any except our own. What if the vail were to be suddenly raised, and each heart were to appear to each other heart just as it thought and felt? The assembly would blow up like a powder magazine. The sight would be unendurable. There is one relief in the thought of such a thing, namely, that while fearful revelations would be made of the mass who stand well in our esteem, there would shine out, like pure and holy stars, many overlooked and despised hearts that are near and dear unto God, though neglected or abused by men.

THE REQUIREMENTS OF THE CHURCHES.—No. II.

SPIRITUALITY.

SPIRITUALITY is a particular element of godliness. "God is spirit, and those who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." Spirituality is not intellectuality. There is much of the latter where there is none of the former. Many highly intellectual persons are not at all spiritual. Mere intellectuality is often found in alliance with that which is carnal and sold under sin. Many men of highly cultivated minds are without God and without Christ, and so having not the Spirit. And it is not unfrequently the case, that those who have much knowledge of the truth, have little of the grace of the Spirit. There is perhaps about as much difference between spirituality and intellectuality, as there is between intellectuality and sensuality. The first is as much above the second, as the second is superior to the third. It was a favorite saying with Sir William Hamilton, that "there is nothing great on earth but man, and nothing great in man but mind;" but this is true only on the supposition that the philosopher used the word mind in its largest conception, not as the symbol of reason, but of the moral powers as well. It is only when the mind of man is viewed in its highest relations and capabilities—in its powers of worship and fellowship with God—that its spirituality in the New Testament sense of the term is grasped.

In apostolic style of speech the spiritual is as much moral as mental—as much a thing of the affections as of the judgment. It is not void of judgment, but it is not wholly reason. It is not a bare, cold, philosophic, stoical intellectuality; but a heartfelt, fervid, loving state of mind. It is not put in opposition to the mental, but to the carnal. It is the antithesis of sensuality. The spiritual cannot be carnal, but the mental often is. "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other." But there is no such contrariety between the mental and the carnal. A man's whole energies of mind may be directed to the sensual as fully as another's may be devoted to the spiritual. And this we apprehend is the truth that is recorded in Rom. viii. 5-9,

"They that are after the flesh, do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit, the things of the Spirit. For to be carnally-minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace: because the carnal mind is enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God; but you are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." Here on the one hand we have the being in or after the flesh—the minding the things of the flesh—or the being carnally minded, put as the opposite of being in or after the Spirit—the being spiritually minded, or minding of the Spirit.

Spirituality is, therefore, equally remote from irrationality as from sensuality. It consists in the minding of the things of the Spirit—a being intelligently led by the Spirit. It is not a subversion, but a direction of reason by the Divine Spirit. It is not a subjecting of the Spirit to our reason, but a subjecting of our reason to the Spirit. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."

The spiritual man of the New Testament is a person of enlightened purity and piety. Though not a mystic, he does not comprehend all mysteries. The Spirit indeed searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God; but even those to whom revelations above measure were given, knew not all things. No man is spiritual who knows nothing of the things of God, for it is he who minds the things of the Spirit, and doing so is led by the Spirit, who is spiritual. But while the Spirit is the Spirit of revelation, the Spirit of truth, he is also the Spirit of God and of holiness, so that those who are led by him are guided not only into truth, but into the holiness of the truth, and into the fellowship of the God of truth. So that though the spiritual man is no mystic and no fanatic, he is nevertheless an enthusiast in the best sense of the word—he is an en-theos-ast—he is "a habitation of God through the Spirit."

The fruits of the Spirit therefore consist in the genuine characteristics of a divinely-illuminated mind and a divinely purified heart. The two go together. "For this cause," says Paul, "I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and on earth is named, that he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man — that Christ may dwell in your hearts by the faith; that ye being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth and length, and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge; that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God." Here we suggest that this plenshing with divine fulness, forming as it does the end of the Apostle's prayer, stands associated with the impartation of divine power by the indwelling Spirit, so as to affect alike the understanding and the affections. The "inner man," wherein the believer is strengthened with might by the inhabiting Spirit, comprehends the powers both of knowing and feeling. Thus Christ is said to dwell in the heart by the faith, and the believer is said both to be rooted in love, and able to comprehend the surpassing love of Christ. So in other passages do we find this combination of the moral and intellectual faculties in the apostolic delineations of the spiritual man. As for example further, in his epistle to the Colossian saints — "Epaphras declared to us your love in the Spirit. For this cause we do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of the will of Christ in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; that ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God; strengthened with all might according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness." Here a fulness of knowledge, a worthy walk, a fruitfulness in every good work, with power, perseverance, endurance, and joy, are prominent features in the specification. The Apostle's desire was not merely that the disciples might be filled with the knowledge of the will of Christ in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; but that being so filled with this knowledge, they might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing: and this not only by being fruitful in every good work, but by yet farther increase in the knowledge of God, and in being thereby strengthened with all might according to his glorious power, to the end, not that this divine energy should remain inert, but terminate in a tripartite constellation of perseverance, endurance, and joyfulness. In such combinations as these is it that we have pictured that new, that spiritual man, which is said to be after the image of the Creator.

Spirituality, therefore, is nothing fanciful. It is neither a speculative nor an imaginative turn of mind. It neither wears the hairy garb of the dreamy ascetic, nor pines in the cloistered cell of the gloomy monk. It consists in universally appreciable excellencies of mental and moral character. There is nothing rhapsodical or fantastic about it. It is a renewed nature—one the opposite of that of a lawless, sensual, godless, diabolical world. While "the works of the flesh are adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strifes, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revelings, and such like"—"the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, and temperance."

This being the case, we observe further, that though the Spirit did work miracles in the primitive churches, his working was by no means confined to miraculous operations. All the miracle workers in the churches were spiritual—but all the spiritual were not miracle workers. All were not apostles, nor were all prophets, nor all teachers, nor all workers of miracles, nor had all the gifts of healing, nor did all speak with tongues, nor did all interpret: yet all were enjoined to covet earnestly the best gifts; all were urged to follow after love, and to desire spiritual endowments. To every one was given a measure of the Spirit, for benefit of all: all were spiritual stones, forming one spiritual house, in which dwelt the one Spirit of that God who is spirit. All thus appeared spiritual sacrifices by that Jesus through whom the Spirit was given to the faithful, that the Lord God might dwell among them; and all were therefore exhorted and prayed for as spiritual persons. Spirituality comes thus within the range of the responsibility of the saints. They are commanded not to grieve nor quench the Spirit. They are enjoined to be filled with and to walk in the Spirit, so that they fulfil not the lusts of the flesh. They are reminded that as many as are led by the Spirit, they are the sons of God; and that if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. They are told that those who are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with its affections and lusts; and that their being in the Spirit will appear by their walking in the Spirit. This, then, is what we mean by spirituality, as a requirement of the churches. It is not a theoretic system of the Spirit's modes of operating, but a practical manifestation of the power of the Spirit in the inner man, and in the bearing of those fruits of more than paradisaic excellence—love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentle ness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance—against which there is no law. Let the brotherhood desire such spiritual endowments. Let them be earnestly covetous of them. Let them remember that they are exhorted, as the possessors of the Spirit of the Son of God, to let that mind be in them which was also in Christ Jesus—that they have received the spirit of sonship, that they might think and feel, speak and act towards God, as his children—that they might have grace to serve him acceptably, with reverence and pious regard—that they might worship in the Spirit, sing in the Spirit, pray in the Spirit—that they are not to grieve the Holy Spirit of God by any corrupt communication, but remembering that the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness, righteousness, and truth, to prove what is acceptable unto the Lord.

BEAUTIES OF SORROW.

As no happiness below is free from alloy, so there is no sorrow, however bitter, but finds on earth or in heaven some soothing anodyne. Life is a mysterious blending of light and shadow, of joy and woe: and we find it beyond our power to draw distinct lines of demarcation between them—to determine where the one entirely ceases and the other begins. We not unfrequently find those, whose lives have been more than ordinarily fraught with trials and sufferings, encircled by a halo of true glory, that inclines us to linger over their history in melancholy satisfaction. Natures, delicately strung, have been too rudely swept by the uncongenial winds of time; and from their spirits, like fragrance from mangled flowers, have emanated the richest, rarest gems of song that ever awakened a responsive tone, or found an echo of sympathy in the human heart. Well might coarser souls earnestly desire to endure their sorrows, if thereby they might be permitted to enjoy the glorious revelations of ethereal beauty, truth, and purity in which they revelled; or be initiated into the empyreal regions of poesy ever open to their appreciating vision! There is a voice sighing to us from the past,

"Chords that vibrate sweetest pleasure Thrill the deepest notes of woe;"

yet we would list to our sweeter strain of pleasure, though the chord that gave it echoed again the deeper tones of sorrow!

There are many whose softest couch is one of straw, whose bread is the object of their daily toil; and struggling with want and care, they are passed unheeded by, as though they belonged to a different order of beings. No link of love binds their hearts with its hallowed influence to the sympathizing heart of any living fellow-creature. Perchance, in sunnier years, they were loved and honored, but one by one of former friends have become estranged or sunk into the tomb, until they stand alone, buffeted by the wintry storms of earth: yet, with all this, there may be in those spirits the very virtues that render life sublime! Though scorned by the world, there may be within a conscience at peace with God, a soul irradiated by the light of His approving smiles, and a feeling of conscious integrity that rises above the extraneous circumstances of time and flesh. There is something almost God-like in the spirit that can thus rise superior to things of sense, and live in the spiritual world, in the enjoyment of its own peculiar and elevated happiness.

Our sorrows and trials often unfold to us excellencies in the characters of others that would otherwise never be manifested. It is a pleasure, that we would never experience without affliction, to find pure, loving, earnest spirits drawing nearer to us, and uniting with ours in a more indissoluble union, as sorrow presses heavier upon us. Oh, to feel—to realize—that there are on earth unselfish, affectionate beings that time and circumstances can never estrange from us—that we may twine around them the tenderest fibres of the heart, without fear that they will ever be rudely sundered!

Never are the warm gushings of mutual love so ineffably sweet—so truly above price—as when dense clouds of sorrow are lowering over us, and shutting out sunshine from the heart.

Earth knows no intenser anguish than that experienced when a loved spirit, that almost seemed to form a part of our own, is called away from our communion; no affliction is so hard to endure without a feeling of rebellion and bitter murmuring against the rigorous dispensations of God. The ravaged heart looks abroad and feels, in the moment, that all is gloom and desolation—that naught can ever elicit another smile of joy. Yet, even in such woe as this there is a balm. When the clouds fall into the open tomb, when their hollow, rumbling sound, seems to chant a dirge for the loved and lost, then look to Christ with thankful smiles—yes, look upward then, lone one, from the deep midnight of thy sorrow, behold white-robed angels smiling down on thee through the opening clouds of heaven—and behold among them the spirit whom thou weepest, encircled by a rainbow of love and glory! And look forward with sweet anticipations to the bright morning of the resurrection, when that form shall emerge from the tomb, not as thou last beheld it, convulsed with agony—but beautiful, glorified, spiritual! #### EVANGELISTS—THEIR POSITION AND WORK.—No. IV.

INDEPENDENCY, first modernly urged by a gentleman by the name of Robertson in Holland, if we rightly remember, was imported into England, and then passed into Scotland; and a portion of the free-minded and liberty-loving Scots grasped it and retained it with the tenacity of their nationality. So well does this term, and the popular import of it, sound in our ear and fit with our mind, even yet, that we have not fully overcome the once firm impression that there is something specially pretty, both in the word and what it signifies. It is said that a sugar barrel long retains its sweetness after the sweet contents are extracted: and perchance some shrewd reader may conclude that the sour material which we have received, and he will say, although very noxious, may have allowed some past particles of stock to remain. But "flesh and blood" cannot be consulted here. Paul waxes particularly earnest on this occasion when arguing with Judaizing friends, and exclaims, "Let God be true, and every man a liar." In this spirit of confidence in the Lord, we claim the liberty to learn and follow the lessons of the Divine Statutes, believing that the brethren Baptists of Scotland, the brethren Disciples in America, account to the Master for all concessions and all customs in reference to Independency, as well as all things else.

One thing is most happyfying, the question of this character can separate the intelligent of the Lord's household. Those who have confessed Christ—him as the Head—confide in one another as following the Lord according to the measure of knowledge possessed. They are all brethren in the saved company, and they are able by "the love of the Spirit," to entreat, bear, and forbear fellow subjects of the One Prince.

But, without enlarging upon Independency, when we think of the Ecumenical Councils, the Prelatic Conventions, the General Assemblies, the Conferences, the Associations, the Conventions, and the Organizations which have the fountain of their power in the firm moulded phrase, "authority of the church," used both by Independents and Anti-independents, our new Adam in our old Adam is stirred up to the power of activity. And although we would gladly, if we could, follow Samson in pulling out the pillars of their great structure, (but they are not all Philistines within it) we would not ask to be blessed by pulling down the bulky building to perish beneath it.

Very deliberately the following sentiment is uttered : We will never unite the aroused worshippers of the Lord, never work collectively and earnestly as heaven's chosen people, and therefore never convert the world, till we learn that the church is not entrusted with authority. This is only an assertion. Who calls for the proof?—for we have plenty on hand.

So waywardly independent and rebelliously authoritative are churches on both sides of the Atlantic, that it is evident to us that if brother Timothy, or the hardworking Barnabas, should come out of his grave to visit these friends, he would be told that the independence of each church could not be interfered with, and that he could only be looked upon as an intruder if he would speak or act without special church authority. Nay, he would not be recognized at all in some latitudes as a brother member, until the pleasure and authority of the church were made plain by a formal vote !

Once, while pondering this matter, we were at a house where there were three lovely children. They looked very much alike, with the exception of size. And no wonder. On inquiry it was ascertained they all enjoyed the same parentage. We found, too, that it was not the first kiss that made each of these children a member of the family. Nor was it three times the authority of a vote that made these three pretty little ones members one with another in the domestic circle. Parentage was the capital reason of their family relationship. To have stated to father or mother, that the first salute of affection which each child received had anything to do in making it a member of the family, or a vote of the parties interested, or the hand of family fellowship, would have made the parents, and perchance the children smile.

Nor is any official grace necessary to enable the Lord's disciples to assemble and worship wherever their lot may be cast. The authority of the Lord in discipleship is the groundwork of congregational as well as individual worship, and not the official sanction of any man on earth. It is the truth of Jesus, by the authority of Jesus, which converts and unites men ; and no officer can add to, or take from, this bond of brotherhood and of worship. Hence, our aged friend at River John, Nova Scotia, who, last year, requested to know if they had acted inconsistently in meeting and worshipping in the absence of an evangelist, may be assured that we agree with him, if he believes that the truth of Christ in the affections of the friends there, and the authority of the whole college of apostles, found in the inspired Scriptures, were amply large enough for them to meet upon.

Still, this by no means changes the correctness of the proposition sustained by the oracles respecting evangelists. Let us take up a parable. The sower goes forth to sow. In husbandry it is correct to say, that we need the labor of the sower to distribute the seed over the ground. There is no agricultural grace in the sower's hand, or in the sower's skill ; all that his hand or skill can do, is to scatter speedily and properly the good seed on the prepared soil. If a few grains fall from the sack of the sower upon the field, without being touched at all by his hand, they will grow if they fall upon suitable ground ; and what husbandman, either in Old Scotia or New Scotia, would think of pulling up or trampling down the product of good seed, because not sown in the regularly ordained manner ? And again, what could be thought of the man's wisdom, who, on finding some grains thus bring him a large return, would henceforth contend that the work of sowing is useless in husbandry, or that too much was made of the sower's work ?

Our attention, however, has recently been variously directed to a learned and well skilled friend in another part of her Majesty's realm, who has felt it to be his duty to give a very emphatic thrust at what he religiously regards official presumption. Before us lies a pamphlet of no less than 92 pages, the title of which is in these words : "The Church and its Creed : an Address, delivered before the Prince Edward Island Association, on Monday, the 20th July, by John Knox, Moderator, Pastor of the First Baptist Church, author of 'Moral Renovation,' the Prize Essay ; 'Real Education ;' Missionary Exertion," &c. This work is, we judge, from a rapid glance at some of its pages, a document embracing choice sentiments. If Brother Knox, who has a good report among the brethren, both as a speaker and as a Christian gentleman, will not regard it as a symptom of unpoliteness, we may take the license to look into the centre of the address, and note the following language :—

"The revival of an order of evangelists under a new character, with all the powers of the apostles, only lacking the most important, the power of working miracles, which constituted their credentials, in an issue of recent date, on which the claimants to this office pretend to be called by Christ, sent by Him to preach, to be invested by Christ with power over churches, deacons, and pastors, having authority to call all to account, and to judge all and reprove all, while they at the same time are amenable to no tribunal on earth, and having no conceivable credentials to make good their pretensions or prove their authority."

So speaks the learned and talented Brother Knox to the "Prince Edward Island Association"—an association, we judge from its name, made up of the Protestants, Catholics, saints, and sinners that the island contains. The construction of the sentence above quoted calls for notice, but it is our present business to look at two things clearly brought before us in the first words :—The existence in the past of an order of evangelists possessing authority—and the revival or re-existence of such a class of officials in these days, with superadded authority. We candidly opine that evangelizing revivalists such as these, if there be any of them on the island in the St. Lawrence Gulf, or elsewhere in this great little world, are unworthy of grave attention. They can do little injury. Could we logically or theologically slay ten dozen of such revival men at every time of taking aim and firing, we should be compelled to conclude, on cool reflection, that our labor and ammunition would be wasted. Still, when we learn more concerning these former dignitaries, and the nature of the effort to create or manufacture their larger successors, it may appear to us, as it appears to the esteemed

It would not accord with our sense of propriety to omit noticing the singular specimens of language employed by teachers and taught in this part of the age, relative to highest and lowest, greatest and smallest officials. It seems impossible to take the flesh out of men's hearts, or extract the politics from their minds, sufficiently to teach them scriptural conceptions, and a corresponding style of address. In the kingdoms and republics of what we may call the civil world, it is proper and appropriate to speak of low and high officers. Honor, power and human pride must and will bloom, flourish, and bear fruit after this style. But the Teacher of teachers gives different lessons for us—and to us it appears very like a species of spiritual rebellion, to believe and speak concerning His government as we believe and speak of earthly governments. The Gentile exercise lordship, says the Sovereign Master : it shall not be so among subjects.

What piles of religious nonsense and ecclesiastical haughtiness the proud mistress at the seat of the Babylonian Government has put into the minds and instilled in the hearts of the people of this generation. We cannot say that we are free from the darkening influence and jargon of this "Holy Mother" but with us, even at this date, to say nothing of what shall be, if the Lord gives us life and opportunity to study his Oracles, there are no high offices or low offices in the kingdom of Jesus. Discipleship is, we believe, the blessed level on which we all are ; and if a man has more strength of body to serve the brotherhood, or a greater share of mental capacity, or enlarged opportunity, or more of that proud something men call learning, he is obligated, to heaven's truth, and by the Lord's love, to employ that strength, that mind, that opportunity, that learning, in honor of the Master, the benefit of His cause, and the good of the church and the world. There is no official grace—there are no high and low places—there are no lords and underlings in the Saviour's spiritual court, and hence "every high thing that exalts itself" must be cast down, when it is against "the knowledge of God."

We may lawfully speak of many gifts and duties, and of chief brethren, because, from capacity and fitness, they are qualified for extended servitude—and those who serve most are the greatest servants—but this is not lifting up and making men TALL to look down on others, but making them BROAD to serve men. In the work of the Lord, we are fond of seeing brethren busy in making themselves broader, still realizing that they occupy the temple basement of discipleship ; but we cannot and will not bear them when they strive to make themselves higher : for it is written, as well as decreed, that he who exalts himself is certain to be brought low by the same Lord, who went into the lowest place himself to raise us all up as high as heaven, if we only accept of any work by his direction. ### THE CITY AND THE CEMETERY.

THE city, what a busy world ! How it teems with life ! How industrious are its inhabitants ! How full of enterprise ! What care, perseverance, and thought are manifested ! Every place seems pregnant with life. The streets, courts, lanes, alleys, and squares, are full of life. Vice and virtue, pride and humility, poverty and riches, liberty and slavery, chasteness and vulgarity, tears and smiles, health and disease—all meet together. The beggar and the duke pass on in the crowd, and sometimes the one can hardly be known from the other. Business meets you everywhere. The many miles of shops and countless vehicles all speak of commercial enterprise, and nearly all parties seem bent upon acquiring gold. Here is almost everything which ingenuity can devise to attract the eye, and there is very much to affect the heart. Here are the philosophers deeply skilled in matters of science and intellectual research. Here are poets whose minds are full of high and elevating thoughts, who write not only for the day, but whose musings shall influence generations to come. Here are the thinkers whose genius will give a tone to literature, and whose views are written in imperishable characters upon the great heart of the nation. Here are the works of art in great profusion ; and here, in the Parliament, are assembled those who make the laws for a liberty-loving people—which laws indirectly influence almost the whole world. Here are the ancient churches, and many of the old dissenting chapels, all of which have a history teeming with interest, for they stand in connection with the progress, the liberty, and the freedom of the land. Though there are many errors in connection with them, they do in the main stand allied to freedom and the highest destiny of the human race. THE CITY—the word gives pleasure and pain ; it tells of success and ruin, of sighs and smiles, of life and death. The young man enters it with hope ; he is careful and honest, and his industry is crowned with success ; he returns in the prime of life to his native place, free and independent, where he blesses those around him, and at last dies in peace. But see that giddy, thoughtless young man ; he knows not the danger before him ; he is kind-hearted and generous ; he is tempted by others to revel in sin, and soon, very soon, the vices of the great city fasten upon him, and he dies in the midst of his days. What an amazing amount of mental and spiritual power there is in this great city, which is not consecrated to God. Why should not every writer write of Him ? Why should not every philosopher religiously trace all the knowledge he possesses to God ? Why should not every poet soar upon the sacred wings of a holy imagination, that all his talents might be dedicated to the Eternal Spirit ? Why should not the merchantmen be more anxious to lay up for themselves treasures on high ? Why should not every son and daughter be enabled to look on high and say, “ Our Father, who art in heaven ? ” Oh, were it so, this great city of sin and confusion would be transformed into an abode of harmony and prayer. How many talents lie dead ! Selfishness and sin prevent their being used. The powers possessed are not exercised. The light of the Word has caused the truth to dwell in man, and ever and anon it lifts up its warning voice ; but the cares of the world tend to choke it, and the great concerns of salvation are put off to a future day.

The slavery of sin and death is preferred to the glorious gospel of liberty and life. Men are dumb when they ought to be full of praise; and when surrounded by the blessings of health and the attractions of life, they forget the solemn truth, that man at his best state is altogether vanity. There are in London some of the best and some of the noblest institutions, but we think we are right in concluding, that the metropolis is not the best place for the soul to acquire progress in spiritual things. Vice, seen and unseen, clings like a serpent to the soul. Death and sin shake hands in the street. Many children are taught the lessons which are infernal, and the crimes of this great Babylon can only be unfolded at the judgment day. It is true, we are surrounded by subjects and objects which are calculated deeply to impress the mind; but there are on either hand so many things which will tend to draw the soul away from the thought of heaven and of God. Our home in this great city is the church of Christ. There we feel at rest. The noise and the business are excluded. There we can talk with God, and listen to His gracious message. There we meet those whom we love, and the quiet joys and holy feelings of Zion are so much the more enjoyed when contrasted with the din and the sin which are raging without. Here we hear our brethren speak of a Saviour's love—here we see the eye gleaming with hope in anticipation of the glory to come—here we hear the sweet minglings of praise, and the hallowed voice of prayer—here the theme is salvation by Jesus Christ—here are the water, the word, the Spirit, and the blood. God and Christ have come down to our banqueting house, and the glory of the truth will abide with us for ever. And when to the world we may sink, as a stranger in the busy streets of this mighty city, if we are faithful, the loving eye of our Heavenly Father will be upon us, and our spirits will be welcomed to the mansions which are prepared for us in heaven, and we shall exchange this city of conflict and sorrow for the city of the New Jerusalem, whose builder and maker is God. The city leads to the CEMETERY. What a contrast! The city is crowded with life, the cemetery is full of death. Here are no houses for the living, but deep habitations for the dead. This is a city of death. Here all is silence. Millions of thousands have been borne hither, and many others will come. The cold white marble tells the tale of death. The broken column tells of a young man fallen, or the head of a family who has been taken away. Here are no jealousies, no ambitions, no tumults. Here is a congregation of the peaceful and quiet dead. The bell tolls, the hearse approaches, and the mourners and the dead are there. See that white coffin, how easily it is taken away while the friends, with throbbing hearts, follow up the winding avenue of the living trees, which seem to be mourning for the dead. Slowly the short procession moves on, we now see the mound of upturned earth, and in a moment are in the presence of the yawning grave. What dear little body is in that coffin? Has death been so cruel and unsparing as to take away a happy and beautiful child? Yes. Only a short time before, and that dear babe lay at her mother's breast, and the mother nursed her with pure affection and love. When she heard its first sobs, a thrill of delight passed through her soul, and she trusted and hoped for the future health and happiness of the child. How sacred is a mother's love—how innocent a child's repose! What mysterious ties bind them together! How the happy baby smiles!—How health seems to have taken up a permanent abode upon its cheeks—and the eyes sparkle with innocence and love. But oh, how soon a change came! The rosy hue of health departed, the cold wind of death blew upon this tender plant, and the child of your affections is taken away. And this cold grave is to be the resting-place for her body. But her happy spirit is with the angels and God. The tears are radiant with the light of hope, the parents feel that they have a treasure in heaven. We pause at the grave of the infants, and ask why should they die? Reason and philosophy are mute, but pure and undefiled religion enables us to say, "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight." We read God's Word at the grave, and the bell tolls on. "Man cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down," and the truth falls. "I am the resurrection and the life," and these precious words, w many others, are food, and hope, and life for the soul, and we feel a deeper and holier love for Him who tasted death for us. How gloomy would the cemetery be, if there were no hope beyond the grave! How beautiful is Christianity! How celestial are its unfoldings—how rich are its truths—how abundant its blessings—how joyful its songs—how glorious its triumphs—and how sublime its consummation! It battles with the powers of darkness, and conquers them. It opposes and defeats the foes of truth. It plucks from the hands of the fiend of war the sword and the spear, and turns them into the plough and the pruning hook. It snaps asunder the chain of the slave, and scatters the false gods to the moles and to the bats. It blesses and purifies man. It disperses from his mind the deep cloud of darkness, and raises up his soul into the light and the glory of heaven. It binds the heart of fallen man to the eternal throne, and makes him the subject of those aspirations which flow from a humble and contrite heart. It conquers the grave, death, and hell, and adorns the brow of the poorest saint with a glorious and eternal crown. By the side of that grave we saw dear little children, friends of the departed one, whose eyes were filled with tears; and they sorrowed for her who had died in the time of violets, and the spring-birds carolled over her grave. On the Lord's day, what a stream of mourning friends go from the city to the cemetery. How silent, yet how attractive are the dead. In leaving this thickly-planted garden of mortality, we saw many eyes glistening with tears, in remembrance of departed friends, and we thought of that happy place where there shall be no more death, and sorrow and sighing are done away. This is our hope. His promises never fail. Though sorrow and trouble come, may we ever be enabled to confide in Him who is a father to the fatherless, a husband to the widow, and who at all times, as a friend, is one who sticketh closer than a brother, and whose prerogative it is to bless us in life, and to comfort us in death. Should these few lines be read by sorrowing parents who have lost a dear child, we would call upon them, in the name of the Lord, not to repine. When the pure spirit of the infant passes away, the angels rejoice, and bear it up to the eternal throne. And then, dear friends, remember it has only gone a little while before. We must soon follow, for "man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down; he fleeth as a shadow, and continueth not." Have we that blessed hope which is full of immortality? Then we are only strangers and pilgrims! here, and we can look beyond the gloomy cemetery of death, to the glorious city of life, which requires not the light of the sun nor the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. ## CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN DR. CAMPBELL AND A. CAMPBELL.

LETTER FROM DR. D. R. CAMPBELL.

ABSENCE from home has prevented an earlier reply to your "letter" and "response," published in the August number of the Harbinger. I shall now briefly notice both.

With respect to the letter, I find that it purports to have been written June 1. I had heard through a gentleman, a former graduate of your college, who attended your commencement, the first week in July, that you had declined publishing my letter, but intended, at your earliest convenience, to write me a private letter. All I have to say is, that I never saw the letter until I read it in the Harbinger. I had a right, of course, to think it "strange" that you took "no notice" of my communication.

Your plea for so long suppressing and ignoring my letter, I can neither appreciate nor admit. The plea is, that you had entered upon private correspondence with me. Had you done this at first, I could not have expected my letter to be published. But you chose gratuitously to make a public call on me, specifying the issues to be discussed as suited yourself, and declaring them to be "positive issues." Having thus commenced a public, instead of a private correspondence, it was doing me injustice to attempt to suppress my first response, pleading in justification, that you had written me a private letter. All right to such procedure was foreclosed to you by your commencing a public correspondence. True, my letter may not have precisely suited you, but what of that? It was my response—prepared, as I thought best, to meet the case. Surely I had as good a right to be heard publicly on the preliminaries as you had.

But you seem to feel the weakness of this plea—and, therefore, you add another. "When I had proposed an oral discussion," you say, "and was still insisting upon it, with what propriety could Dr. Campbell expect me to commence, in the pages of the Harbinger, a written one?" Now, Sir, you know that my letter did not propose a "written one." It was simply a response to your public call and the proposition laid down as "positive issues" for discussion, showing the difficulties in the way of any form of discussion, until you should remove them. You say yourself, "He does not even commit himself to engage in a written one." How, then, could you say or intimate, that my letter was a proposition to commence a written discussion in your pages? Your shelter is evidently leaky on both sides—but I must make allowance. And subscribing to the maxim, "better late than never," permit me to express my thankfulness for the justice you have at length, though reluctantly, done me, by publishing my letter.

I regret to discover that, as usual, you indulge in the complaint that you are a misrepresented, abused, and injured man. I had hoped to be able to avoid giving you any just cause for adding me to the already long list of your alleged abusers. I had even hoped that you would find my letter fair, frank, and courteous. I felt conscious of having made an honest effort to place the difficulties in the way of a proper and successful Christian discussion in such a light, that any fair man could not but see the necessity, on your part, for a re-statement of the issues, with explanations of the language heretofore used.—And it seems to me very strange that you should deal in complaint, evasion, and verbal logomachy, while such grave difficulties as I have presented on spiritual influence and remission of sins, are disposed of summarily, as follows:—"I have no time nor disposition, at present, to write commentary on my own writings, nor a vindication of my consistency." To me, it seems, you have given "the" by "to the really "weightier" matter in my letter; and that you have noticed only its "mint and anise and cummin." It is with me a mark of true candor, frankly and squarely to acknowledge and meet real difficulties, without seeking to divert attention from them by petty caviling and personal remarks, say the least, of questionable taste and propriety. The assumption that you cannot condescend to explain what others appears nothing short of contradictions in your language, is hardly an honorable method of procedure in one who challenges to a discussion, which, by its very nature, demands such explanation as preliminary to an intelligent acceptance of the challenge. Let me assure you, in all kindness and candor, that such is the inconsistency and irreconcilableness of your writings on these issues, as I read them, that I very much believe, were they mine, I should find that a "commentary" would not answer the purpose—that nothing, indeed, short of a thorough revision, could relieve me of the just charge of having written with equal force on both sides. True candor, I am aware, is no easy matter, in certain circumstances, but the honor of Christianity demands it. And it behoves a professed Christian to evince its possession and exercise in all hazards.

Before you escape from your present dilemma, you must come out manfully, passing by all minor matters and petty quibbles, and show that the quotation made in my letter from your writings are not inconsistent, but really consistent, and that your open communion practice is reconcilable with your doctrine of baptismal remission. It cannot be allowed to you, as it is not due to you, to take shelter from this, to you unpleasant necessity, behind your dignity, and the assumed consistency of what you have written. Come out and meet the case fairly and manfully without any quibbling or dodging.

I regret to find that my method of disposing of your "reprobation" of our experience of pardon before baptism does not suit you. It is not, however, the thing itself, it seems, you object to but the substitution of this "for a sincere declaration of faith in Christ." I am glad that you see a great difficulty in being entitled to be regarded "as Christians at all" without experiencing this thing, even if it be "Quakerish." If you will formally and always hold and teach, that this saving change in the character and state of a believing penitent takes place, as we insist that it does, and as you admitted to McCalla, previous to baptism; then we might possibly soon come to an understanding, as to what such a candidate for baptism should say before the church, when presenting himself for admission. We would certainly not receive him without a "sincere declaration of his faith in Christ," whatever else he might say. You have now only to give us an equal guarantee that you will never baptize any one who does not declare at the door of the church, that he really experienced the grace of God in his renewal and pardon "when he believed." I am pleased to see this much of a tendency on your part, to come towards us. We will not repel you by insisting that you must also admit "fantastic, and often superstitious stories," and even "idiosyncratic dreams," as parts of an experience of grace. We believe, indeed, that but for the purposes of an ad captandum vulgus, you would yourself have no apprehension on this point.

You pitch learnedly into my Greek scholarship. In the sentence, "preached the baptism of repentance," you truly tell us, that the word baptism is in the accusative case, and repentance in the genitive. But "any lad who had been at his 'English' grammar three weeks" could tell us that much without the intervention of any display of Greek. Permit me to ask, if the mere fact that baptism is in the accusative, and repentance in the genitive, makes John preach baptism for the remission of sins? If it does, pray how will you, through your Greek, dispose of the following extract: "Bro. Campbell came to —, and preached the duty of immersion for the remission of sins with great success." Here, also, duty is in the accusative, and immersion in the genitive. But did you really preach the general subject of duty only for the remission of sins? Your criticism would require the extract to be so understood, but I reckon you would be willing to let the Greek criticism go, and have it so interpreted, as to confirm the general belief, that you preached then, as you have long done, immersion for the remission of sins. Your Greek, I perceive, is very accommodating to your necessities and theology. John the Baptist ought surely to be allowed the same common sense freedom with his Greek, that you and your brethren take with both your Greek and English. I ask no more for him. This privilege allowed, you can hardly deny that he may have preached repentance for the remission of sins, though baptism be in the accusative, and repentance in the genitive.

In the hope of "exciting a smile," you have constructed the sentence "executed in the laws of Kentucky," and presented it to your readers as analogous to the sentence in dispute, "preached the baptism of repentance." Now, you must have seen that the analogy here extends no farther than the mere order of the words. In all other respects they are as unanalogous as any two sentences could be. In the one, baptism denotes a physical act, having a peculiar relation to a mental act, denoted by the word repentance, in the genitive. In the other, the word laws denotes no act whatever, neither does the word Kentucky, to which it is related. In the one, the word in the genitive is an abstract term. In the other, the word in the genitive is a proper name. I should have looked for this small trick from a mere polemist, or from a roguish freshman, but not from a grave and aged divine. But this is not all: you change your sentence thus—"He executed Kentucky," to show how oddly and ludicrously my interpretation of the Scripture passage must sound. This is not the first time I have seen men, when in a press, rest more on sound than on sense or candor, taking advantage of the ignorance or gullibility of their readers. But the crudities of your sentence, framed for the purpose, cannot be wrung out of the words of John. For the form, preached repentance for the remission of sins, yields at least, as good sound, and much better sense and theology, than does the form, preached baptism for the remission of sins. Some might attribute this manoeuvre of Greek display and fallacious illustration to design, originating in felt distress, but I prefer being a little more charitable, and attribute it to the blinding influence of theory and the unfelt forgetfulness of age, or perhaps to haste. I dislike to push a man too hard against the spikes of his own ill-adjusted bed, be it Greek or theology.

Let me furnish you with a sentence which fully illustrates the words of John. "The Governor urged the recording of the legislative vote for his justification." Here the record of the vote and the fact of the vote are two distinct things, though intimately related as acts, just as baptism and repentance are. That which really secures the justification of the Governor is the fact of the vote and not the mere record of it. The mere record serves an important purpose, and so does baptism; but that purpose has direct relation to the fact of the vote upon which alone the justification depends. The fact of the vote may be real and proven without the record, and the justification secured, even if the record, from neglect, had never been made. So the fact of repentance may be real and remission secured, even where baptism, through ignorance or physical inability, remains unattended to. This you have yourself conceded when you "thank the grace of God that we have many Christians" who are not baptized, as well as when you say that "Paul's sins were really pardoned when he believed," that is, previous to his baptism.

Take another example — "The commissioner urged the recording of the vote for the enlargement of the canal." Here, obviously, the vote, though in the genitive case, secured the enlargement of the canal. It is that which is essential to it. The record is simply the evidence of the vote. In securing the enlargement of the canal, the vote corresponds to repentance in securing the remission of sins. Baptism is also evidence of repentance, and in the constitution of the kingdom answers important purposes, just as the recording of the vote does under a civil constitution. But neither the recording nor the baptism, which are but secondary in their importance, and in their relations to the ends in view, in their respective spheres, is to be regarded, like the vote in the one case, or repentance in the other, as *vital*ly essential. The end may be possible — is possible, in either case, without the recording or the baptism, but without the vote or repentance. Tell you, yourself admit, or you destroy claims of evangelical Pedobaptism everywhere to be regarded as Christians, and stultify your own open communion practice.

But to return to your Greek, permit me to say, that it seems to me to be a slave of your necessities and theological system. Your theological system has forged chains, and your necessities adjust them as circumstances require. Were I to adopt your own peculiar style, I might retort by saying that the predicament of both your Greek and theology, in this instance, is not, that they are lame that their legs are unequal, but that they have no legs at all except your own caprice. Still I have no wish for such a style, and I deem it degrading for either you or me to indulge in it.

May I not apply your language to yourself. "If Elder Campbell wishes to sustain himself as a theologian, as a scholar, and to vindicate his own position and that of many of his brethren toward us, let him abandon this petty business of special pleading, the result always of the narrow-minded and weak, and come out manfully upon a few definite and comprehensive propositions upon which we may mutually agree and meet in" a written "discussion" which I politely invite him." My letter was written expressly with a view to bring you out "manfully upon a few definite and comprehensive propositions;" and it pains me to see that you have occupied your "response" without anything and everything but special propositions. You must, yourself, perceive that your response does not advance the preliminaries toward a satisfactory understanding between us. My letter was an earnest effort to give you a just conception of our understanding of your position. The proper and more manly course for you, would have been, to have made an equally earnest effort so to state what your actual positions are, that I could hardly fail in comprehending them. Progress would have thus been made. In this respect, however, all you have done, is a waste of time and labor. I, therefore, insist that you abandon your "petty business of special pleading," and verify in writing, your statement in what you say

"I am prepared to state my propositions on the points of difference between us, in language as perspicuous, definite, and positive, as Dr. Campbell or anybody else can command." What you here declare yourself "prepared" to do is just the thing needed, and so indispensable is it, that nothing else can properly be done, till you do it. "Come out manfully," therefore, and give us in plain abstract propositions, what the real "issues" are as held by you, and your people. And as you claim to have written with the consistency of "Paul and James," it is incumbent on you to show, at the same time, how the inconsistency of the quotations made in my former letter are to be harmonized, giving the rule; for I confess that I knew of no principle of interpretation that can meet the case.

You seem to have a special aversion to a written discussion. This strikes me as strange, if your object be an honest, calm, and satisfactory effort to clear up and remove the points of difference between the two denominations. The merest tyro knows, if he knows anything honestly, that you and I can discuss these grave and solemn points in writing, with more advantage to truth, and greater satisfaction to all honest inquirers, than in the heat, and haste, and temptations of an oral discussion. You must know yourself that everything valuable in an oral discussion, and much more, can be effected by a written one. I can see no rational ground, therefore, on which you can decline a written one and insist upon an oral one. I feel, indeed, very anxious to be heard through the pages of the Harbinger, as I am sure that your people do not understand our views, and equally certain, that I can point out absolutely irreconcilable inconsistencies in their own, as spread out on the pages of your writings. I do not, in the least, apprehend the consequences of a full and fair comparison of our mutual views. I feel very confident, indeed, that we shall be greatly the gainers.

To leave nothing undone on my part to induce the written discussion, I pledge the use of the "Western Record" for your articles to appear monthly, if you will pledge the use of the Harbinger for my articles to appear monthly. The articles on both sides to be only of reasonable length. Shall the written discussion go on? If so, give us your propositions, especially on spiritual influence and remission of sins, not in Scripture language, but in "the plain every-day language of men," also on your reconciliation of the quotations referred to above, that there may be no ambiguity of language, to prevent the desired mutual understanding.

Permit me to express my regret, before I conclude, that the style of your response is such, as absolutely to require some pungency in this letter, and I will here take the liberty to suggest, whether any future correspondence or discussion that may take place between us, may not be conducted without any violations of good taste, or of a good and dignified religious spirit. Neither truth nor character gains by any violation of these points. I wait your's at your earliest convenience.

RESPONSE OF A. CAMPBELL.

Your letter of September, now lying before me, indicates certain misunderstandings, all of which, I presume, might be explained without indicating or implying any dishonorable or culpable thought, volition, or action. There is a charity which "hides a multitude of sins," and there is a censoriousness which creates or reveals a multitude of sins, where no special sin is. Your allusion to an interview with a graduate of Bethany College, may be, indeed, in all its details, literally true. But what does it prove? That I may have had such a conversation, is very probable, though I cannot recall it. I presume, however, that in stating my intention to withhold the publication of your letter till I had sought further private correspondence, to bring you to a public oral discussion, was all that I communicated; and that from this it was inferred, that I yet intended to address you a private letter, when, in fact, I had already done so. Such a misapprehension as to the time of writing to you, might readily grow out of a general statement of the policy that I deemed proper in the case. Do you not speak rhetorically rather than logically when you say, I specified "the issues to be discussed as suited myself," and declared them to be "positive issues," under your own hand, May, 1858? Our language was and is—

Passing as I have recently done through the fields most frequented by Elder Ford, of Louisville, Ky. and learning from most reliable sources, his standing in the Baptist community and out of it, I could not, with a due degree of self-respect, and a proper regard for the cause which I plead, condescend to meet him in any discussion, oral or written, on any Christian theme in issue between our brethren and the Baptist community.

There are, however, Christian gentlemen in Kentucky and out of it, of literary, scientific, and Christian attainments, with whom I would, indeed, much desire to have a calm and courteous oral discussion before the public, on any or on all the issues they may please to form on any of the prominent points in which they may differ from us. To name one whose character, education, and position are quite respectable—and, to me, altogether acceptable—I will, at a proper time and place, agree to meet Dr. D. R. Campbell, President of Georgetown College, Ky. on all the issues between us and the Baptists; and, to accommodate him, I will meet him in his own town, and amidst his own community, at any time on which we may agree. I most unfeignedly desire union and communion with all Christian people who will unite on the apostolic platform, of "one body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one immersion, one God and Father of all." These are the seven pillars which Divine wisdom has hewn out, and on which it has builded its peaceful house of refuge for a tempest-tossed and sin-polluted world. It is for Christian union, communion, and co-operation, on an apostolic basis, we have been pleading for more than forty years. Candid, face to face discussion, is desired and approved by all Christian men. It was mainly by it that the Protestant Reformation gained its triumphs over the Popedom.

It is sanctioned by the Founder of the Christian Kingdom, and was practised by the great Apostle to the Gentiles. The labors of the Lord himself and of his Apostle to the Gentiles have abundantly justified it. And have we not a standing precept on the subject—"Contend earnestly for the faith formerly delivered to the saints?" And who can hesitate on its legitimacy, seeing that Michael the archangel is, by Jude, represented as having had a debate or dispute with the Devil about the body of Moses?

I only ask, Is there one discourteous word, one uncalled for position, in the propositions submitted in the May number of the Harbinger? If Dr. Campbell will specify one, we will modify to his acceptance. We are not fastidious as to the terms, provided that the true and real issues are nitely and perspicuously stated. cannot, in our horizon, see a good valid objection to this mode of procedure. I have stated positive and issues. On a single rational and truthful objection, we shall modify them.

We deprecate with heart, and tongue and pen, schisms amongst Christians, and especially amongst that class of modern Christians called Baptists. good sense, spirit, character, and continuation of modern Christendom is in face of oral, face to face discussions. It was so in the apostolic age. It was so in the days of the Lord Messiah. It was so at the era of the Protestant Reformation. And why should it be otherwise now? If rational, moral, and religious, then, why should it be otherwise now?

I cannot explain, indeed, I cannot conjecture, how it came to pass, my letter of June 1st failed to reach you. We very seldom fail receiving letters addressed to us from Kentucky, quite as seldom do our correspondents fail in receiving letters mailed here to them. Of one thing I am certain, I have a memorandum of my letter to you of June 1st.

But do you not express yourself happily in accusing me of "so long pressing and ignoring your letters" and again, "choosing gratuitously to make a public call" on you, "specifying the issues to be discussed as suits yourself, and declaring them to be positive issues"—"your shelter is evidently leaky on both sides, and yet," you "permit me to express my thankful for the justice you have at length, though reluctantly done me, by publishing my letter?"

Yes! The justice reluctantly done you! Reluctantly done!! This infinite talent vouchsafed to you of sealing my heart, and of pronouncing my motives, I, of course, making such pretensions to judge your motives can only say, must pass for what is worth! Why think you, Doctor, reluctant? Can it be possible that have been flattering yourself with conceit that I had at length met my champion, under whose mighty blow my spirit quailed! Of whom I was afraid! Truly this conceit is even more astounding than your shallow blunders in Greek, and now, in your present letter, in English syntax, also. But we will recall you from this dream, before we shall have done.

"Such," you say, "is the inconsistency and irreconcilableness of your writings on these issues, as I read them, that I verily believe, were they mine, I should feel that a commentary would not answer the purpose." It is quite possible, Doctor! There are not a few who would agree with you. Publicans and sinners understood the Great Teacher when the Doctors of Jewish theology, the profound Scribes, the learned Rabbis of old fleshly Israel, with here and there an exception, could not understand him. Even in Athens amongst the philosophers and the wise men, Paul the Apostle to the Gentiles, was, in their esteem, a mere babbler. There is no strange thing happened to you, my dear sir. Publicans and harlots understood and confessed Christ, when not a Doctor of Divinity in the city of Jerusalem, not a president of the Sanhedrim, dare lend him a candid ear. Had they done so they would have been expelled the synagogues of the land, and perhaps would have been compelled to live on locusts and wild honey. Rabbis, Doctors, Philosophers, and Scribes have never been distinguished amongst the true Israel of God, have very seldom led the way to Jerusalem, and usually come up in the rear when the people have become enlightened and begin to question pretensions, and think for themselves.

Doctor, your style is quite rhetorical—without being at all magniloquent—an admirable model. You have, as you conceive, got me in a "present dilemma," from which I must "come out"—"manfully passing" "minor matters" and "petty quibbles," "dodging," &c. These, and such like rhetorical elegance and eloquence, we assign the juniors, and will attend to the graver matters of the law.

You gravely speak of "your," our "open communion practice," and "your," our "doctrine of baptismal remission." Now, my dear Sir, this is a style of description that I could not have expected from you. As for myself and my brethren, I never believed, taught, or practiced what is called "open communion," nor have I ever taught "baptismal remission." You add:—"Come out and meet the case fairly and manfully, without any quibbling or dodging." I am ready to meet you, Doctor, in your own Georgetown, whenever convenient to you and myself; and perfectly willing to discuss every point of difference, every true and real issue, and this, too, with all Christian candor and godly sincerity.

As I wish you to be fully posted on all my positions, I herewith send you by mail, a copy of "The Christian System," and a copy of "Christian Baptism, with its Antecedents and Consequents," written and published by myself, some years since. In the contextual meaning of my positions, as in these works expressed, I stand or fall in the scales and balances of enlightened criticism, on the received text, and as translated in the Common Version. I have no objection to the Bible Union revised New Testament—if you prefer it—and moreover, I propose that our discussion shall be published, and let the nett proceeds of these sales be appropriated to the Bible Union in its behalf. We stand up for orthodoxy against heterodoxy, in the true and faithful version and import of these two words; not in the sectarian sense—of orthodoxy, as indicative of my opinions, and of heterodoxy, as indicative of your opinions; but as indicative of the true faith, the true God and Father of all, the true Lord and Saviour of sinners, and the true Holy Spirit, as the true and real indwelling Holy Guest in all that are born of God. I desire to be understood, by my contemporaries, before I die, and as I am a real Campbellite, and you also a real Campbellite by blood and genealogy, of course we must come out square and plumb. Now, Doctor, let us as preparatory to this important public enterprise, come to the work duly prepared, with all the most approved lexicographies, ancient and modern, unambiguous and authoritative expositions of the terminologies of Prophets, Apostles, and Evangelists. We most sincerely desire and ardently pray for the union, communion, and co-operation of all true Christians upon the seven pillars which Christ himself, by his Holy Spirit, laid for his own Zion.—These are "one body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in us all." Can you present a broader, stronger, and more enduring, more authoritative platform than this? If you can, let us have it. I am aware that you have long since regarded me and represented me as a heretic. With Paul, I assent to it for the truth's sake. With him I say, This, I confess to thee, that after the way you call a sect or a heresy, so I worship the God of my fathers, believing all things that are written in the law and in the prophets; and having hope towards God, which you yourself admit, "that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the righteous and the unrighteous. And in this I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence towards God and men" (Acts xxxiv. 24-16.)

Touching your allusions to our views of Christian experience, we will briefly remark, that we cannot admit that any person can have the experience of any state or relation into which he has never entered. Hence Christian experience can never be enjoyed by any human being previous to his faith, repentance, and baptism. He may have something called experience, as a man, a Jew, a Gentile, a Mahometan, a Pagan, a Deist, an Atheist, or a Mormon. But previous to faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and obedience to him, he can never have Christian experience. He may have the experience of sin and guilt, but never the experience of peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, till born again, till united by faith to the Lord Jesus Christ. Without faith in the Gospel, it is impossible for a sinner to have evangelical repentance; and consequently, he can have no Christian experience.

To compliment you in your own phraseology—"It cannot be allowed to you, as it is not due to you to take shelter from this, to you, unpleasant necessity, behind your dignity, and the assumed consistency of what you have written. Come out and meet the case fairly and manfully, without quibbling and dodging."

With the utmost pertinency and propriety I could transcribe almost all you have written, and just as rationally, morally, and religiously place it against your assumed orthodox theology, as in the case before us. A legal experience or repentance is impossible to them not under law, not in Moses, or not in in Moses.

I am glad to hear you say, "would certainly not receive a candidate for church communion, without 'a sincere declaration of his faith in Christ, whatever else he might say.'" Doctor, would you receive him a sincere declaration of his faith in Christ alone? No, no! You would take his word in one case, but not in another case! Do you, Doctor, build your church upon faith in Christ, or on Christian experience? No, you will say, we demand from the candidate Christian experience, to be sure that he has it. But you have only his word in one case! Wherein, then, do you exercise? In doubting his word, in one case, in receiving it in another? Surely the legs of the lame are not equal. But follow Philip, who said, "if you believe sincerely believe, 'believe with all your heart,' you may be baptized. It is much safer to baptize a man into Christ—into the faith of Christ, than into his faith of his own experience; which he must certainly do, when, after he has confessed his faith, you ask for his Christian experience, as a sort of guarantee or proof that his faith is of the right species. And yet this Christian experience, when it is told, is an unchristian experience; or the experience of a sinner before his regeneration—before he had a living faith in the person, mission, or in what in Scotland, in the days of my youth, they called "the active and passive obedience of Christ." The Scotch Independents, in those days, had always to make a tour by Mount Sinai and Arabia, on their route to Jerusalem. And I presume, Doctor, you are as well acquainted with that route as I am.

You say, "We (Baptists) would certainly not receive him without a sincere declaration of his faith in Christ, whatever else he might say." But then, is, as you know, Doctor, and must admit, that you now, since you left the Scotch Baptists, will not receive a candidate upon a sincere declaration of faith in Christ alone, but you must demand from him a by-gone experience of a new birth of grace on his heart. Would you answer A. B. when he says "here is my heart," what does hinder my baptism simply saying to him, "If you believe with all your heart, you may be immersed." Or would you, when r diating the common or received Greek text, and with Griesbach, Bengelius, and Wetstein, regarding "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest: and he answered and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God"—I say, regarding these words as a marginal gloss, or admitting them a place in the text, would you, on his saying, "here is water, what hinders my being immersed," take him down into the water and immerse him? If you answer yes, why then, in any case, call for your antecedent "Christian experience!"

You are, then, with us! But unfortunately, you demand of us more. You require of us, as follows, to quote your own words—"You have now only to give us an equal guarantee that you will never baptize any one who, does not declare, at the door of the church, that he really experienced the grace of God in his renewal and pardon when he believed." We have no objection to this, provided only, that the Doctor will refer us to any one passage in all the Christian Scriptures, when such a proposition was submitted, or such a demand made. Will the Doctor refer us to some Greek text or modern version in which we may find such a case?

There is one oracle of the Holy Spirit which I would, with all due respect, submit to my friend Dr. Campbell. He will find it in the inspired proverbs of King Solomon, chapter xxx. 6, "The whole Word of God is pure—add thou not to his words, lest he reprove thee and thou be found a liar." I dare not, therefore, add one word.

The Doctor has more courage than I had presumed. According to my friend Dr. Campbell, the commission should read, "Go you into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature; whosoever believeth and declareth at the door of the church that he really experienced the grace of God in his renewal and pardon, when he believed, may be baptized and shall be saved." This is a new gospel, not from Jerusalem, but unfortunately, from Georgetown, Kentucky. The interval between it and the gospel we presume to preach, is only one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four years. We have great respect for the opinions of some men. But there never lived the man, since Paul and John died, whose opinion or authority could reconcile us to interpolate, in word, or symbol, or idea, such an extra judicial opinion.

P.S. Our readers will please exercise a little patience with us. We had hoped, and we cannot yet but hope, that Dr. Campbell will meet us face to face in his own Georgetown, and as at first proposed, have a calm dispassionate discussion of the real and precise issues between us and the Baptists. There has not yet been published one of my responses in The Recorder, or any other Baptist paper in the State of Kentucky, so far as I have seen. Can it be that Dr Campbell does not wish his own brotherhood to hear both sides, or is it because his brethren are fearful of the issue? I cannot yet think so, but certainly the impartial public will think unfavourably of him and his brotherhood, if they shrink from a fair and honourable presentation of both sides. Why is it, they will inquire, that the Baptist press in Kentucky does not give all publicity to a discussion of the issues which the Baptist pulpit has been making, and endeavouring to sustain, in their weekly declamations against certain heretical doctrines which they have cast and moulded in their own types for us? We are, as informed, very frequently assailed in our absence, and our views caricatured in false or one sided issues. Is this candid, honorable, Christian like! A large number of the Baptists sympathise with our views. Indeed we see them published in sundry works issued from the press, and patronized by a respectable portion of that community. I do not say they copy from our publications, but by their own readings and reflections, they have come to our conclusions, and are not ashamed to avow them.

But we cannot allow our friend Dr. Campbell to back out from an oral discussion. We cannot be mincing for a year. I am now obliged to leave home on a tour to Kentucky and other states, in the behalf of the rebuilding and refurnishing of Bethany College. I leave immediately for Kentucky, and must be absent for some time. Again I must leave for Mississippi, soon after my return from Kentucky, and thus I will be on the wing during much of the present session. One week in Georgetown, with one or two good stenographers, and all matters will be straightened up between us and our Baptist brethren; and no doubt, the cause of truth will gain by the discussion. We shall hope to hear from Dr. Campbell while at Cincinnati, addressed to the care of R. M. Bishop, No. Front Street. If absent, on the arrival of a response, we shall arrange with him to have it forwarded.

RICHES OF THE BIBLE.

"Book of books" is the Bible. It is a book of laws, to show the right and wrong. It is a book of wisdom, that makes the foolish wise. It is a book of truth, which detects all human errors. It is a book of life, which shows how to avoid everlasting death. It is the most authentic and entertaining history ever published. It contains the most remote antiquities, the most remarkable events and wonderful occurrences. It is a complete code of laws. It is a perfect body of divinity. It is an unequalled narrative. It is a book of biography, a book of voyages, and a book of travels. It is the best covenant ever made, the best deed ever written. It is the best will ever executed, the best testament ever signed. It is the young man's best companion, the schoolboy's best instructor, the learned man's masterpiece, the ignorant man's dictionary, and every man's directory. It promises an eternal reward to the faithful believing. But that which crowns is its Author. He is without partiality and without hypocrisy, "with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning"—"the same yesterday, day, and for ever."

This lamp, from off the everlasting throne of Mercy took down, and in the night of Stood, casting on the dark her gracious And evermore beseeching men with And earnest sighs, to hear, believe, and

THE SECRET OF THE GOSPEL'S POWER.

"For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith; as it is written, The just shall live by faith" (Rom. i. 16, 17.)

How richly deserving of reprobation is the system of preaching from isolated texts, irrespective of their connection! In consequence of it, hundreds of preachers, taking the former of the above-quoted verses, as their text, never once hint the existence of the latter: decanting largely on the "power," referred to in the 16th verse, they offer every imaginable reason for it, except the one offered by the Apostle in the 17th.

And yet, how admirable the connection between the two verses—how logical—how inseparable! The "saving power" of the former is accounted for by the "revealed righteousness" of the latter. Divine power—divine righteousness—man saved by becoming the object of that, the recipient of this. Divine righteousness so revealed so prove itself divine power, drawing the hitherto distrustful soul "from unbelief to faith"—from the faith that consents to the views of divine righteousness to the faith that consents to this provision accepts this gift, and confides in the divine person through whom it is provided and conveyed, "the Lord our righteousness;" and thus, onward from faith that justifies, to the faith that maintains the life thus begun, "as it is written, The just shall live by faith."

But what are we to understand by "the righteousness of God" revealed in the Gospel?

Before replying to this important question, we must briefly allude to the phrase as a translation. Is the phrase "the righteousness of God," to rein its integrity as the basis of our inquiry? Critics have proposed certain alterations of the Common Version in this particular. Some would substitute "justification" for "righteousness:" others would introduce a circumlocution, as "God's righteous plan of justifying men," "the method of justification appointed of God," &c.

We resolutely decide against all such alterations. Though recommended by great names, we must declare our conviction that they are as unphilosophical as they are unnecessary. Dikaionunee, from dikaiois, "just," "righteous," can only be considered the name of the quality described by the adjective; i. e. righteousness or justness. It is no more to be confounded with dikaioisunee, than, in English, "righteousness" is to be confounded with "justification." We admit that "righteousness" is the natural ground-work of "justification," and this will account for their being sometimes interchangeable; but they are never strictly synonymous, and should therefore be preserved distinct.

As to any such clumsy circumlocution as "God's righteous plan of justifying sinners," as a rendering of dikaionunee theon—looked at in its intrinsic merits, it is simply ridiculous. Is it possible for the one Greek word dikaionunee to embody the five English words given for it in the above phrase? Believe it who can!

The only modification in the phrase, "the righteousness of God" which is legitimately conceivable, is one respecting the Greek article, which, however, is scarcely reproducible in our tongue, although it may be employed in exposition as we proceed.

Thus deciding for the substantial accuracy of the Common Version, we return to question proposed at the outset—What are we to understand by "the righteousness of God" revealed in the Gospel?

We reply at once—That conformity to law divinely brought about by "the obedience until death" of our Lord Jesus Christ.

In support of this proposition we submit the following considerations.

FIRST: The only other natural meaning of the phrase seems to be wholly unsuited both to the immediate context and to the nature of the case. That other meaning would apply the expression to the essential rectitude of Jehovah. But this does not approve itself as at once the revelation of the Gospel and the secret of the Gospel's power. The Gospel primarily displays or reveals divine love—it is this that invests it with its mighty charm. "God commendeth his LOVE"—"in this was manifested the LOVE of God toward us," &c.

SECOND: Had the divine attribute of righteousness been intended, we conceive the Greek article would have been prefixed, as indicative of pre-eminence, HEE dikaionunee TON THEON—"THE (pre-eminent, well-known, essential) righteousness of God!" The phrase actually employed, on the other hand, dikaionunee theon, is exactly suited to set forth a new, hitherto-unheard-of righteousness, "characterised" by being, not "of man," but "of God." Man fails in conforming to divine law: God secures that conformity in his own Son.

THIRD: As a matter of fact, the Gospel does reveal Jesus' perfect conformity to divine law, in doing and suffering; and this revelation does constitute its charm.

FOURTH: In revealing this righteousness the Gospel does, without dispute, reveal divine love. What love in God towards man, in that, instead of magnifying his holy law by man's inexorable punishment, he does it by "the obedience until death" of his own Son, in the likeness of sinful flesh!

FIFTH: This exposition agrees with Paul's statement, (Rom. v. 18) that "through one righteousness the free gift comes to all men unto justification of life." This "one righteousness" is the unique, unbroken obedience of Jesus to the Father's law. That which comes to all in order to their being acquitted from the sentence of death, and adjudged to enjoy an uncondemned life, may well be considered the special revelation and saving power of the Gospel.

SIXTH: It harmonises with Paul's further declaration, (verse 19) that "as by one man's disobedience the many were constituted sinners; so by one man's OBEDIENCE shall the many be constituted righteous." Blessed paradox!—the second man's obedience is "divine righteousness." Glorious news!—worthy the Gospel to divulge—potent to win the alien's heart! that through the righteousness of the Second Adam the many may be gratuitously constituted righteous. This, then, is righteousness of God for man's acceptance. Well may the revelation of it prove powerful to save every one who believeth.

SEVENTH : It is strikingly sustained by the preceding allusion of Paul to "the gift of righteousness" (Rom. v. 17.) He declares that "if by the one man's offence, death reigned by the one, much more they which receive the abundance of grace, and of THE GIFT OF RIGHT-EOUSNESS shall reign in life by the one Jesus Christ." Every consideration tends to identify this "gifted righteousness" with the "revealed righteousness" of the Gospel. Has God a gift of righteousness to make to those who are destitute, and will he not "reveal" it? Will it not when revealed constitute good news—Gospel? And since "the gift of righteousness" will demonstrate "the abundance" of God's "grace," will not its revelation prove a medium of divine "power" to needy souls? And then further the identity of this "gift-righteousness" and "Christ's righteousness" is demonstrable. The Apostle immediately speaks of it as such;—"the righteousness—the obedience of the one man—Jesus Christ." Besides, it may be asked, Who, except Jesus Christ, has righteousness to give? Who among men? None. And, of course, any thought of God's essential attribute of rectitude being gifted to sinners, is incongruous and wholly gratuitous. Not so, however with "the Lord our Righteousness," our Sovereign Redeemer. There is discoverable in his righteousness a resplendent peculiarity. He voluntarily stooped to be placed under creature-law. His entire "obedience until death" was voluntarily undertaken. "Then, said I, lo! I come to do thy will O God!" For his coming under human-law, (i. e. law-suited to human beings) and therefore for his obedience to that law, there existed no necessity but the self-imposed necessity of love. This voluntary character of the righteousness of the second Adam imparts to it a surplus aspect—a treasury fulness—a gratuitous superabundance, which renders it wonderfully fitted to be gifted unto us, to meet the mendicant need of our UN-righteousness. Yes, and this conformity to creature-law, maintained as far as its consummation on the cross by God's servant in whom his soul delight proves itself so transcendently accessible to the Father, that he stamps it the seal of his own name, and calling "God-righteousness," reveals it in glad-tidings of his own sparkling his—own attractive magnet, to to which, indeed, the infirm Cilician was "not ashamed" to appear even ROME!

EIGHTH : Thus we discover "Christ is the end of law for righteousness, to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 3.) He becomes the end of law, by becoming the beginning of Gospel "for righteousness." He becomes the end of law for such righteousness as shall justify the sinner so triumphantly fulfilling the righteousness of the law, and making it his as man's Redeemer, that now on the ground of his righteousness, all are justified who become one with him. He has THUS become the end of law information, by revealing which Evangel of Christ attains its purpose. Thus has the Messiah brought in "lasting righteousness." Thus, does he, Jehovah's "Servant, the Righteous One, justify (or — Heb. — bring righteousness to) the many by the knowledge of himself."

NINTH : Thus understanding I. i. 16-17, it is brought into striking parallelism with 2 Cor. v. 20-21. Moreover, in this case as in that, the reason of the former verse is unfolded in the latter: "We pray in Christ steady, ye reconciled to God. For he made him who knew no sin to be for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." And observe how the reason in each case—the conciling word—the saving power, is the same. This is brought out, whether we expound the clause "that we might be made the righteousness of God in him" — "that we might be made possessors of the righteousness of God in him," "that we might be made righteous or before God in him:" in either case is in him righteousness is obtained. This is the revelation of the Gospel.

TENTH : By this exposition scriptural teaching on imputation is consistently maintained. The last cited passage maintains the imputation of sin and righteousness with a clearness that defies honest criticism. Christ is made sin us : we are made righteous in him. In other words—he takes our sin : we take his righteousness. It has been vainly imagined to obviate this by the rendering—“For he hath made him who knew no sin, to be a SIN-OFFERING for us.” But not one whit is gained by this version. For what, we ask, constitutes any victim a sin-offering? What, but the previous imputation of sin to it? This was denoted by the laying of hands on the head of the victim. In reference to the scapegoat (Lev. xvi.)—which was brought to complete the typical significance of a goat slain before Jehovah as the sin-offering of the great annual day of propitiation—it was said, “And Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, PUTTING THEM UPON THE HEAD OF THE GOAT, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness.” How “putting them upon the head of the goat?” Of course, by imputation. This alone will account for the fact, in fact it be, that hamartia—“sin” is in a few instances, in the Septuagint and in the New Testament, used for “sin-offering.” Christ himself knew no sin; hence, our sin must be imputed to him to constitute him our sin-offering. The testimony of 2 Cor. v. 21 to imputation, thus remains unimpaired. To it may be added the passage in Rom. v. previously quoted. To be constituted sinners, or righteous, through the sin or righteousness of another, (verse; 19) is to have his sin or righteousness imputed. But the phrase “the gift of righteousness” (verse 17) is most conclusive. To give righteousness is to impute it. In no other way can it be given. Herein lies the answer to the objection—“How can God reckon men to be what they are not?” We reply—He never does. Hence, in the imputation of righteousness, God first gives sinners righteousness, and, having thus constituted them righteous, reckons them what they are! The only real difficulty in the matter is removed by remembering that the only sense in which the actions of one are imputed to another is in their effects. When Paul wrote Philemon respecting Onesimus, saying, “If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account—touto emoi ellogei—reckon it to me : I will repay it,” he meant “charge the consequences on me—I will bear them.” This instance refutes the oft-repeated statement, that in Scripture no actions, except their own, are ever said to be imputed to men. But, in fact, the primary mistake is in supposing that imputation ever has to do with actions in themselves, than which nothing can be more false. Imputation ALWAYS has to do with the effects or consequences of men's actions. To impute sin to a sinner is not impotently to think him a sinner, but to charge sin home upon him so as to treat him as his sin deserves.

This understood, all is clear as the noon-day Sun. Our sins are imputed to Christ : i. e. he was treated as our sins deserved—he died! His righteousness is given or imputed to us : i. e. we are treated as he deserved—we are acquitted—we live!

Leaving the process of opposition behind, oh! can we do otherwise than rejoice in its result? What a soul-subduing message to proclaim to guilty dying men! Sinner, the Lord Jesus has taken thy sin! and, come, thou art invited, authorized to take his righteousness. And what a righteousness! Even a righteousness which God has provided, and now presses on thy acceptance! Here is a glorious deliverance from the past—an inspiring introduction to the future; the new, the bright, the uncondemned, the sacred future.

But remember that all this is to be realized by coming to and into Christ. Union with him will alone secure it—union in heart, in state, in life. Thou must believe into Christ, by so believing as to be baptized into Christ. Thou hast been otherwise minded—then change thy mind up to this point. The bond of silence that would detain thee—break, by confessing his most excellent name. The bond of fear that would deter thee—break by invoking his name for help, as thou speedily goest down to the pure stream, to be there buried by immersion into the death of him who has revealed himself to thee as the Lord thy righteousness. And let thy life therefore be one anthem of praise to thy Great Deliverer. See that it be hid with Christ in God. And remember that the reason why thy Saviour has fulfilled the law for thee, is that he might win thee to himself, and then fulfil it in thee by the Spirit which he will give thee to cement the union betwixt thyself and him. Thus sealed

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE MESSIAH'S MINISTRY."

To the Editor of the Millennial Harbinger.

IN response to the wish of Bro. Rotherham, I submit the following paragraphs on the Old Testament name JEHOVAH.

My authority for saying in the foot note of page 5 of "The Messiah's Ministry," that "Hebrew scholars agree that YAHVEH is its correct rendering — that it does not signify self-existence, as I am, but future appearing, as he that will come, &c." is Mr. Alex. McWhorter, of Yale University, U.S. In his work entitled YAHVEH CHRIST, he says, p. 23, "With respect to this exegesis of the term 'Jehovah,' so far as the interests of criticism are concerned, all scholars are now agreed. Gesenius and Ewald on the side of philologists, Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Lutz, &c. on the side of theologians, are united for once. They all agree in giving it the form YAHVEH, and the future tense as its literal rendering." And Dr. N. W. Taylor, of Yale Theological Seminary, says in his introductory letter to Mr. McWhorter's work—"I only add, that just views of the moral government of God over this world since the apostacy in Eden—a government of law and grace, administered by him who is the seed promised to our first parents—the Jehovah Angel of the patriarchs, the Messiah of the Jews, the Redeemer of the world, the King on the holy hill of Zion, and the Lamb in the midst of the throne—not only harmonize with, but seem to require, the import which the writer of this critique gives to the Hebrew word YAHVEH." Add to this, that Mr. McWhorter's critical article appeared in The Bibliotheca Sacra in Jan. 1857, without note of dissent; and that the clerical friend who introduced it to my notice, represented the critique as having commanded the assent of Hebrew scholars without exception, so far as he knew, and I have stated my authority for saying "Hebrew scholars," &c. But note in passing, I did not say all, for I thought the state of the question required the less definite statement given.

With regard to the criticism of the word, let it be noted—

1. That it is derived from the old form of the Hebrew verb HAYAH, to be; and that this old form answers primarily to the earliest forms of the same verb in other languages denoting "to become," "to come about," "to appear," as in Gen. i. 3, "light be!" i. e. "spring forth," "appear" and as in Gen. xvii. 16, "Kings of nations shall be of her," i. e. come of her.

2. That it is throughout the determining passage (Ex. iii. 14) used in the future that the element of futurity is wrought into the very structure of the word YAHVEH.

3. That in respect to its adoption by us as his memorial name in Exod. iii. 14 we have, first, "I will be who I will be; second, "I, who will be;" and third, "who will be." So that YAHVEH comes to be, as Bro. Rotherham says, "a verb-noun"—a noun formed, as now named, from the future of the old Hebrew verb to be—a verb denoting not in its secondary but in its primary import, appearing forthcoming.

But here it is Bro. R. intimates his dissent. He says he is not yet satisfied with Hayah or Havah means to come, and is consequently not satisfied that YAHVEH means "The Coming One." "With respect to the proper pointing and literal rendering of the term 'Jehovah,' there is now among scholars no difference of opinion." He now agreed that Exod. iii. 14 should be rendered, not "I am that I am," but "I will be who I will be." Keeping this view that this declaration of being has no respect to the future, the question arises—this—Are we to understand the speaker as announcing a future abstract or relative existence? Are we to understand him as saying that he would have a future being apart from the Israelites, or that he would assume a being in relation to them? The affirmation of mere present existence is the idea of a future verb. And if we confine ourselves to the conception that YAHVEH is abstract, unrelated, or absolute existence, the one expressed, we are shut up to the conclusion, either that the speaker uttered the mere truism that he would be in the future, or worse, that he intimated that he did not exist when he spoke—which is absurd. Besides this, there was no comfort to the suffering Hebrews in the information, that one having merely a future abstract existence, sent Moses to them. The whole sense of the passage shuts us out from the idea of a new or related existence. Missing the Alexandrian notion of absolute existence—under which the Seventy and our own translators have overlooked the future and related character of the word of the august speaker—and keeping before us the root idea of the verb employed, we see that a coming to be—an entrance upon a new relationship, is both critically and historically the thought to be expressed. It must have been good news to the oppressed Israelites to be told, that the God of their fathers sent Moses to say, "He who will come sends me to you."

The authorities that Bro. R. quotes in support of the idea of bare existence cannot make the original speak their conception without interpolating. Witness Dr. Tregelles' edition of Gesenius' Lexicon on the words of Exod. iii. 14, "I (ever) shall be (the same) that I am (to-day)." This is not to translate, but to re-write Scripture. Why the addition of the words, "ever," "the same," "to-day?" Why is the verb first given in the future, and then in the present? Why say, I shall be that I am, when God said, "I shall be that I shall be?" Why translate Exod. iii. 14, "I am that I am," or "I shall be that I am," when Lev. xxvi. 12 is rendered "I will be your God, and ye shall be my people?" Is not future relation indicated in both passages? The verb is the same in both—the tense is the same. Moreover the history of the word YAHVEH is entirely confirmatory of this related definition of it. The promise was given that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head. Thus Eve exclaims, on the birth of her first-born, "*I have gotten a man—*eth Yahveh," even he who is to come. Disappointed in Cain she called her second son Abel—a name expressive of disappointment. The next occurrence of the use of the word Yahveh, is that recorded on the birth of Enos, when it is said, "Then began men to invoke with the name YAHVEH." The hope of the promise not being realized in man, those who still held it transferred it to God. Thus Jacob on his death-bed exclaims, "I have waited for thy deliverance, O YAHVEH!" Accordingly Moses was commissioned to say to the house of Israel—YAHVEH, the promised one, the longed for, he who shall come, the God of your fathers, sends me to you. How felicitously appropriate, then, is the fact that the divine promise in both covenants is, "I will be to you a God, and you shall be to me a people."

On the advent of the Messiah, his Harbinger sent to him with the question, "Art thou he that should come?"—literally, Art thou the Coming One?—HO ERKOMENOS. Luke tells us that the Lord began at Moses and all the Prophets, and expounded to the disciples in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself. With the indefinite term LORD, in our Old Testament, instead of YAHVEH, the Coming One, we are in multitudes of cases quite at a loss to identify the person of the Prophetic Scriptures.

Certainly the Greek KYRIOS, Lord, is not the equivalent of the Hebrew YAHVEH. It is no translation. It is a correct rendering of Adonai—Sovereign. Is it not however remarkable, that God has over-ruled this mistake by the application of this very term Kyrios to the Messiah, in the New Testament writings? Since YAHVEH was supplanted by KYRIOS, the Holy Spirit, as it were, to correct the mistake, applies the latter word specifically to the Saviour, so that he becomes our "one Lord," Jesus the Christ.

With the thought of this identity before us, then, let us note a few example passages:—

"As the light of the morning ariseth YAHVEH;
A sun without clouds for brightness,
And as the grass from the earth after rain."
(2 Samuel xxiii.)

Does not this suggest coming? Who is the bright and the morning star—who, the Sun of Righteousness?

"YAHVEH is my shepherd, I shall not want."
(Psalm xxiii.)

Who said, "I am the good shepherd?"

"Prepare ye a way for YAHVEH!
Make straight in the desert a highway for our God!"
(Isaiah xl.)

Does not this indicate coming? Of whom did John cry, saying, Prepare ye the way of the Lord! Make his path straight?

"Of ME it shall be said, Surely in YAHVEH is righteousness and strength."

"Unto him shall they come, and all who scorn him shall be confounded; in YAHVEH shall all the seed of Israel be justified and shall glory" (Isa. xlv)

Who of God is made unto us righteousness? In whom when weak is it that we are strong? In whom are we justified? In what Lord do we glory?

"To YAHVEH of hosts himself pay holy homage,
Even him be your fear and him your dread.

And he shall be for a sanctuary;
But for a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence."
(Isaiah viii.)

Of whom said Peter, "This is the stone?" Of whom said he, "The stone which the builders rejected, the same is made the head of the corner, and a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence?"

With New Testament verifications of so undeniable a character before me, I cannot doubt the Messianic significance of the name YAHVEH. That it is invariably Messianic is another question. But even when put to the proof on this point, I apprehend no serious difficulty. Indeed, I feel some degree of assurance, that it is in this direction that "the mystery of godliness" is to be revealed. Not that any save HO ERKOMENOS shall reveal the mystery. It is his prerogative. The apocalypse of the future, as the revelation of the past, is said to be "that of Jesus Christ, which God gave to him." It is in him that we have God revealed as Creator, as Lawgiver, as Saviour, as Father; and it shall be in him that God will make himself known as Sovereign and Judge. Hence it is written that "in his times he shall shew the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords; who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen nor can see; to whom be honor and power everlasting. Amen."

It is in this way that the Apostles of Jesus apply unhesitatingly to him the most transcendent YAHVISTIC passages of the Old Testament Scriptures. It is when we read the 14th of Romans after the 45th of Isaiah, that the significance of both passages comes out:—"I YAHVEH, and no God beside me; a just God and a Saviour; none beside me. Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else. I have sworn by MYSELF: the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return; that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear." "To this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be the Lord both of the dead and living * *: for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ—for it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God." This—when we shall stand before the judgment seat of Christ.

Thus in Zech. xii. we read, "Saith YAHVEH who stretcheth forth the heavens, and layeth the foundations of the earth * *; they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and shall mourn." And thus in Rev. i. "Behold he cometh with clouds! and every eye shall see him, and they also who pierced him, and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, amen. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord—He who is, and who was, and who is to come—Ho ERKOMENOS—the Almighty."

When we thus perceive that the YAHVEH of the Old Testament is Ho ERKOMENOS of the New—that the ideas of coming, appearing, and revelation are not only present in both names, but that the Lord Messiah has been, is, and shall be the revealer of the otherwise unseen and invisible God, we understand not only why he adopts this name as still his memorial, but why throughout Scripture every attribute of Deity is ascribed to him, and why also the same attributes are applied to one that is being revealed.

Some time ago Bro. R. suggested the language of Psalm cx.—YAHVEH said unto my Adonai, (Sovereign) Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool—as an obstacle to his accepting the idea, that Yahveh denotes he who will come. But when we keep in mind "God was in Christ"—that the Father was revealed in him, so that he could "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father"—and when we recollect that on occasion of his second and glorious advent he shall "come in the glory of his Father"—that then "the mystery of God shall be finished"—that his coming shall be the glorious appearing of the Great God Saviour Jesus Christ"—we discover YAHVEH, with its promise that "he shall come will come, and will not tar—is not less applicable to the God-revealer than to the God-revealer. The name instead of losing its Messianic character, such passages as the first clause of the quoted Psalm, is rather a pledge of a revelation of the hitherto and otherwise invisible God.

I see in this double application of the name YAHVEH, that same consistent which obtains in Scripture respecting divine names. Generally Theos—God—the New Testament, is indicative of Father; yet the Apostles speak of the second advent of the Messiah as "the appearing of the Great God." Communion with the Apostles, Kyrios, Lord, is name of authority appropriated to the Saviour; yet in prayer they say, "I thou art God, who hast made heaven and earth," &c. Shall we then conclude that God was not manifest in the flesh, because that generally the term is appropriated to the invisible Deity? Shall we argue that God the Father is not Lord, since it is pronounced that Christ is Lord of all? In Testament language our Jesus is EL, ADONAI, and YAHVEH—God, Sovereign, and Coming One; in New Testament usage he is THEOS, KYRIOS, and ERKOMENOS—God, Sovereign, and Coming One; but ways without prejudice to the ascription of the same honors to him of whom it is said, "No man hath seen God at any time—from whom the Revealer came, to whom he went, and whom he shall fully reveal when he comes again. Thus both Father and Son are YAHVEH, but Jesus is MESSIAH (Messenger) YAHVEH—he is Messenger, Mediator, Messiah. His watchword therefore is, "I come," while the faithful respond, "Come, Lord Jesus, come"—"is our God, we have waited for him."

It is proper that I state, that though I have submitted such considerations as these to me to meet the case as put by our loved J. B. R.—for which of course I am alone responsible, and which I submit merely indicating the direction of the argument I might pursue at great length—I have taken Mr. McWhorter's work as authority for the translations here given.

NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS, CRITICISMS, &amp;c.

REVIVALS AND LUNACY.

In some quarters a "Revival" seems to indicate an increase of the business of Lunatic Asylums. The following is from the Doncaster Gazette :—

"REVIVALIST PREACHERS.—Our attention has been called to the distressing circumstances arising out of what is termed a 'revival' in a religious community. For several weeks past the Rev. J. C. Milbourne has been holding services and preaching in the Wesleyan Reformers' Chapel, and the Town-hall, Doncaster, to crowded congregations; and we hear that, in some instances, his zeal and earnestness have been attended with much good. Unfortunately, however, a truly lamentable result has been produced in two cases. Sarah Twiby, aged 30 years, who resided with her father, attended Mr. Milbourne's revival services; and the remarks which fell from the preacher created upon her mind so deep and powerful an impression, that her reason was overthrown. She became unable to control her actions; and her removal to Wakefield Asylum has been rendered imperative. Anne Stapleton, the wife of Mr. T. Stapleton, had been to hear Mr. Milbourne on Sunday, the 27th of February, and what he enforced in the course of his observations so preyed upon her mind after she returned home, that the effect was alarming to witness. She became gradually worse; smashed the windows in the house, and conducted herself otherwise with so much violence, that it was necessary to place her under restraint. A certificate for her removal to Wakefield was given; and under the direction of the board of guardians, she was conveyed to the asylum. Her affliction is, however, considered to be a temporary derangement."

Similar cases have come under our own notice, and Dr. Conolly, of the Hanwell Asylum, in a lecture delivered at the Royal Institution, stated (reported by the Illustrated London News) "as the experience of his whole life, that distorted views on religious subjects are the cause of at least two-thirds of the cases of mania in females, especially those belonging to the upper classes."

Important statement, this! But whence come these "distorted religious views?" From the preachers, we believe — at least it seems to be, thus in the Doncaster cases, and it has been thus in cases known to us. The too common practice on the one hand (as in Methodist communities), of telling anxious souls to "believe that they are saved, and then they will be saved," is productive of fearful uncertainty, lasting anguish, and sometimes of despair, even unto lunacy or death. On the other hand, the extravagant perversions of truth in the Calvinistic schools are productive of no better results. The following from a tract published by F. Rutherford, handed to us recently by a distressed sinner, may supply one sample :—

"Hell is peopled already with millions of immortal souls, doomed to fiery wrath; while heaven is filled with millions of ransomed sinners, as vile, yea, perhaps viler far than they! What has made the difference? Man's will or God's?—Man's choice or God's. Those that deny God's electing love may say, 'Man's will;' but they who own a sovereign God, will say at once, 'God's will, not man's.' Yes! God's eternal will; for Jehovah changes not, but his plans and purposes are, like himself, from everlasting. 'Who hath made us to differ?' Had God pleased, he might have saved the whole world. But he did not; and thousands are now in hell, and shall be to all eternity."

Thus is the sinner shut up in utter helplessness. He cannot know that he is not doomed to everlasting woe, as the marks or evidences of his election are not clear to him: every moment seems to bring him nearer to everlasting damnation — his brain yields, and he is placed in charge. Could he not gain help from the leading doctors of his school? One man, recently introduced to us, went after years of deep anxiety to a teacher of world-wide fame. He told his tale of distress, and asked, "What can I do?" The answer was,

"Go home, and mind your own business, and leave God to mind his — he will take care of his own elect." In place of this teacher we have now the great Spurgeon, and to him a distressed soul addressed a letter setting forth his fears — stating that formerly he had much spiritual enjoyment and feared not death, but that now, doubt had taken hold of him. This communication the rev. leader of the blind answered from the pulpit thus :—"Now, my brother, I know you are here. You may take it to yourself. There are only two solutions to your mystery. If you were a child of God then, you are a child of God now, and if you would have gone to heaven then you will go to heaven now, be you what you may ; if you ever were regenerated, regeneration is a work that is never done but once, and if it has been done for you, it has not lost its efficacy—you are a child of God yet. But I am inclined to think you never were a child of God : you had a few fine ecstasies, but you never knew the plague of your own heart ; I am afraid, young man, you were never taken into God's stripping room, never were tied up to the halberts, and never had the ten-thou'ed whip on your back." We don't know that this young man found his way to the Asylum, but we do know that Mr. Spurgeon's answer pointed in that direction. But perhaps the sermon in its other parts is particularly clear and encouraging. Take another sample. Speaking of the first and great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart," &c. he says, "Whatsoever law thou dost break, TAKE CARE TO KEEP THIS. If thou breakest this, the penalty is too heavy for thy soul to endure ; it will sink thee, man, it will sink thee like a millstone lower than the lowest hell. Take heed of this command, to tremble at it and OBEY IT." But a page or so further on, we have the following, which, if the above is not absurd, must be false. "What man ever kept this commandment ? Surely, none ; and NO MAN EVER CAN KEEP IT." But did the Apostles preach and teach thus ? Surely not ! Did men become lunatics after hearing their preaching ? Some such became sane, but never the reverse. Did anxious souls wait weeks or years ere they could tell of pardon, and go on rejoicing ? None can name a sing'e case of waiting even one day, when a primitive preacher stood near. And why is it otherwise now ? Has God changed ? Is the Gospel changed, or has it lost its power ? The preachers are not what the apostolic preachers were ; they direct the anxious into paths the Apostles never heard of, and hence the sad results.

Reader ! let us ask you to behold God as revealed by the Lord Jesus. "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends, but God commends His love to us in this, that when we were *sinner*s Christ died." Hereby perceive we the love of God. To behold Christ a sacrifice—to behold him who knew no sin a sin-offering for us, to redeem us from sin and death — to see in him God surpassing in the unspeakable brilliancy of His love, the most exalted conceptions of the highest created intelligence.

"What is more tender than a mother's love To the sweet infant fondling in her arms What arguments need her compassion move To hear its cries and help it in its harms Now if the tenderest mother were possessed Of all the love within her single breast, Of all the mothers since the world began, 'Tis nothing to the love of God to man !"

Thousands have felt the power of this transforming love : it has turned the lion to a lamb, and changed the leopard's spots. The Apostle Paul exclaims—"The love of God constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead."—"Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature ; old things are passed away : behold ! all things are become new. And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation : to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them ; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us : we pray you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God" (2 Cor. v. 17-20.) And still is God through Christ reconciling men. Believe it true that God willeth not that any should perish—that He is not waiting for your reformation to reconcile Him—that you have not to render Him propitious, or to move Him to compassionate you

He loves thee, sinner—He ever did—and He waits for thee to be reconciled to Him. The change must be in thyself, not in God; and when thy heart will bow to Jesus, so as to say in love and gratitude, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" heaven proclaims thee begotten of God, and the truthful proclaimer of the way of salvation will say to thee, as did Ananias to Saul, "Why tarriest thou? Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord!" D. K.

MORE STATE-CHURCH FRUIT.

Yes! more state-church fruit, and of the same kind, too. You find it always of one sort, always bad. From the Nonconformist we have the following concerning the church in Holland:—

"To keep the National Protestant Church under the control of the Government, the professors of divinity in all our universities are declared to be officers of the State, and not of the Church. So the teachers who are to instruct the students for the holy ministry, are called and appointed by a Government composed of Romanists and Protestants, and nothing prevents a Jew from becoming a Minister of State, with the right of calling those professors. The consequence is, that, with the exception only of one or two, those professors are Rationalists, and even Pantheists. One of them has declared in his writings, that he considers the gospel as a wasp's nest of fables. Of course, the same Rationalistic spirit prevails among the clergy, who are trained up in the colleges of those teachers. The National Protestant Church of Holland, I am sorry to say, may be called a Rationalistic Unitarian Establishment. On account of its heresies some 50,000 people left it in 1830, and formed a Presbyterian Secession church, divided into 160 churches. This is an orthodox body, but it is a pity that they have organized themselves upon the basis of a strong State Church system, and petition for salaries for their ministers from that same Government, who have banished Christ and his Bible from our schools."

ANOTHER SAMPLE OF THE ONE-MAN SYSTEM.

"INDEPENDENT CHURCH, GRAFTON STREET, FITZROY-SQUARE.—We regret to hear that the Rev. Thomas T. Lynch is obliged, on account of illness, to suspend for a time his ministerial labours in the above place of worship. It appears for some months Mr. Lynch's health has been indifferent; but it is now suddenly prostrated through extreme exhaustion caused by overwork during his weak condition. His medical advisers recommend absolute rest for a considerable period, and his congregation have unanimously joined in a request to him to abstain entirely from his public engagements for the space of twelve months, when it is confidently hoped he will be able to resume his labours. We are requested to state that as many of his people reside at great distances, the usual services on the Sabbath will be discontinued during Mr. Lynch's absence. But a meeting of the congregation and friends will be held on the first Monday evening in every month, to receive any communication from Mr. Lynch; with a view also to unite in devotional exercises, to transact such church business as may be necessary, and to afford the congregation opportunities of friendly and serviceable intercourse."—Nonconformist.

1. Prostrated by extreme exhaustion caused by overwork. Of course! By what authority did Mr. Lynch constitute himself the sole preacher, teacher, and ruler of a church?

2. "His people." Very common style, this! But whoever heard of Paul's people, Peter's people, John's people? In the time of these worthy apostles, preachers, and elders, it was the Lord's people, and they with the rest were brethren, part of that people. But now people have other masters—they heap up to themselves teachers, having itching ears.

3. "The Sabbath services (very Jewish) will be discontinued during Mr. Lynch's absence." The Lord's people were wont to come together on the first day of the week, to observe the ordinances as they were delivered unto them, (and, we presume, continue to do so still); but, as the Grafton-street people are Mr. Lynch's, they do right enough in shutting up for a year or so, until the lord of them can again appear.

4. In the meantime we wish them much profit from their monthly Monday night meeting, and would earnestly recommend them to search the Scriptures with two questions in view—1st, How can we become the Lord's people?—2nd, What would He have us to do?

OPEN COMMUNION.—WANTED, AN INVINCIBLE ARGUMENT IN FAVOUR OF IT.

Just one will suffice. Can any good neighbour aid us? It is pleasant to receive our well-disposed but unbaptized friends at the Lord's table, and not only so, but it tends greatly to our popularity. Hitherto, however, we have not been able to find even one good reason in support of it. Only a short time back we requested the minister of one of the larger Open Communion Baptist Churches in Birmingham, to state in our pages, either with or without name attached, his scriptural reasons, but could only get in answer, "I have neither time, inclination, nor talent." One remarkable feature in connection with this question is, that Baptists are nearly the only defenders of Open Communion—by which we mean, and they mean, the participation at the Lord's table with unbaptized persons. The advocates of sprinkling may be willing to commune with the Baptist, but he does not ask to do it as unbaptized; while the Baptist holds him as altogether without Christian baptism. On this point the Rev. Dr. Campbell, of London, expresses the conviction of thousands of Congregationalists. His words are—

"In this matter we have ever viewed Mr. Kinghorn as entirely correct, and Mr. Hall as entirely wrong. Never, perhaps, was there such an expenditure of argument, the most seductive and eloquent, the most overwhelming, in defence of a point so utterly untenable. The spirit of Hall is noble and generous, but we have ever thought that he illustrated these attributes at the expense of inspiration. We should have thanked Mr. Hall for his generosity and his catholicity, in offering to admit us 'unbaptized,' to the table of the Lord; but we should, at the same time, have declined to be admitted on such terms, considering it an indignity, if not an insult, rather than Christian forbearance or ecclesiastical courtesy. We should have, in toto disputed his broad principle, that 'nothing is to be considered a condition of fellowship below, that is not equally a condition of fellowship above.' We should promptly have entered our protest against discussing the subject on the celestial altitude, and descending to the earth, have hastened to institute an inquiry as to how the Apostles proceeded."

to feeling, when and where they ought to walk by faith, we doubt not—have found it so in our converse with those who defend it. A recent instance of this kind is supplied in the case of Mr. Evans, late of Newtown, now of Dudley. At Newtown, the Rev. Dr. Evans was quite popular, and though but a small place, he immersed some 250 persons in about three years, entering upon his new field of labor after an after dinner speech, and when supported by the Rev. J. J. Brown and J. Lord, of Birmingham, (the Rev. Vince, also of Birmingham, having preached in the morning) and a large company of neighbouring ministers and deacons, Baptist, Methodist, Congregational, and Unitarian, Mr. Evans, much to the pleasure of his hearers, declared in favour of Open Communion. From the Newtown Christian Investigator (a small monthly periodical), we give the following strictures on Mr. Evans' marks upon the subject now before us. It is understood that that gentleman has intimated his intention to resign, and should he do so we may notice the matter further.

"The following extract on Open Communion is from the Dudley speech.

"Then there was another objection, that was, That I was not only prepared to assist other Christian communities, but to forsooth, to unite with them at 'the Lord's Table.' And this appeared a great crime. I would not state dogmatically, neither have I fully considered and argued the question, whether the doctrine of free communion, is a scriptural one or not. Indeed I am not aware that there is anything conclusive about it in the Scriptures; but my own instinctive feeling leads me to embrace it. (Cheers.) And I believe the genius of Christianity leads to the same thing. (Cheers.) It has always been my feeling to unite with those who have a view of doing good, whenever I agree with them, and in commemoration of the death of our blessed Saviour, who can disagree?"

"Now, we complain of Mr. E.'s advocacy of Open Communion in two respects—as to the matter of it, and as to the manner of it. We complain of the matter of it because we regard Open Communion, itself, as unscriptural. On this point shall suffice to quote the following conclusive remarks from Messiah's Ministry, (208, 209.)

into the ecclesia (church) and service easier than the Lord has made it. It is supposed to be charity to do so—the defection is dignified with the name of ‘Christian forbearance,’ as if forsooth the Messiah were a hard master, requiring what he should have dispensed with; or as if his servants were wiser and more charitable than he, knowing better what the law of admission ought to be, and generously surrendering that which should never have been made ‘a term of communion;’ or as if the apostles did not make immersion into Christ such, as if they did not require faith first, baptism next, and fellowship and service third; or as if Christian forbearance consisted not in the suffering and forgiving of personal injury, but in an agreement to disregard certain of the laws of Christ. In these respects the order of Christian fellowship and ministry is transgressed. Rom. xv. 7 is appealed to in favour of Open Communion, but it is forgotten that when the apostle says, ‘receive ye one another, as Christ also received us to the glory of God,’ he is not urging the non-essentiality of baptism, or of any of Christ’s commands, but the duty of the brotherhood to receive those weak in the faith, not to judge their doubtful thoughts, but to bear their infirmities. And it is forgotten also that the rule of reception itself rather includes baptism than otherwise. The phrase, ‘as Christ also received us,’ implies manner of reception. As if a father were first to do something for his eldest son, and having given him to know his plan, were to say, Now, my boy, do this for thy brother, as I also have done it for you. Every one sees that the father’s meaning would be, not that his son was to dispense with any item in his own procedure toward him, but expressly to follow, as a rule, what he had first done; the boy would understand that he was simply to act according to the example set before him. So, here; the rule is, as Christ hath received us. This includes baptism!

“But we complain of the manner in which Mr. Evans pleads for ‘Open Communion,’ more than of the fact that he does plead for it. Had his advocacy resulted from conscientious conviction, we could have respected it, even while dissenting from it as wholly erroneous. But Mr. E. admits that he is not satisfied that the ‘Open Communion’ is scriptural. He says, ‘I would not state dogmatically, neither have I fully considered and argued the question, whether the doctrine of free communion is a scriptural one or not.’ This, certainly, is very candid. But it is not very creditable to Mr. E.’s reverence for the Scriptures. It is high time that he did fully consider the question in the light of the Scriptures. How can he find the courage to go about endeavouring to unsettle his Baptist brethren in their views, and in doing so, not only endanger divisions among them, but outrival his Pædobaptist friends in the cultivation of a false liberality, without, at least, the full conviction of his own mind that he is well sustained by the New Testament? Were Mr. E. a novice in the Christian faith he might be excusable—not for advocating Open Communion, but—for not yet having found time to examine this communion question. But in a gentleman of his mature years—having been engaged for the time he has as a Christian teacher, this excuse were entirely inadmissible. ‘Indeed, I am not aware,’ says Mr. E. ‘that there is anything conclusive about it in the Scriptures.’ This is a curious statement, exciting quite a variety of reflections. Our first thought is—Well, poor man, how can he be fully aware whether there is anything conclusive about it in the Scriptures, if, as he admits, he has never fully considered and argued the question in its scriptural aspect! How can persons make the Scriptures a practical guide, unless they will give themselves the trouble to ‘fully consider’ its teachings! But our next thought is of quite another order.—We had always supposed Mr. E. a Protestant, and doubted not that he would heartily endorse the celebrated declaration of CHILLINGWORTH, ‘The Bible—the Bible alone—is the religion of Protestants!’ But what has come of him? Has he been ensnared in the silken cords of some dear Roman Catholic ‘brethren’ yonder in the black country? That can hardly be; for has he not just said, like a brave and true Protestant, in this same speech—‘My creed is God’s Word.’ Now, although friend Evans, in a moment of hallucination, may have innocently imagined that his ‘only standard’ patronised Pædobaptism and Unitarianism, yet surely he has not been ensnared in the delusion that ‘the Bible’ as his ‘only standard’ comes to the same thing as ‘the Bible and Tradition!’ No, no,—this cannot be entertained. Nevertheless, one thing is palpable, viz. that Mr. E. has got to the end of his creed. For, here is a practical subject, one relating to the order of a Christian church and the conduct of its members, one too, in relation to which Mr. E. finds himself obliged to take one side or the other, and yet he is not ‘aware’ that his ‘creed’—his ‘only standard’ contains ‘anything conclusive about it.’ Alas, for a man when his ‘only standard’ thus fails him! What he will do in such a dilemma, it is difficult, beforehand, to conjecture.

“But we have a third thought which may help the matter a little.—‘I am not aware that there is anything conclusive about it in the Scriptures.’ Stay a little!

Are you then, dear sir, not aware? Think again. Ah! does memory fail? Sad thing, that our memories should prove so treacherous. But come! let us refresh them a little. You of course recollect the oracle of the Lord Jesus (John iii. 5) 'Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God.' And do you not recollect that in the hearing of the writer and others, you have declared your conviction that by 'water' in this place the Lord intended immersion? The time—the place—the circumstances of this avowal need no mention here. Memory can no longer fail. It was then thought that Mr. Evans did know something conclusive in the Scriptures on the communion question. Its conclusiveness was then pointed out in the following manner:—'You admit then, Mr. Evans, that no one can enter the kingdom of God, i. e. the church of Christ on earth, without immersion; hence, it plainly appears that in advocating open communion, you advocate the moving of the Lord's Table outside his kingdom, for the special benefit of those who, according to your own shewing, have never yet entered that kingdom.'

"But," says Mr. E. 'my own instinctive feeling leads me to it.' Aye, that's it—the right nail is now hit on the head. It is such a very pleasant 'instinctive feeling' that gets rid of bearing the cross. It does not require much abstraction to estimate the 'instinctive feeling' which, when indulged, obtains as our reward the approbation of our Pædobaptist friends. It 'instinctively feels' so nice to hear them call us liberal men! 'And I believe the genius of Christianity leads to the same thing.' Pooh, pooh! 'genius of Christianity,' indeed!—the last thing a drowning man snatches at!—when he cannot find a single text to stand upon, then oh! 'the genius of Christianity' leads to the desired conclusion! But, 'in commemorating the Saviour's death who can disagree?' We reply in a word—the believing and the unbelieving—the obedient and the disobedient—the orderly and the disorderly—these ought to disagree. Else where is church discipline—where the church itself—the called out, the separated people?

"As an advocate of believer's immersion, Mr. Evans ought to know that to admit our 'instinctive (often perverted) feelings' as a standard of judgment and action in relation to the Christian faith, is to open the flood-gates of error, and in particular, to furnish Pædobaptism with its only weapon.—Will not Mr. Evans admit that we do him ample justice if we dignify his 'instinctive feeling' with the name of 'Christian consciousness'—is it not a fine name for it? Behold, then, from the testimony of Neander, the great German church historian, this same so-called 'Christian consciousness' originating infant baptism:—

"In the first age of the church, on adults who entered it consciously and voluntarily, were baptized. But after the first foundation of the church had been laid and Christian domestic life had been formed, INFANT BAPTISM was introduced, from the development of the CHRISTIAN CONSCIOUSNESS corresponding to the idea of baptism at the birth of the church."—Memorials of Christian Life, page 280.

"Let Mr. E. extract from this testimony all the consolation he can!"

TO THE NEWLY-CONVERTED

TRUE conversion implies more than is now often felt, done, or experienced by many styled converts. We may be converted to a party, to a doctrine, from one practice to another, and may be converted to God nor have any change of heart. True conversion God affects the entire will and heart—all the affections. Conversion to God implies that we enter his service willingly, devoting all our powers to his service—that we have become servants from choice or constrained by love. The converted person is always justified as well as purified by faith, and becomes a child of God, adopted into the household of faith, there to enjoy and exhibit the spirit of adoption and show the obedience of a son.

Peter when addressing a large company of Jews uttered an important oracle when he said, "repent ye therefore and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times for refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord" (Acts iii. 9.) Here conversion is made as much a means of enjoying pardon as repentance. On the genuineness of our conversion will depend our steadfastness in the faith and enjoyment of the gospel promises. Conversion being personal and palpable in all its effects, there is no reason for doubt left as to whether we are converted or not. The dead tree can as easily produce leaves and fruit as the unconverted man walk uprightly, show piety to God, and enjoy that hope which fills with joy and makes one not ashamed to be reproached for Christ. Also every one knows whether he has sought the Lord and his ways with sincerity of heart, and whether he has turned away from serving Satan and walking in the ways of ungodly men.

Conversion implies a change of state and brings into a new service, yielding new pleasures, and new and rich rewards.

The one then whose faith, working by love, has resulted in his conversion, has a new heart, has put on "the new man," has a new name, a new hope, a new life, and new and heavenly desires.

Do we, then, address one who is a new convert to God through faith in Christ? Remember the race begun is not the crown won. Arm yourself with the whole armour of God, to stand fast in the faith. The warfare against sin is but begun. The battle must be fought, not with fleshly weapons, but with the weapons found in the Word of the Lord. You must fight the "fight of faith" under the Captain of Salvation, and a victory and glory will be gained. The race set before you must be run with humble diligence. Unbelief, "the sin which doth so easily beset us," and every other encumbering sin, must be forsaken and guarded against, and then looking to Jesus for an example, the race may be run with success, all obstacles overcome, and that crown gained which is greater than all treasures below, and equal to all that is great above. Do not think the race is long, for life will soon come to a close. Do not think the way too narrow, for the Lord himself prepared it, and fitted it to be the path to life and glory. Nor view the country through which you travel as bearing no good fruit, for faith and hope produce many pleasant—nay, heavenly—fruits, to gladden the pilgrim even while below.

You now have new duties to perform and new pleasures to enjoy. The Lord has prepared a weekly feast for you—a company of friends to meet you, on his own day. Your aim should be, then, to be in your place in the assembly to hear the word of the Lord, to sing his praise, and join to supplicate his favor and pardon; and, with a glad and grateful heart, to celebrate that crowning act of his love, the shedding of his precious blood to purge you from sin. Let his love control your heart, and call forth that love and gratitude which are due to him from every sinner redeemed by him from destruction which could never end. And ever think of that crown which the Saviour will set on the heads of all his faithful followers, which will sparkle and shine with glory to all eternity, while you may traverse the pathless celestial fields, and ever learn to adore and praise the Lamb who redeemed you, and gave himself for you on Calvary.

SELECTIONS.

WE are apt to believe in Providence so long as we have our own way: but if things go awry, then we think, if there is a God, He is in heaven, and not on earth. The cricket in the Spring builds his little house in the meadow, and chirps for joy because all is going so well with him. But when he hears the sound of the plough a few furrows off, and the thunder of the oxen's tread, then the skies begin to look dark, and his heart fails him. The plough comes crunching along, and turns his dwelling bottom side up, and as he goes rolling over and over without a home, he says—"Oh, the foundations of the world are destroyed, and everything is going to ruin!" But the husbandman who walks behind the plough, singing and whistling as he goes, does he think the foundations of the world are breaking up? Why, he does not so much as know that there was any house or cricket there. He thinks of the harvest which is to follow the track of the plough—and the cricket, too, if he will but wait, will find a thousand blades of grass where there was but one before. We are like the crickets. If anything happens to overthrow our plans, we think all is going to ruin.

HIGH in an ancient belfry there is a clock, and once a-week the old sexton winds it up; but it has neither dial-plate nor hands. The pendulum swings, and there it goes, ticking, ticking, day in and day out, unnoticed and useless. What the old clock is, in its dark chamber, keeping time to itself, but never shewing it, that is the mere sentimentality of religion, high above life, in the region of airy thought; perched up in the top of Sunday, but without dial or pointer to let the week know what o'Clock it is, of Time, or of Eternity!

THE other day, in walking down the street, a little beggar boy—or one who might have begged, so ragged was he—having discovered that I loved flowers, came and put into my hand a faded little sprig which he had somewhere found. I did not look directly at the scrawny, withered branch, but held it through the medium of the boy's heart, seeing what he would have given, not what he gave; and so looking, the shrivelled stem was laden with blossom of beauty and odour. And if I, who am cold, and selfish, and ignorant, receive so graciously the offering of a poor child, with what tender joy must our heavenly Father receive the sincere tributes of His creatures, when He looks through the medium of His infinite love and compassion!

A CHRISTIAN man's life is laid in the loom of time to a pattern which he does not see, but God does; and his heart is a shuttle. On one side of the loom is sorrow, and on the other is joy; and the shuttle, struck alternately by each, flies back and forth, carrying the thread, which is white or black, as the pattern needs; and in the end, when God shall lift up the finished garment, and all its changing hues shall glance out, it will then appear that the deep and dark colours were as needful to beauty as the bright and high colours.

CONSECRATION is not wrapping one's self in a holy web in the sanctuary, and then coming forth after prayer and twilight meditation, and saying, "There, I am consecrated." Consecration is going out into the world where God Almighty is, and using every power for His glory. It is taking all advantages as trust funds—as confidential debts owed to God. It is simply dedicating one's life, in its whole flow, to God's service.

MANY men want wealth—not a competence alone, but a five-storey competence. Everything subserves this; and religion they would like as a sort of lightning rod to their houses, to ward off, by and by, the bolts of Divine wrath.

IF a man is odious in society, he might as well be in prison. The worst prisons are not of stone; they are of throbbing hearts, outraged by an infamous life.

WHAT a pin is when the diamond has dropped from its setting, that the Bible when its emotive truths have been taken away. What a babe's clothes are when the babe has slipped out of them into death, and the mother's arms clasp only raiment, would be the Bible, if the Babe of Bethlehem and the truths of deep-heartedness that clothed His life, should slip out of DUST, by its own nature, can rise only so far above the road; and birds which fly higher never have it upon their wings. So the heart that knows how to fly high enough, escapes the little cares and vexations which brood upon the earth, but cannot rise above it into the purer air.

THE truths of the Bible are like gems in the soil. Whole generations walk over it, and know not what treasures are hidden beneath. So centuries of men pass over the Scriptures, and know not what riches lie under the feet of their interpretation. Sometimes, when they discover them, they call them new truths. One might as well call gold newly dug, new gold.

MANY men carry their consciences like a drawn sword, cutting this way and that, in the world, but sheathe them and keep it very soft and quiet, when it is turned within, thinking that the sword should not be allowed to cut its own scabbard.

As flowers never put on their best clothes for Sunday, but wear their sparest raiment and exhale their odour every day, so let the Christian life, free from stain, ever give forth the fragrance of the love of God.

A LIE always needs a truth for a handle to it, else the hand would cut it which sought to drive it home upon another. The worst lies, therefore, are those whose blade is false, but whose handle is true.

A MAN in the right, with God on his side, is in the majority, though he is alone, for God is multitudinous above all populations of the earth.

LET the day have a blessed baptism by giving your first waking thought into the bosom of God. The first hour of the morning is the rudder of the day.

BANFF.

We have not made any progress in number until within about three months ago, when an aged man acknowledged the Lord by being immersed in His name; a fortnight since we had two females, and to-day we had a man in the prime of life, all giving evidence of their minds being deeply impressed with the importance of believing what God says, and obeying what God commands, in order that they may enjoy what God promises; "for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." I hope that as a congregation we shall exhibit the power of godliness in our lives, and thus make our influence felt more in the district. We are now in correspondence with a godly and talented man with a view to engage him as an evangelist, to labor on the coast of this county, where there is a good field; and some of the brethren are doing excellent service by preparing the field for him, in holding meetings, and directing the attention of the people to the truth as taught by Jesus and his Apostles. May the Lord bless their labors.

I have little to communicate from here. The meetings on the Lord's day keep up as usual. At present our attention is chiefly concentrated upon the church. All is not done when stones are laid into the building; whatever care may be taken in selecting them, some fashioning will be afterward required, and if this be neglected the house will tumble about your ears. Shortly we hope to announce extra meetings, and are confident that by so doing and giving proper publicity, we can command an increase of hearers. Two have been added this month, and others seem upon the eve of doing so.

DUNDEE.

I may report, that since the commencement of the present year, four persons, one male and three females, have made the good confession, and been immersed by the authority of our Lord into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and added to the church. May they continue steadfast in the truth, and go on their way rejoicing.

The debate betwixt Mr. John Bowes and Bro. Milner is now arranged to take place here on the 29th of March, and will occupy three evenings at least. The following are the propositions to be discussed, viz. :—

1. That in New Testament Scriptures baptism is associated with faith, repentance, and the confession and invocation of the name of the Lord Jesus, as a term or condition of forgiveness, remission, justification, adoption, and salvation. — T. H. Milner to affirm, John Bowes to deny.

2. That chapter 4 of Mr. Milner's "Messiah's Ministry" is unscriptural in the matter of justification. — John Bowes to affirm, T. H. Milner to deny.

3. That the Scriptures do not teach that the Lord will come to convert the world and introduce the Millennium. — T. H. Milner to affirm, John Bowes to deny.

We will endeavor to forward some items of interest that may transpire in the course of this debate for the pages of the Harbinger. We anticipate a very large assembly to hear it.

We had Bro. Brown, from Kirkaldy, last First-day, who gave two excellent addresses on "The Philosophy of Faith" and "The Messiah's Commission." Good audiences; and we are to have Bro. Milner on Lord's day, the 13th, to lecture in the Thistle Hall on "The Second Advent" and "The Terms of Salvation." This hall will hold 800 persons.

I had a long and interesting letter lately from Bro. Andrew Bremner, (late of Cupar, Fife) now of Dunedin, Otago, New Zealand, in which he gives a most graphic account of the country and its genial climate, as forming a grand field for emigration to the overpopulated cities and overburdened sons of toil in this country — a land of promise to the industrious, and where the fruit of their labor may be enjoyed. He informs me that he is now restored to health, the like he never enjoyed here; and that a church was formed in Dunedin in September last year, on New Testament principles. The following is his own account of it:—"One of my neighbours is Mr. Dick, an extensive merchant in Dunedin, who came lately from the Island of St. Helena. We have met in his house several times on the First day of the week and broken bread, but have now taken the Odd Fellows' hall to meet every First day, and this day we openly publish, or shew forth the Lord's death. Mr. Dick is in reality a fine man and fluent speaker; his whole soul seems to be in religion; he cares not for the ridicule of the world. He used to speak three times a day often in St. Helena. I would say, if he had been a companion of our late Bro. George Reid, or Bro. Milner, for some time, he would shine as a star of the first magnitude; but he has been under disadvantages, being ten or twelve years on an island, and a great deal among the native population. I get the B. M. Harbinger regularly."

We are all sorry to learn of your late indisposition, and hope that in the kind providence of God you may soon be restored to health again, and long preserved to advocate the truth, as you have nobly done the last twenty years. You might think of visiting our locality. When the fine weather sets in Blairgowrie is nice locality for invalids. Do think of it, and arrange to come. Truly yours,

March 9, 1859.

CROSSGATES.

Since our report of January 9 we have had three other additions by baptism to the church meeting in Crossgates; a married man on February 27, and two females on the 13th of March. Thus, since the commencement of the present year, the heads of two households in the locality have been added to the saved. Such occurrences are indeed cheering to us, and doubtless will be to all who love the Lord and His cause. What a blessing every one personally receives who thus intelligently and faithfully acts—the remission of all past sins! And what a blessing for the young who are thus placed under the training of parents who have opportunities of frequently directing their minds in the right course!—Your's affectionately,

G. RAMSAY.

HULL.

I have nothing cheering to communicate respecting the small congregation here. We live in peace, and try to profit each other, but this is all; as the world without will not come to hear us, and we are not in a position to go them. — Your's fraternally,

WM. GODSON.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

We abridge the following items from interesting reports which appear in Brother Campbell's Harbinger for February:—

INDIANA.—Bro. R. Rice, Owen co. writes to the effect that, during the year, there have been 400 additions to the cause of our Master, and the prospects are bright.

ILLINOIS.—Bro. A. D. Fillmore, writing from Paris, states that at Franklin, after a meeting, 8 were added to the church, which now numbers 70, and it was constituted in April.—Bro. Harris reports 40 additions to the church at Mill Creek church, A. co. and at Mendon 34, 27 being by immersion. — Bro. Wm. Thompson, writing from Whitefield on the 28th of January, reports an interesting debate between Mr. Matthews, one of the Methodist Episcopal church, and Bro. Houston, which was held in the Presbyterian meeting-house, about eight miles from the city of H. The congregation, which has been organized within the year, now numbers KENTUCKY.—Bro. L. Marrett, near Rodsburg, sums up his year's labors on the 16th of January, as follows:—I spoke 16 times, travelled 3050 miles, had 144 conversions, and visited 550 families.

MISSOURI.—Bro. D. S. Burnett, writing from Platte city, under date of January 1, says:—"When I wrote you twelve months since, I had delivered one or two discourses here, on this, my second visit. Since then I have preached thirteen discourses, in a house which would contain, including a fair representation of all classes of the community, especially of the more intelligent. My closing discourse, last night, resulted in six confessions, making eight in eleven days. I closed the meeting in full strength, and with an undiminished audience, moved with an intensifying interest. Among the converts is the student of Male High School. His pupils, on their own suggestion, marched under the leadership of the teachers to the water to see him baptized. Thus Bro. Gaylord has put on his armour for the war. Bro. T. F. C. Bell assisted me to baptize yesterday. I baptized the remainder to-day. There was great joy in this town. This makes 7 additions to the church in two visits." — J. M. Wood, writing from Rockport, January 12, reports 100 additions, of which 75 were by confession and immersion.

OHIO.—Bro. M. Riddle reports the result of labors in Delaware and Union counties, which resulted in 24 additions.—At Le Mond, after the yearly meeting, which continued two Lord's days, 23 were added by the same evangelists.—In Champ county the writer organized a church on April with 11, and left it 24 members. He visited the church in September and November, leaving it 38 in number.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Bro. N. J. Mitchell, writing from Howard, Centre county, Jan. 7, reports 12 additions to the church there after two meetings held in their edifice, the brethren previously assembled in private houses, and having only a public hearing from the public.

TEXAS.—Bro. Thomas, of Austin, writes that 12 were added to the church at Go-

THE WORD "THOUGHT."

MATT. vi. 25: "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink."—This "take no thought" is certainly an inadequate translation in our present English of the Greek original. The words seem to exclude and condemn that just forward-looking care that belongs to man, and differences him from the beasts which live only in the present. The most English critics have lamented the inadvertence of our authorized version, which, in bidding us "take no thought" for the necessities of life, prescribes to us what is impracticable in itself, and would be a breach of Christian duty, even were it possible. But there is no "inadvertence" here. When our translation was made, "take no thought" was a perfectly correct rendering of the original. "Thought" was then constantly used as an equivalent to anxiety or solicitous care; as let witness this passage from Bacon: "Harris, an Alderman in London, was put to trouble, and died with thought and anxiety before his business came to an end." Or still better, this from one of the "Somers' Tracts"—(its date is that of the reign of Queen Elizabeth) "In five hundred years, only two Queens have died in childbirth; Queen Catherine Parr died rather of thought." A better example than either of these, is that occurring in Shakspeare's "Julius Cæsar," ("take thought and die for Cæsar," where "to take thought" is to take a matter so seriously to heart that death ensues.

EXCELLENCY OF KNOWLEDGE.

Let men everywhere assert the dignity of human nature. There is such a thing as sound philosophy and just philosophers. Let them, by becoming profound thinkers, aim to find the one, and to sustain the character of the other. It is their privilege by the lawful use of thought, to strive at penetrating to a deep understanding of the mighty works and developments of God, their Creator. The proper end of all thought is to enable intellectual beings to distinguish the things that differ. Ever keep in mind that God saw the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things not yet done. The universe is full of distinctions—distinctions resulting from the operations of the laws of God, and differences occasioned by their opposed and counteracted operation. The human judgment has normal and abnormal distinctions to grapple with and determine upon. In the varied and complicated phenomena of social development, we have a vast display of that which is in harmony with divine laws, and also of that which is contrary to them. We have the progress of lawful action, the result of which can only be good; and that of unlawful, the result of which can only be evil. Two forces are constantly operating among mankind. These are the force that produces good, and the force that produces evil. They are distinguished by their application and direction, more than by any other circumstance. The same power that does evil, if differently developed and directed, would do good. True wisdom consists largely in the development and direction of the elements of power. It also has much to do with time and place—measure and manner. I conceive that forces may operate at one time under a given combination of circumstances, and the result, to human view, prove alone or partially disastrous. Again, the same kind of operation may, in the judgment of the virtuous, conduce to the promotion of virtue. A good act, at an improper time and place, or in excess or deficiency, may prove a bad act. Here then let it be fixed in the mind, that the measure of wisdom within the scope of man's understanding, consists chiefly in ability to make distinctions, and to act accordingly. Let those in search of wisdom ponder the above suggestions—let them awake from sleep, and call up the powers of their understanding to a state of vigorous action. Great is the dignity of God-given intelligence. Great are the responsibilities of man. The true glory of man consists more in a just judgment, and a clear and discriminating conscience, than in a clear and eloquent tongue.—C. S. W.

CHILDREN.

A WORD TO MOTHERS. — Never forget that your child is not your own. It has been "bought with a price," and the object of its existence is therefore to glorify God in its body and spirit, which are God's. Remember that it is your part to prepare it from its earliest years, to fulfil this high destination. To you it is committed to awaken and develope in its mind feelings of respect, gratitude, and reliance towards its parents and towards God. You must be the first object of these sentiments. To respect, to love, to obey its parents, will be its earliest duty. But in order effectually to awaken these feelings, and become really the object of them, remember you must form and cultivate in yourself those qualities on which they rest as their end. It is the goodness of God which is the object of our love; his wisdom and justice, of our reverence; his mercy and long-suffering, of our gratitude. Let your conduct towards your children evince that the attainment of these divine attributes is the constant aim of your earnest and humble endeavors, and the corresponding affections will be awakened in their hearts towards you, and will produce the fruits of obedience and reliance. These affections it will be your duty to transfer from yourselves to their Heavenly Father, so soon as your children are old enough to know God and to think of him. Deserve the hearts of your children, and they will be given to you; and when their hearts are once really given to you, you will be able to labor with far greater success, in your efforts to turn them to God.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC.

A REPORT was presented to Parliament on March 15, 1859, containing a return of the number of passengers conveyed on all the railways in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, during the half-year ending the 30th June, 1858—the receipts from each class of passengers, and from goods—the aggregate number of miles travelled by each class of passengers—the number of passenger trains and of goods trains respectively—the number of miles travelled by such trains—and the length of railway open at the commencement and at the termination of the half-year; together with a summary, comparing the traffic with that during the corresponding period of 1857. The length of line open in England and Wales on the 30th June, 1858, was 6895 miles, fifty-two million passengers had travelled over the lines in the half-year preceding that date, twenty millions being travellers by parliamentary trains; ten million tons of general merchandise; eighteen million tons of coal and other minerals; 873,000 head of cattle, and three million sheep and pigs had been carried by the railways during the same time. The total number of miles travelled by train was thirty-five millions. The total receipts from all sources of traffic was £9,406,000, three millions having been derived from passengers' fares, about the same sum from general merchandise, and one and a half millions from coal and other minerals. The total number of passengers in Scotland was about six and a half millions, paying £386,000 for themselves, and £25,000 for horses, dogs, carriages, &c. The number of miles travelled over by trains in Scotland was four millions, and the total receipts from all sources of traffic £1,178,000. In Ireland the total number of passengers was three and a half millions, paying for themselves, their horses and luggage, £308,000. The total number of miles travelled over was two millions and the total receipts, £546,000. The total number of miles travelled over in the United Kingdom was forty-two millions and the total receipts eleven millions.

AWAKE, ARISE, THY LIGHT IS COME.

AWAKE, arise, thy light is come;

The nations, that before outshone thee
Now at thy feet lie dark and dumb—

The glory of the Lord is on thee!

Arise—the Gentiles to thy ray,

From each nook of earth shall cluster
And kings and princes haste to pay

Their homage to thy rising lustre.

Lift up thine eyes around, and see,
O'er foreign fields, o'er farthest waters

Thy exiled sons return to thee—

To thee return thy homesick daughters

And camel's rich, from Midian's tents,
Shall lay their treasures down before thee

And Saba bring her gold and scents,
To fill thy air and sparkle o'er thee.

See, who are these, that, like a cloud,
Are gathered from earth's dominions,

Like doves, long absent, when allowed Homeward to shoot their trembling pinions.

Surely the isles will wait for me,
The ships of Tarshish round shall hover

To bring thy sons across the sea,
And waft their gold and silver over.

And Lebanon thy pomp shall grace—
The fir, the pine, the palm victorious,

Shall beautify our Holy Place,
And make the ground I tread on glorious

No more shall discord haunt thy ways,
Nor ruin waste thy cheerless nation;

But thou shalt call thy portals, praise,
And thou shalt name thy walls, Salvation

The Sun no more shall make thee bright
Nor Moon shall lend her lustre to thee

But God, himself, shall be thy light,
And flash eternal glory through thee.

The Sun shall never more go down;
A ray, from heaven itself descended,

Shall light thy everlasting crown—
Thy days of mourning are all ended.

My own, elect, and righteous land!
The branch, for ever green and vernal

Which I have planted with this hand—
Live thou shalt in life eternal.

THE PROMISES OF GOD.—No. II.

"According as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue : Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises ; that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust" (2 Peter i. 3-4.)

"He is faithful that promised" (Heb. x. 23.)

THERE are themes which the mind may comprehend, and upon which the tongue may find ample utterance ; then there are others where the utmost exertion of mind affords but a feeble apprehension — sees, as it were, "the toy of lofty thoughts," and the tongue but stammers to give utterance to the struggling emotions of the spirit within. The scheme of human redemption is the connecting link between heaven and earth—and by its relationship to the former, it becomes too profound for earth-chained spirits to hold in full survey.

Prophets, who drank deeply of the Spirit of Inspiration, pondered upon it, and "inquired diligently," as they hoped for good things to come : angels in rapturous contemplation "desired to look into" it ; and after the Word had been made flesh—His glory had been seen—life and immortality had been brought to light, and the Spirit in clearer enlightenings had descended, one of the most favoured of God's chosen ambassadors, speaking of the ways and wisdom of God, in the wonderful plan of redemption, exclaims—"O, the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God ! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out !" (Rom. xi. 23.)

There is an infinity and a divinity in the "volume of the Book," that, to the mind that comes in contact with its sentiment and spirit, proclaim its Divine original. How simple in its manner, yet how profound, how soul-expanding, soul-elevating, and soul-purifying in its matter ! It opens a source of thought without end, and rapturous wonderment. Who, that does not love to read and meditate upon the riches of His Truth, and the amplitude of His promises—that cannot say with the Psalmist—"How precious are thy thoughts to me, O, God ! how great is the sum of them ! If I should count them, they are more in number than the sand" (Psalms cxxxix. 17-18)—can live and walk in the Lord, and possess a well grounded hope in his mercy !

The glory of redemption, and its attractive charm for man—its hope, its joy, its power, is found in promise. Here the burdened soul finds rest, and the emollient of salvation, all soothing, is applied to the heart, torn and bleeding. Let us, then, turn for a time, Christian, to the "Book of wonders—Book of promises," and read. But, first, think of your helplessness—your need of One to supply wants to which others are inadequate—One whose eye beholds you well—One that can hear while others are afar off—One to whom you can tell sorrows hidden from all others—a confidant, above all confidants, with might and faithfulness to bestow all that He has spoken—and then read : "The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers" (1 Peter iii. 12.)

Remember, you shall not be spurned from His presence because you have erred from His good Word, and marred your own peace ; for, " If we sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous ;" and " If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

Weakness or infirmity is not cause to separate from a favourable hearing—for our faithful High Priest is not one " who cannot be touched with a feeling of our infirmities—but was in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin"—and we are admonished from this, to " come boldly (not doubting) to a throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." Know, too, that God bestows upon his children according to their need : He giveth " more grace" to the more needy. " Like as a father pitieth his children—so the Lord pitieth them who fear him—for he knoweth our frame, that we are but dust."

He looks into the vale of poverty with kindest regards, and ordains that the poor shall have the glad tidings preached to them, and pronounces this soothing language—" Happy are ye poor who repine not ; for yours is the kingdom of heaven : " Yea, " He remembereth the poor," and out of them constitutes all that are " rich in faith, heirs of the kingdom which he has before appointed to them that love him" (Jas. ii. 4.) " He exalteth them of low degree."

Temptation, in this trial state, He has pledged, shall never be strong enough to wrest the truthful child of God from the right hand of his might ; for, " No temptation shall overtake you, but what is common to man, and with the temptation he will make a way for your escape ;" and " who," asks an Apostle, " shall harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good ?"

If you see many and marked defects in your own walk and standing before heaven, and you long, and strive, and pray for a greater measure of love and devotion, and a closer walk with God, be encouraged by this promise—" For are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness ; for they shall be filled," that is, in His own time. And may be, as an Apostle has said, " If ye have suffered awhile, He will strengthen, settle you."

If gloom, as a pavilion of darkness shall shroud the soul, and every ray of a loving Father appear withdrawn, know that he who " bore our griefs, carried our sorrows" upon the tree of Calvary, knew a bitter, cheerless sorrow more terrible than the stripes and turing nails, when he cried with a voice that shook the earth, and thrilled the remotest heavens—" My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me ! " And teaches dependence, and puts forth its utmost exercise ; but

" The storm is laid, the winds retired, Obedient to His will ;"

and a calm of most refined blessing shall ensue,

" Which nothing earthly gives, nor destroy—
The soul's bright sunshine, and the felt joy."

How rich is the Christian, with what pledges on the part of heaven ! He can turn every event of a faithful life to his advantage. Tribulation will, and must come ; but they are to work patience, and this, that may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing." A severe discipline it may be through which you attain to greater measures of holiness ; but the promise to be obtained will entitle you to be counted " light afflictions, which are but for a moment," and " not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed." And how cheerful and resignedly shall all be borne, if you know that He that chastens, does it for your " profit, that ye might be partakers of his holiness ;" and that ye are properly " exercised" by it, shall yield a revenue of " the peace and fruits of righteousness."

The Lord is with you, humble Christian, just as much in the hour of trial, as when you know the joy of deliverance. "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee;" "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee; for I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel." I will never leave thee! Dwell on this sentence, Christian, and glorify him that spake it! Strive to enter into the fulness of the thought. It is fraught with a consolation deeper "than our helpless miseries are." An angel can never get beyond this sentence; for it embraces all: God is all we need in time or in eternity. O, that faith would ever view Him as he is — near, ever near; so ordering events, that "all things shall work together for good to them that love God, the called according to his purpose!" If he does not give a full release just now, he does what is better—he disciplines us for more enlarged enjoyments. This earth is the Christian's battle-field—it was consecrated as such by the Saviour—he met no foes in heaven—he found them on earth; and here he fought, he suffered, he conquered. Rejoice, then, that you are counted worthy to suffer with him. It was here—on this poor earth—that he won immortal honors, that shall call for the adoration of angels and saints, while there is a harp in heaven, or a tongue to sing.

It is this thought alone which will enable you to "glory in tribulations," knowing that "His judgments are true and righteous altogether," and that a complete deliverance will speedily be realised. "The righteous cry, the Lord heareth, and delivereth him out of all HIS TROUBLES." Deliverance, full, complete; and how soon to be realised!

Truly, the Lord is liberal in giving! "He satisfieth thy mouth with good things." There is no desire too enlarged for him to satisfy: "Delight thyself also in the Lord, and he shall give thee the desire of thy heart: commit thy way unto the Lord—trust also in him—and he will bring it to pass"—not in your way; but in a way better adapted to serve a wise purpose than you can devise. He that suffers not a sparrow to fall without his knowledge, counts you of more value than many sparrows: he that hears the young ravens when they cry, will not suffer you to want: he that clothes the lilies, will not fail to ornament your spirit with divinest graces: "O, fear the Lord, ye his saints; for there is no want to them that fear him." It simply means, that you have every thing which the Lord knows to be best adapted to his glory and your good. To you, "the Lord God is a Sun and shield; he will give you grace and glory: and no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly." O, the fulness of redemption!

"Here mercy and pardon, here love and free grace;

Here strong consolation, here great joy and peace;

Here hope for the hopeless—the weary find rest;

Here all things are plenty for sinners distressed;

Here wine, milk, and honey are plenty in store,

Sufficient for thousands, yea, millions, and more;

Here balm for the wounded, here strength for the weak;

Here cordials divine are prepared for the sick.

Here armour and weapons for soldiers to wield;

A breast-plate, a helmet, a sword, and a shield;

The poor receive riches, a crown for the head,

Eternal salvation, and life from the dead."

Such is an imperfect grouping of some of the promises of our Lord. They will be fulfilled—the Christian shall enjoy them—"He is faithful that promised." Who can compute their magnitude? We may apprehend them, and know that their power is to make us "partakers of the Divine nature;" but He who promises alone knows their fullest import. After we have exhausted the richest stores of thought—faith in clearest vision has arisen to pierce the veil of mortality, and beams of light divine shine upon the pathway of the valley of death, cheering with the thought—"Thou shalt fear no evil there — and lofty conceptions of the glory, the life, the joy, the love, and the fellowship of "the land beyond the river," fill the soul with bliss ecstatic there comes a voice from his holy truth soft and soothing as the music of the upper spheres—"God is able to do for you abundantly, above all that you are able to ask or think!" "Lord, I believe: help thou mine unbelief."

REVISION OF THE BIBLE.

"THE Bible is God's own foundation for the greatest empire in the universe. It is the constitution of the empire of redeemed humanity." It is needless for me to pronounce a formal encomium on the authorised version of the Bible, lest it should be said, who denied its beauties? It far surpasses every other English version of the entire Bible, in the characteristic qualities of simplicity, energy, purity of style, as also in its general fidelity to the original writings. One painful conviction, however, forces itself upon the mind, and that is—that the plain Word of God has been most fantastically, ignorantly, and wilfully perverted, as well in the translation as in its interpretation. Many gross perversions, not to say mistranslations, of the sacred text have been occasioned by dogmatical prejudices and sectarian zeal. Hence, as the Rev. Samuel L. Davidson, LL.D. has said, "A revision of the Bible is wanted, or rather, a new translation from the Hebrew and Greek, based upon our version." Dr. Davidson says again, "I believe more can be done to make the Sacred Writings respected and understood, by a revised translation of them, than in any other single mode." These two advantages, specified by Dr. Davidson, are of themselves sufficient to justify us in all that the American Bible Union has done. I propose in these remarks to enumerate some of the advantages which will crue from a revision of the Bible, and shall place these two first on the list. The first advantage, then, which will arise from a revision of the Bible is, it will beget respect from thousands who now disrespect the Bible — who ne read it—who do not believe it. A second advantage arising from a revision will be, It will cause it to be understood by thousands, at least many passages of it, which are unintelligible to a large number of readers. It will be obeyed as a Divine command, which says: "Ye shall write (engrave) all the words of this law upon the tables of stone, and plainly." Why very plainly? That the men, women, and children several years old, might understand them and obey them. That would be a great point gained. That would be carrying out a principle, which would overthrow half of the Catholicism and Protestantism, or sectarianism, in the world. One of the main pillars in these temples of the unintelligibility, the darkness and obscurity of the Scriptures. Hence the necessity for an infallible interpreter, the priest and pope. The English and modern versions of the Bible are made from the Latin version, and not from the inspired writings. Mosheim says of the Latin version, "It abounds with innumerable gross errors, and in many places exhibits a striking barbarity."

style, and the most impenetrable obscurity with respect to the meaning of the sacred writings." The impenetrable darkness of the Latin Bible, has found its way into the ancient and modern versions. Augustine said, The Vulgate Bible has many errors in it. Pope Sixtus the Fifth said, I have corrected many thousands of errors in it. Pope Clement the Seventh, recalled all the copies of Sixtus the Fifth, stating that he had found 2000 errors in it, which he had corrected. The Douay Bible, the Bible read by the Papists, contains all the errors of Sixtus the Fifth and Clement the Seventh. Father Gavazzi said, I prove the Romish Bible to be horribly corrupt. A book was published a few years ago in Rome, and revised by the Inquisition, in which the Barnabite Friar said he found 750 capital errors in the Douay Bible, and 2000 lesser ones.

The great object of all God's servants, in all ages, has been to spread the knowledge of God, by making the Scriptures very plain. Such men, for instance, as the venerable Bede, Wickliffe, Huss, Jerome of Prague, Tyndale, Olmentan, Waldus, Frith, Barnes, Rogers, Luther, Wesley, Cone, and Campbell. This key unlocks the whole matter. The friends of God wish to make the Scriptures plain—the enemies of God wish to keep them dark. What produced the persecution and the death of these men? Making the Scriptures plain to their countrymen. What was it that so exceedingly provoked the clergy in their respective days? They interpreted the sacred words of the old versions, the ecclesiastical words of King James' version; they made them too plain. What is it that has stirred up the lion in the clergy of our time? We are about to make the Scriptures too plain. We hope and intend that the ignorant readers of the Bible, farmers, mechanics, tradesmen, blacksmiths, women, and boys, shall understand the Scriptures better than some doctors and clergymen do. The American Bible Union, like Wickliffe and Tyndale, will take from them their juggling terms—will interpret them—will give the people the English of them. It is this that has so enraged them. The Bible, plainly translated, speaks a very different language from sectarianism, the church, and the clergy. A plain Bible will teach the people the errors of the sects. A plainly translated Bible will take many powerful weapons out of the hands of Infidels and sectarians. The present version, in many places, is erroneous, obscure, and false. As Dr Clarke says, A plain Bible will narrow down the disputed points between the sects, and bring them nearer together. A plain Bible will open the eyes of mankind to the sins and enormities of sectarianism. A Bible, "respected and understood," will dethrone many a priest; will baffle and confound many an Infidel. A plainly translated Bible will be followed by a revival of piety—of scriptural piety—faith, repentance, zeal, devotion, obedience to all the ordinances of God. A plainly revised Bible will greatly aid our missionaries, in all lands, in translating the Scriptures into the different languages. A plainly revised Bible will greatly help our young preachers—it will serve as a commentary to them on the present version, and to our illiterate preachers it will be a light shining in a dark place. Three fourths of the readers of the Bible are ignorant of the languages and sciences—they need a plain Bible, that they may know exactly what God said; that they may believe it, and do it. Our Sunday Schools need a plain Bible, for the millions of children born and unborn. A plainly revised Bible will save millions in commentaries, sermon-books, and meeting-houses. We need a revised Bible for the union of Christians, the conversion of the world, and for the perfection of Christians. Brethren, come up to the help of the Lord in this great work.

CHRIST'S CHURCH IDENTIFIED.—No. IV.

IN the preceding number, I demonstrated that the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus, connected with his Divine Sonship, is the grand centre of the Christian system; and that all the truths of Christianity are inseparably linked to this centre, and depend upon it, so that the whole magnificent system of our holy religion, stands or falls with these central facts: and that these, therefore, are fundamental; and consequently, constitute the foundation of Christ's church. What remains, under this head, to be done, is to show that whatever is fundamental to an organization, gives character or colouring, and often a name to the organization to which it is fundamental—in one sentence, constitutes the life—the very soul of such organization!

Take, for an example, the Bible Society. Its fundamental principle is, to give the Holy Scriptures to every nation, tribe, and family of our race, in their own vernacular. This gives the Bible Society its whole essential colouring and characteristics; and therefore, contra distinguishes it from all other societies.

Take, for another example, the Temperance Society. Its fundamental principle is, total abstinence from all that can intoxicate. This principle is the soul of the Temperance organization, and gives it its name, its vitality, and all its moral characteristics.

Take the Masonic and Odd Fellow organizations. These are help for help, or mutual assistance organizations. Remove from these institutions the principle of mutual assistance, or what they denominate benevolence, and they would necessarily dissolve into their original elements.

Take, for another example, our great governmental organization. Its fundamental principle is, “That all men are born free and equal; and have natural, inalienable, and indefeasible to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.” Hence, our general government, and our state governments, are essentially republican; and can be otherwise so long as this principle shall remain paramount in the minds of the governors and the governed of this mighty republic.

Thus it is with our ecclesiastical organizations. Take the Universalist for an example. “All will be saved” is the fundamental principle on which this organization is founded. It is the magnet around which the Universalist body is formed, and by the attraction of which all parts are made to cohere. And so far does it give colouring and vitality to this organization, that it is named after its fundamental principle—Universalist!

Take, for another example, the twelve or fourteen Baptist sects. Immutability is the chief attraction of all these sects, but each has added to this some other principle as fundamental—some peculiarity of doctrine, or of practice, contra distinguishing it from all the other Baptist parties—as Fullerism, or Calvinism, or Free-willism, or Seventh-dayism, &c.—Hence, all the Baptist parties have named themselves after their ordinance.—This is the magnet which holds these parties together, as individuals; whilst, as parties, they are held apart, by a diversity of peculiarities, some of which are made fundamental by each of these parties, and are held in bitter abhorrence by the others. If it were necessary we might proceed to show the foundations, or fundamentals, or magnetic centres of all the sects in Christendom. Episcopalianism congregates around Episcopacy—the human conception of an order of clergy, grown bishops, unknown in the da-the Apostles. The Presbyterians make presbytery their party fundamental—giving colouring, and even a name to their sect. The Congregationalists form around a nucleus of notions respecting Congregationalism. The Episcopal Methodists, and the Protestant Methodists, though generally harmonizing in doctrine, yet, in regard to church government, and the power of the bishops, are perfectly antagonistic; and the points of antagonism constitute new centres of attraction! Indeed, it must be apparent to all persons capable of correct reasoning, that there cannot be a so-called Christian sect without a centripetal influence, diverse from that of the apostolic church, composed wholly of humanisms, made paramount by the sect.

Herein—I trust, the reader perceives—is a radical difference—a difference wide as the poles apart—between the church of Christ, and all sectarian churches. The church of Christ has for its only foundation Christ, and him crucified—risen—ascended—glorified—crowned—priested—the Alpha and Omega—the first and the last—the Christian's all in all—the paramount centre of Christian fellowship; whilst sectarian churches have, take them all in all, whims— notions— opinions—speculations—and some more and others less of the subordinate truths of Christianity as fundamental principles; but not one of them builds, exclusively, upon the good confession—"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Indeed, our having done so constitutes one of the chief objections which the sects have urged against us.

Whilst engaged on this topic, the reader, having this, and the preceding number before him, may learn the difference between a sectarian spirit, and a spirit not sectarian. Any amount of love to, or zeal for, any thing which is not the truth as it is in Jesus, or for a church organization of which Christ is not the author, is sectarianism. Whilst any amount of love to, or zeal for, the truth as it is in Jesus, and for that organization of which Jesus is the author, is not sectarianism. It cannot possibly be sectarianism! Can we exercise towards God too much love? Can we love Jesus, our Saviour, with too great an intensity of affection? Can we too devotedly, or devotionally place ourselves under the guidance, or leadership of the Holy Spirit? Is there danger of our placing too high an estimate on the blood-sealed truths of the Gospel? Can we with too great exactitude copy in our church building the model church erected by the apostolic builders, under the miraculous dictates of the spirit of truth, and the immediate supervision of Jesus the Master Builder? Are we not expressly commanded to "take heed how we build?" If the warmest devotion to original Christianity is sectarianism, then is Christianity itself sectarianism! The Holy Spirit is a sectarian Spirit! The Bible is a sectarian book. Christ is a sectarian Saviour, being at the head of a sectarian church, and the author of sectarianism! This would be blasphemy! To convict any person, therefore, of sectarianism, he must be convicted of religious error. It is the glory of a Christian to receive the whole truth of Christianity in the love of it, with his whole soul, mind, and might. The conclusion of the whole matter is, therefore, that the greatest possible amount of zeal for that which is genuine Christianity, is not sectarianism, whilst the smallest amount of zeal for humanisms in religion, is sectarianism;—a spirit antagonistic to the unity of the body of Christ—an influence that attracts not to, but from the centre;—and is, consequently, in all its workings, schismatical and heretical; and from which emanates, the enormous mischiefs wrought by party spirit throughout our torn, and bleeding, and disjointed, and distracted, and wrangling Christendom!

By another illustration of the subject we shall reach similar results :—the schismatical character of all sectarian organizations. The name of all party gospels terminates with ism ;—thus, Calvinism—Arminianism—Presbyterianism—Methodism—Baptistism—Quakerism—Mormonism—Romanism—Universalism, &c. These names all indicate certain party peculiarities which constitute the fundamentals of these sects ; but, not one of them is the gospel of Christ ;—just as the foundations of sectarian edifices are not, any one, or all of them, the foundation on which Christ built his church. We shall demonstrate this position as follows :—“ He that believeth not the gospel shall be damned.” May we say that he that believeth not Calvinism, or Arminianism, or Presbyterianism, or Methodism, or any of the other isms, shall be damned ? Not one in ten thousand, would, I presume, hazard such an assertion. The Presbyterians would say there are many good Christians among the Methodists, who believe not Presbyterianism, and the Methodists would say the same of the Presbyterians ; and so of probably all the other sects.—These isms, therefore, are most incontrovertibly not the gospel of Christ ; and if not, it follows with equal certainty, that those fundamental peculiarities of which these isms, or party gospels, are descriptive, are not the foundation of Christ’s church ; and if so, that the structures erected upon these foundations are not churches of Christ. No conclusion, to my mind, could possibly be more obvious.

The same points may be reached by representing schismatical preachers under the similitude of sowers. When Christ and the Apostles sowed the word, the result was a crop of unmixed Christianity. But, in after times, other sowers mixed the seeds of error with the Word of God—some one variety of errors, and others other varieties—and thus have all the motley multitude of sectarianisms been produced. One of preachers, for instance, have preached the Word of God, in part mixed with one variety of humanisms, and the result has been Methodism ! Another class has preached the word, in part mixed with another class of errors, and the result has been a crop of Presbyterianism ;—and precisely the same may be said of all other sources, from the time of Joe Smith ;—the crop, in every instance, giving a demonstration of what had been sown—the whole amounting to a crop of weeds, or tares or cockle that had been mixed with the pure grain, the Word of the living God—bringing to pass what is written, “ Whatsoever man soweth, that also shall he reap.”

Out of the same perverted and distorted disorder of things has grown a strangely anomalous notion of “ branches of churches.” Each of “ the evangelical sects” is styled “ a branch of the church of Christ !” No such arrangement, or derangement, can be shown to have existed in the apostolic age. Individuals are styled “ branches of the true vine,” which is Christ ; but the idea of church branches is an invention of sectarianism, to cover the deformity of its own nakedness. Besides, if the sect-churches are branches of the church of Christ, where is the church of Christ of which they are branches ? A tree all branches ! where is the stem ? And the branches, too, all unlike each other ! But perhaps they mean to assimilate their branch churches to the branches of a river ! Well, be it so. In this case, the church of Christ must be represented by the river, and the evangelical sects by branches flowing into this river. What renders this view the more probable, is the fact that this process has been, for years, going on. Thousands, and tens of thousands, have come into that organization which we believe to be the church of Christ, from the sects. In this movement, we believe, will increase more and more. A.

PRECEPT is example written in the sand—the tide flows over it and the record is gone. Example is engraven on the rock, and the lesson is not soon lost.

RESIDE where you will, acquire knowledge and virtue, and they will stand in the place of ancestors : that may be the best who can say, “ See what I am ;” and he who says, “ See what my father was.”

THE BISHOP'S OFFICE.

1 Tim. iii.

THE word bishop, translated from the Greek word episcopos, has generally been rendered or translated overseer or superintendent; — which translation agrees with the designation applied by the Apostle Paul to the elders of Ephesus, when he addressed them at Miletus, saying, "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." In like manner we find Peter, in his letter, saying to elders, "Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre's sake, but of a ready mind." Such then is the main feature of the office.

The Apostle commences this part of his letter with a peculiar and emphatic observation, intended to be deeply impressed upon the mind of his faithful fellow-laborer, for his guidance in the important position in which Paul had placed him. By observing that "this is a true saying, if a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work," the Apostle doubtless intended to teach beyond all disputation or contradiction, the importance of the office.

At first sight it may appear to us that, in the days of the Apostles, bishops were chosen at a very early period after the planting of a church; and, in some instances, such may have been the case. And when we consider that many of the converts to Christianity in the days of the Apostles were devout Jews, well instructed in the Scriptures, we can easily conceive that they were soon fitted for the office of a bishop, supposing them already to possess the other qualifications. But, by a further glance at the Acts of Apostles and at Paul's letter to Titus, we shall find that the appointment of bishops was not a hasty matter with the Apostles. In the Acts we find that Paul and his companions travelled throughout Perga in Pamphilia, Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycania, and unto the region that lieth round about; and preached the Gospel in these parts, remaining for a long time in one or more of these places, and then returned and ordained elders or bishops, commending them to the Lord on whom they believed. In Paul's Letter to Titus he says, "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee." Here we see that the residence of Titus amongst the Cretans was necessary to effect the appointment of suitable bishops.

Let us now turn to the desire which the Apostle mentions in his letter to Timothy. The desire may be a lawful and a commendable one, or it may not; and in most cases this matter can alone be determined by the all-seeing and heart-searching God, with whom we have to do. Let us, however, for our own guidance and instruction, briefly pass in review a lawful and an unlawful desire for the office under consideration.

If a man has been enabled, by a careful and prayerful exercise of self-restraint, to bring all his unruly members into subjection to the law of Christ — has been enabled to cultivate a meek and lowly spirit, like his Master, Christ — has had time and opportunity for acquiring a general knowledge of the Scriptures, and has improved it to his own and to the advantage of others — has been enabled to administer advice, instruction, and consolation to his brethren when needed; and in addition to these things, feels assured by the confidence reposed in him by his brethren, that he has done nothing very reprehensible, or left undone nothing that manifests very great neglect. Or, in a few words, one who can confidently appeal to his brethren as to his consistent behaviour on all occasions in the church and in the world. Such a one, feeling the weight of his moral influence, and trusting in the strength of the Lord to be able to maintain and extend it, might safely trust himself in the balance, knowing that he would not be found wanting. Such a one, having a single eye to the glory of God and the welfare of His church, might desire, and that earnestly, to serve his brethren in superintending, with others like-minded and like-qualified, the affairs of a Christian congregation. And lamentable indeed would be the condition of that church which, wanting such officers, and possessing such candidates, refused or neglected to place them in office.

Let us in the next place briefly consider an unlawful desire for this office. The love of place and of power is not confined to worldly or carnal men. The professing churches of Christ present a sad example of this truth, which was partially developed, but instantly repressed, in some of the apostles of our Lord, when there arose a contention amongst them which should be the greatest. Pride and self-conceit have ever exercised a baneful influence upon the church and in the world; and the worst feature of these evils is, that those who are under such influences are blind to the faults and failings which otherwise would be more or less apparent. If a man therefore desire this office who is not pre-eminent for humility, the consequences may easily be foreseen. If a man desire this office solely for the honor it will confer upon him, he is sure to be disappointed. If he desire it solely for the power it will enable him to exercise over his brethren, they may expect to be ruled with a rod of iron. If he desire the office for any or all of these objects, he will assuredly lord it over God's heritage; and if this be his desire, he will not hesitate to resort to mean and contemptible measures in order to gratify his ambition.

Happily for us, however, the lawfulness or the unlawfulness of the desire is to be tested by certain qualifications enumerated by the Apostle in the chapter under consideration and in other places. Before proceeding to notice any of the qualifications, let us briefly consider the good work which is to be performed by the bishop. It is the care and oversight of those precious immortal souls for whom Christ died. Youth, manhood, and old age are the periods at which they are to be taken charge of. These will be found to be of different dispositions, of different habits and occupations, and in various stages of development and Christian attainment. Some will be gentle and retiring—others will be forward and confident; some will be ignorant and obstinate—others will be fickle and yielding; some will be weak—some will be strong—some will be afflicted—others will be infirm; some will need encouragement and some require reproof. Some have to be fed with milk, and some will require strong meat. In fact, a judicious management of mind and states and under all circumstances that with one single object in view—the good work which a bishop of Christ is to undertake. The one great object always to be kept in view is, to feed and increase love to God and love to one another, and in so doing to promote peace and prevent strife—to heal wounds and prevent a sore—to heal and give offence to none—to seek the wandering and reclaim the lost. It would be well to bear in mind, that the bishop is not left without a helpful guide in this important undertaking.

Paul, in writing to Timothy where, says—“All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.” It is worthy of remark, that although these Scriptures are open to all, they require to be enforced upon many; they can only be effectually enforced upon those who practice and obey them.

The qualifications for this office are fully given by the Apostle in his letters to Timothy and Titus, and in his address to the Ephesian elders. In this chapter under consideration he commences by stating, that a bishop must be blameless, or unblamed, which would appear to be the character he is to possess in the church. It is next stated that he must be the husband of one wife—or, as it is understood by some, must not have a plurality. He is to be sober and sober; or, in other words, watchful and prudent. Ever on the alert to detect errors in doctrine or practice, and prudent in the management of them; for it is easier to extinguish a spark than to put out a flame. He must be of good behaviour—or, it reads in the margin, modest—so that his unassuming manner may keep him out of sight, and make more apparent the excellence of his instruction or decision. He must be given to hospitality—or kind and friendly to strangers—that they may perceive the universal benevolence of Christianity. He must be apt to teach, so that he may instruct in the simplest manner, and teach others who speak to do the same. He must not be given to wine, because "wine is a mocker," and deceives the wisest and best of men, leading them to neglect their duty to their families and to their brethren. He must be no striker — or, as it may be understood, not a reviler or a quarrelsome person — because the peace of the church will mainly depend upon the forbearance of its rulers. He must not be greedy of filthy lucre, because the love of money is the root of all evil; and in addition to the time necessarily devoted to getting it inordinately, it exposes its possessor to many foolish and hurtful lusts. He must be patient, or gentle, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves, and neither a brawler nor a contentious person. He must be able to rule well his own house, because if he fails there he is not likely to succeed in the church. The secret of good rule in a family is the exercise of affection, impartiality, and firmness on the part of a parent, and reciprocal affection, appreciation, and submission on the part of children. It must be the same in the church of Christ. Let a child once discover that a parent ceases to love it as he once did, or is partial and changeable, and it will cease to love and obey as before. Such a case, whether arising from neglect or want of judgment, will be a most difficult one, and will, if not remedied, be attended with evil consequences. He must not be a novice, or a new convert, because such are seldom free from a degree of enthusiasm which might operate injuriously, their zeal being in advance of their knowledge; and where there is not experience there is apt to be pride. And "pride (says the wise man) goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall."

Lastly, we are informed in that part of the Apostle's letter we have been considering, that a bishop must have a good report of them which are without, because the church of Christ was to be a progressive and multiplying institution. Its light was not to be hid under a bushel; but the light of its members, and especially of its officers, was so to shine before men, that they seeing their good works, were to glorify our Father who is in heaven. The eye of the world is upon the church, and if it can discover worldly practices in those who profess to be heavenly-minded, it will not only remain carnal, but will delight in exposing any errors it may find in those who profess to teach others. Let any therefore who may desire this important and necessary office, seek by prayer and supplication for that "wisdom which cometh from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated; full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy" — resting assured that "the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace."

H. HUSSEY.

ENANGELISTS—THEIR POSITION AND WORK.—No. V.

CONCERNING the appointing, the formal setting apart, and the responsibility of evangelists, we cannot now enlarge. It seems clear, from the lessons of the creed, that the evangelist is not to be appointed on the sole ground that he will in future perform duty, but that his appointment is grounded both on what he has done and what he is to do. To take an untried brother, who has only given evidence of mental gifts to speak, ordain him, and then look for the fruit of his faith, zeal, and constancy, would be likely to issue in disaster to all parties concerned. Fitness, duly tested by work done and by suitable behaviour, constituted apparently the rule of proceeding adopted by Paul.

But if he then stands as a brother of all-work connected with the whole of the brethren, or all who know him, he is, in turn, responsible to all. There is not one company of brethren anywhere acquainted with him, but what may bring a charge against him, either as a brother or as a laborer, if he be blameworthy. He is a disciple put in a general sphere, and hence he must act the part of a disciple, or be disowned. It is a true sign of religious incompetency and spiritual poverty in a public laborer to find him making a plea, when anything comes up against him, that no persons can try and judge him. A brother who is worthy of the name of evangelist, if there be a breath uttered against his behaviour, will not only be inclined, but anxious to have any church of the Lord look into the charge preferred.

So, therefore, in this view, which we can urge as being alike scriptural and reasonable, there is a ten-fold chance for the bishop of a church to go unpunished because of neglect of duty, or of perverseness, or of what statesmen call mal-administration, compared with the evangelist; so long, at least, as each church is independent, fenced round from every other church. Talk of irresponsible evangelists! The very thought to us is the next thing to ecclesiastic insanity, whether entertained by the laborer himself or others; for if the liberty and labor of the evangelist are enlarged, his accountability is incalculably greater. For, how much easier to outwit and tyrannize over one church, than to hoodwink and play the usurper over twenty or fifty churches! Let any evangelist who may think himself particularly clever, try to spin, weave, and use his own authority to rule over the churches, and it will speedily be reported how one man came tumbling down while attempting to climb up.

But let us assume in argument what we cannot acknowledge in fact, and say that there is risk in appointing a workman to labor everywhere, in the churches and out of them. What of it? Have we anything to do with exceptional cases? They are wholly out of our line. All that we, as fallible thinkers and imperfect actors, are called upon to know and to do, is summed up in this—To delve into the mine of truth which Heaven has opened to us in the Oracles, to ascertain the mind of the Master, and then to act it out like true pupils and copyists.

Every good student of the great map of revelation knows that, while the Christian Oracles were flowing from the pen of inspired writers, there were general laborers in the Gospel—men who travelled freely among the churches, and who also travelled and labored away from the churches—men of large soul, and well taught in the first and after principles of the Gospel—men who gave themselves up to the work of preaching the glad-tidings to sinners, teaching the believers, correcting errors, and closing the mouths of pernicious teachers—men who, under the direction of the Lord's Apostles, attended constantly to these duties, and who in the religious sense, for church as well as preached the word to the converted—men who fully knew the mind, the doctrine, the patience, sufferings, the manner of life of the apostles; and we need not have such men now, other work will go undone that was formerly performed.

Here we are obliged to utter the conviction, that in these days the evangelists are no nearer like their primitive brethren than the existing bishops and deacons are after the original apostles. We have all been sickly. Our spiritual health is very like consumption. We have not intended to convert the world—that is, we have not intended to multiply our deeds, labors, and sacrifices. We have lost the faith element, the zeal element, the living and powerful element of activity—all have been most surely dying. Reform we must, or we shall perish. This is a settled persuasion. It is as sure as that the Lord is in heaven. Our faith, as manifested in labors, is the true measure of it, is as sickly and yellow-looking as a corn which whose root is eaten by a destructive worm. A grain of mustard seed is much larger than our faith, than doubtless safe not to make or attempt to make a specific comparison.

It is the veriest weakness and folly to talk about our confidence in our love to, and our estimate of the Lord Jesus, while we move not at his bidding—while we only use the word of prayer but do not the works of prayer. Rather, may we ask, if we should pray this prayer at all? Does any man think that the Lord Jesus may be crucified again? No. That work is done. Will any man pray that Jesus may be glorified again? Likewise is among the things of the past and present. Can any brother ask the Lord to instruct and ordain apostles and send them to the world full of the Spirit? Who can do it? He has done this already. There has been no need wanting on the Lord's part. We need not pray that the Lord may be glorified. He has been so—he is so. Will any man pray for him to come personally, and do the work he invites and solicits? If so, our prayers must be as those of the old Pharisees. We pray for men's conversion, we are to show that the prayer is healthy and real, by working in order to this end. For a farmer to pray the Lord to bless him as a husbandman while he studies novels, talks tales, gossips and trifles away his days in seedtime, would be just as suitable a prayer, and as much pious in it, as for us to pray for the people's salvation, while we "sit all the day idle," or, if there is any activity at all, only a little of it semi-occasionally.

Though not a prophet, it is as evident to us as the North Star in a clear night, that before many years roll round, the principal portions of America, including Canada, will either be under the dark power of scepticism, mixed with the lighter shade of rationalism, or we will find earnest public men laboring and co-working with a true brotherhood.

What was the reason the Lord permitted the Arabian Prophet and his sword-companions to make a field of blood of the East, where flourishing churches once stood? The reply is in a word: a corrupt, idle, good-for-nothing Christian community. Why were the Huns, under warrior Attila, allowed to sweep over large portions of Europe like a hurricane, and scatter ruin in their path? Again we have to respond: it was because of the selfishness and unfaithfulness of the avowed followers of Christ. Why did the French revolution burst and belch out with such terrific violence, making priests and their prominent adherents fly for their safety, or else making them headless or freedomless? The same answer: the mockeries in the name of the Lord were the cause. And what, within a few years, will German and American rationalism be prepared to do? To prophesy is not in our line; but some signs can be read as clearly as the buds of Spring indicate the full expanded leaves. The rationalist forces are preparing—they are getting life and thriving upon the follies, impotencies, and selfishness of what is called the church. Scepticism in its weak might, and rationalism in its proud morality, will ride through the ranks of professors who are stark blind, incurably sick, and deplorably weak by reason of the lifeless, soulless, spiritless, indolent and covetous deficiencies and redundancies which encompass them. An active church is the life of the world—an inactive and faithless church is the prelude of untold woe. Are all the brethren alive, or do a portion of them slumber?

This is not in the main a digression. We require the church of Christ now, as originally equipped and at work, to save the world. Living men who are the Lord's business men—we need them to move and to serve in every sphere of society, as classified and at work in days long past. The stout, athletic, healthy members of the Lord's body are the most thorough workers and renovators that mortals have ever seen. They constitute an army of redeemers under the great Redeemer. But we require the brotherhood made, armed, and directed by Jesus through the inspired servants. Every agency, grace, and force necessary to build up the people of Christ in the years between 35 and 95 of the Christian era, are needed in this age. What!—says one—do we need the apostles with their miracles, and prophets with their prophecies, as well as evangelists, shepherds, deacons, and teachers? Yes; most decidedly, yes!

Let friends call it new light, dim light, or clear light, it can be said, in truth, that we have no right to make a picture of what we call the primitive church, and keep this picture at a distance from us to look at now and then. We need the same crucified, risen, and exalted Lord—the same apostles filled with the Spirit of power and authority—the same miracles duly unfolded, documented, and brought before us—the prophecies, too, some of which are actually opening out and fulfilling around and within us—all these we need as a capital groundwork and main-spring of operation; and then we require evangelists, shepherds, teachers, and other active servants, together with all others, to work, to copy, and to exemplify in life the wonders and wisdom of redemption. Instead of separating ourselves from the church of the Lord, its apostles, prophets, and various powers as primitively set forth, the impression is yearly becoming stronger upon our mind, that we should be united to, and a part of, this saved company; being under the apostles and under the Lord, as were our brethren during the first years of Christianity. We are compelled to conclude that sin and the nature of man are no better and no worse than in those days—that the Lord is still where he was, at the right hand of majesty and power—that the apostles have not vacated their places of authority—that the Holy Spirit still dwells within individual and collected believers—that the gospel has all the freshness and force that it ever had—that every office at first divinely fitted for every class of service is yet needed :—and the moment that we are all prepared to think, feel, purpose, speak, and act by faith, following the Lord in full by direction of his ambassadors, we will be, not a modern church, but a joyful and serviceable portion of the primitive or Lord's church.

The notion that the first believers enjoyed privileges that we do not may not, or that the church as at ordained had greater instruments by which to combat sin and li newness of spirit, is a prevalent most pernicious error. Nay, we about to call it an impertinent as as a gross error ; for so long as l ren feel and say, "The Lord did and had greater favours for the c and for the world at first, com with present times," just so long we all be foiled in labouring to per friends to appreciate their high re sibilities, and work with their strength, with living vigour, to quer sin either in themselves or i unsaved world.

D. OLIPHANT

REBEKAH AND JACOB.

WHEN it was supposed that Isaac was near to death, the mother and the son entered into an unholy confederacy for the purpose of deceiving him. What a humiliating position ! It is true, they succeeded in their attempt, but what followed ? They were both degraded in their own and in each other's estimation, and were both the subjects of conscious guilt. The wife had deceived the husband, and the son had deceived his father, and both had offended God. Jacob's conscience smote him, and he said, "I shall bring a curse, and not a blessing." Rebekah said, "Upon me be thy curse, my son ;" and the curse fell upon her, inasmuch as her favorite son was obliged to leave home, and it is more than probable that she never saw him again. Lying always outwits itself. It may appear to triumph and to be prosperous for a time, but in the end it must be subject to shame and an ignoble defeat. It is very probable that Isaac had no desire that Rebekah should hear the request which he made to Esau, and perhaps in addition to her cunning and duplicity, she was guilty of the mean and contemptible practice of listening. It is difficult too strongly to deprecate such a habit. By it the freedom of conversation and the rights of humanity are invaded. The most sacred feelings are violated, and the cowardly practice is generally prompted by a mind full of deep and dark suspicions, and to them the truthfulness of the adage is often realised, "That listeners be good of themselves." The practice is a species of theft, and belongs to that and dishonest state of mind which would induce a person to open or the letter of another. Such are and we could never trust them. a proof of great dishonesty of soul, all such spirits will find it difficult to engage in that which is good and bling. Whether Rebekah did or did not listen, the narrative does not say is certain, however, that immediately she heard the instructions given, knowingly and wilfully turned it into an improper account. "Go now to the flock, and fetch me two kids of goats, and I will make them savoury meat for thy father," said the father and designing mother, in order that Jacob might receive the blessing. This was a wicked act, done with deliberation and design, showing at once a dark and sinful state of the mother's soul. No sooner had Rebekah known her evil design, than the son Jacob was polluted with the same holy desire. We are now in the presence of two deceivers, and what are the inevitable consequences ? It is morally impossible for Rebekah to do so highly of Jacob as she would have done had he not complied with her request, and it was equally impossible for the son to respect the actions and signs of the mother. Both have a dishonest part — both have fallen their own estimation—both have placed themselves in such a position, that in the future they can have no faith in each other's integrity—and both have offended God. Both were bad, but we think not equally, for Rebekah was the primary cause in this work of iniquity. Dark stain this, Rebekah, upon thy character; thy handsome looks and courteous manners will not atone for thy cunning craftiness. Thou wert the wife of Isaac, and in thy youthful days fair and beautiful to look upon. Isaac was thy husband, and he had fondly loved and protected thee. His heart was right in the sight of God, and often at eventime had he gone out to admire and to meditate upon His wonderful works and mysterious ways. But now he is old and infirm, helpless and almost blind, and his treacherous wife is the first to deceive him; she takes a mean advantage of his infirmity and blindness, and prompts her child to utter a lie. Sad way this, Rebekah, to requite the kindness of thy husband! It was a dark day in thy history. Thou didst disgrace the name of mother and of wife, and for thy conduct all ages will rebuke thee. Nor do we feel disposed in any manner to excuse Jacob; he sinned with his eyes wide open. An appeal was adroitly made to his acquisitiveness, and to the love he had for exaltation, wealth, and power. It was successful, and he fell. "And he went to Isaac and said, My father. And he said, here am I; who art thou, my son? And Jacob said, I am Esau; I have done according as thou badeest me; arise, I pray thee, sit and eat of my venison, that thy soul may bless me. And Isaac said, How is it that thou hast found it so quickly, my son? And Jacob said, because the Lord thy God brought it to me. And again he said, Art thou my very son, Esau? And he said, I am. And Isaac said the voice is Jacob's, but the hands are Esau's." We cannot well imagine a darker and deeper state of guilt. And doubtless the wretched mother was near, watching with cunning and fiend-like interest the success of the combined duplicity of herself and son. What a lamentable proof is this of the wretchedness of the human heart! We never read of the repentance of Rebekah, and we fear she died with this guilt upon her soul. That in after life Jacob did repent, we think there is no reason to doubt. He knew that he had excited the just indignation of his brother, and he acted wisely in appeasing his wrath by sending him presents. Thus Esau's heart was melted, and when they met a reconciliation took place, and they mingled their brotherly sympathies and tears over the mouth of their father's grave. Rebekah was the cause of their separation. Her shameful conduct had caused Esau to be the subject of cruel and resentful feelings, and though they were united again, she was no instrument to their reconciliation. Rebekah and Jacob were the criminal deceivers, and Esau was the injured child. We are not surprised at the indignation he manifested. In this instance, as in every other, false speaking defeats its object. Rebekah's mind was immediately troubled, and we never read of her future joy. She had sinned against God, her husband, and both her children, and this was enough to becloud her soul, and to darken her moral and spiritual prospects. She stood a self-convicted transgressor, and her sufferings were intensified by a full consciousness of the fact, that she had made her son a guilty participant. We think it was very mean of Jacob to take advantage of poor Esau, when he was so weary and hungry that he thought he should die, to purchase his birthright for a mess of pottage. It was mean and selfish—an act unworthy of a man or stranger, and most degrading to a brother. As long as the narrative is read, it will stand as a memorial of shame to that act in the history of Jacob. We were much pleased with the quotation in the April number of the Harbinger on exaggeration. It was faithful and true, and our experience justifies us in believing that it is not only often indulged in, but that it sometimes wilfully escapes that honest and severe censure it so richly deserves. When Rebekah dressed the meat, she purposed in her heart to deceive her husband. When Jacob said "I am Esau," it was the result of a wicked purpose, prompted by a wicked design. When Peter said, "I know not the man," the falsehood was as absolute and complete as were the statements of Jacob and Rebekah. But there is this difference: there is no proof that Peter premeditated or purposed in his heart to deny his Lord, and there is proof that the others did. Of such falsehoods it is not difficult to judge. There is, however, a much greater difficulty when the statement is partly true and partly false — when, as it was happily expressed, “Truth is the handle, and falsehood the blade.” We believe that exaggerations are much more calculated to deceive than direct falsehoods, for the wielder of the deadly instrument can say, “Look here — see how strong, and firm, and true it is ;” and the handle is shown with bravery and a smile: the next moment the sharp blade of falsehood is thrust therefrom, the heart of the friend is pierced, and his prospects perhaps blighted for ever. Of an exaggeration it may be said, taking the statement of the deceiver as a whole, that one end is right, the other is wrong—one end is wholesome, the other is poison—one end is true, and it entwines itself around the throne of God—the other end is false, and it encircles, like a serpent, the brow of the Dark Prince. It is an effort to mingle light and darkness, to deceive the good and defend the bad. It is a futile and wicked effort to marry the truth with a lie, and at the same time to worship God and the mammon of unrighteousness. It is a proof of foul design, and of deep and dark corruption, and those who are skilled in the infernal art will betray you with a kiss, and stab you with a smile. How beautiful is the pure simple truth ! A falsehood uttered may be repented of and fully forgiven, but it cannot be forgotten by Him who knows the heart, and comprehends the affections of the children of men. Let us, dear friends, be guarded—let us set a watch over our lips, and though the truth should appear to militate against our present interests, for God’s sake and for Christ’s sake, let it be spoken. Rebekah and Jacob, by their cunning and duplicity, placed themselves in such a position, that without mutual confession and contrition, they could never respect each other again. For liars and deceivers cannot respect themselves, nor can they respect those whom they know to be like themselves. Often, however, in the wickedness of their design, they implicate others, and to exonerate themselves they will deny their own statements, and then charge them upon others. And when this is proved to be false, they are base enough to associate a third person with own shame and disgrace. Such a of things is enough to break heart. Well may the sons and daughters of Zion weep and hang heads in sorrow. Well may the trusting and confiding soul be shocked and be paralysed with amazement were it not for the blessings and hope of the gospel, it would sink in despair. Falsehood kills friendship. It is truth alone which can bind hearts together by the ties of hope and love. We have no sympathy for the feeling which prompts the use of some of the milder expressions, such as “it is a misunderstanding,” or “the matter has been slightly misrepresented,” or “we have quite forgotten,” or “forget and forgive.” Such phrases are often used by parties, in order that they may cover known and deliberate falsehood by laudation of what they choose to call Christian charity. We, as professors of the Gospel, earnest and honest men, never forgetting that Jesus said, I am the truth. We are only morally strong and in proportion to our love of the truth. And when we meet with our friends, let us speak the truth, and if our plainness should displease them, we have done our duty, and the issues must be left with them and with God. Parents and brethren, we call upon you to rebuke those who misrepresent, who speak evil of others ; and should do so in their secret, and what they choose to call, confidential conversation. Speak evil of a brother and sister at once to them, and you will find that we have found the statements, not untrue, but pregnant with malicious design. Falsehood pales the face, deadens the eye, knits the brow, presses the lips, injures the hearing, estranges the spirit from God, drives the soul to earth and sensuality, covers it with the pall of death. Oh ! how glorious is the truth ! Its birth-place is Heaven. It is the seed of paradise and the child of God. It is a live spark smitten from the throne. It comes to us in the Gospel of the blessed God. It tells of our fall, and of Him who came to restore us therefrom. A full, hearty, obedient believer in Christ must love the truth, and he must hate that which is false. The Word of the Lord is

The life and death of Jesus, the Christ, are true—the precepts and the promises are true—the bread and the fruit of the vine are true—and in these ever-blessed truths we humbly and hopefully confide. Our eternal destiny is in connection with them. May our lives be purified by and consecrated to them. May we never doubt, neither in life nor in death. One falsehood disturbs the whole moral universe, and there can be no compensation for its disturbing influences, only heart-felt repentance and a returning to God. Let us strive to be honest and truthful one to another, not attempting to please two parties, not double-tongued, not two-faced. There are those who slander, and then haughtily assume a position of truthfulness; they entrench themselves behind dark and ambiguous phrases; they arm themselves with sentences which have a double meaning, or which contain only a portion of the truth, and which may be interpreted both ways; they are ingenious in concealing the real facts—yes, they will smile at you, and for their own wicked purposes charge you with having said so and so, of which you have neither thought nor spoken; and while by misrepresentation your friends have been injured and placed in a false position, the cool calumniators will sit glancing with evil eyes, freely uttering falsehoods in the place of facts, to escape the just and well-merited rebuke of their own bad deeds. Such conduct, sooner or later, will bring a curse. It may appear to answer the ends of cunning and craft for the present, but the day of reckoning will come. We do not believe that Rebekah saw a happy day after her wilful falsehoods—they were deliberate and infernal. Because she was his mother, we think Rebekah was worse than Jacob. A gentleman once called me into his drawing room and said—"Sir, I wish to speak to you in reference to myself, and I do so because you have been lecturing upon the moral and intellectual character of man; you must know, Sir, that I am in the habit of telling falsehoods, never with an intention to injure any person—they always relate to things, not to character. What am I to do?" I simply said, Do as you have done with strong drink, totally abstain—that is the only cure. When in detail you have spoken the truth—then say no more. Here we found a character who honestly admitted that he was not truthful, and in a subsequent interview he thanked me for the plain and faithful advice. We cannot love that which is false, and our souls must be in a morbid state, if we do not loathe and hate it. Let us, dear readers, strive to test our affections by Him who hath loved us—our words by Him who spoke as never man spake—our thoughts by Him who was pure, harmless, and undefiled—our tempers by Him who, when he was reviled, reviled not again, and who in the agony of death said of his enemies, "Father, forgive them." In his name may we live, may we praise, and may we pray; so that he may be our day-man and our counsellor, and the captain of our salvation; so that being complete in Christ, we may come off more than conquerors through Him who hath loved us. ### THY WAYS ARE EVERLASTING.

A DISCOURSE BY JAMES M. MACRUM, OF PITTSBURGH.*

"Remember the former things of old, for I am God, and there is none else. I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning."—"In thy ways is continuance, and we shall be saved" (Isaiah xlv. 9, 10; and lxiv. 5)

THE word "religion" is the general

* We candidly confess that we are not at all disposed, as a rule, to insert lengthy articles in the Harbinger; but some of our readers, we know, will feel much pleasure in perusing a discourse by Bro. James M. Macrum, late of Drummod, Ireland, which was delivered to the church at Bethany, Va. October 17, 1859.—J. W.

and most comprehensive one in use in reference to the highest relations of man—those, namely, in which he stands towards God. It is only used in the Common English Version to represent θρησκεία; but neither New Testament nor classical usage would entitle θρησκεία to be represented by a word of so large signification. It is used once (Acts xxvi. 5) in reference to Judaism ; again, (Colos. ii. 18) we find it used in reference to the superstitious "worshipping of angels," as the Common Version renders here, not "religion of angels," which would yield no suitable sense ; and again in James (i. 26, 27) we read, "If any man among you seem to be religious, and brideth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart ; this man's religion is vain. Pure religion before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world." Now this is decidedly the highest sense in which this word is used in the New Testament ; but it by no means shows θρησκεία as an equivalent for the word "religion" as used by the English-speaking populations ; though we say the latter is a very suitable translation of the former word in this passage. With the striking eloquence which distinguishes this apostle's manner of writing, and which indeed has so much in common with poetry, that the same principles of interpretation which we apply to poetry will equally apply to it, he inculcates what is quite a homogeneous part of his beautiful and powerful appeal and argument for a living doctrine as a doctrine of life, for the self-evidencing effect and direct practical outcome of such, not to supplant, but to be deduced from, and inevitably to result from any and every divine system of doctrine, which must be vitalized in every part, instinct throughout with this highest life, and ready to act, seeking realizations under all the forms and conditions of human existence—whatever merely abstract thinking and feeling, or transcendental and irreducible principles some men might assume to have found in it. The sense in which the apostle uses the word will be about as easily found as the meaning of the words laborare est orare, to work is to worship—words from a Latin hymn of a later age, which probably needed some such protest against monkish and other indolences and tendencies thereto, and false doctrines to justify the same.

Our word "religion" is itself, etymologically speaking, of Latin origin. It signifies a rebinding, as of something which had been loosed from its original bond. Having this signification, it is very appropriately and descriptively used when we speak of the means employed by God to reconcile man to himself—to reclaim him from a state of separation, as of exile, and the alienation of sin, and rebind or reunite him to God his Creator. God had already revealed himself as a Creator, while yet stood in the innocence and bliss of Eden, and held converse there with God. When, through sin, man was banished from the earthly paradise—and separated from the presence of God in which alone could shine the life, and truth, and love—when he was condemned to change the blessings of these—how fearful, how inconceivably terrible the change!—and began to realize the consciousness of a condemned state, sorrowfully making his journey of mortal life within the shadow of death, and falsehood, and the principles of that adverse power of evil which had deceived him, and the trinal elements of sin itself—the deed, God having purposed good, not evil to his fallen creatures, to reveal himself in yet another relation to them, namely, as a Saviour and Redeemer.

The knowledge of evil to which man had attained by disobedience, brought with it as a dire consequent ignorance of God, and ignorance and unbelief of THE GOOD and its divine nature and perennial GOOD which truth reveals the purpose and outcome of every thing and of all things, both of the seen and the unseen, through the All-God Almighty Over-ruler of all existence. Adam was created a man—a full and perfect man, by the fiat of his Maker, which called him into existence. Now Adam, and human nature in general, is brought to a spiritual infancy by words and things of a spiritual life separated by a gulf of death from the life—he has died to them. But man himself has undertaken to solve the problem whether man cannot live—whether by the planting of a seed of hope in his soul, through faith in the promise of God, he cannot be made to live again unto God, and, as from the beginnings of infancy, make a beginning of spiritual growth, which would prepare him to long for—would bring him to the love of God yet avail to bridge a way for a returning penitent prodigal across the wide-yawning gulf of sin and tance—to seek to recover that lost inheritance of immortality and eternal life. As he begins thus low—as we have just said, with the poor beginnings of an infant state—he has to learn the first spiritual idea after that of the existence of God himself, unless we reckon as such the consciousness of sin, gained like the sense of a loss, and the misery of remembering past happiness, now lost beyond recall. He could no longer converse with God and the angels of God, holding high converse on high themes; for spiritual thought and spiritual speech are no longer his—not as before in the completeness of his spiritual nature. He has them not—can by no means presently repossess them; but there is a germ of spiritual life within, which, if nourished with the food from heaven, even the truth of the knowledge of God will grow into the fulness of all life, and all the possible of attainment in life.

I have said that man after the fall had just one idea, spiritually speaking, to begin with; that is, the idea of a Supreme Spiritual Existence, Self-Existent Almighty—in one word, of God. But here was nothing beyond the Alpha of knowledge, even for man. Of course we must believe that God is, before we can come to him; but we will not come to him, nor abide in him, till we begin to learn what He is, and is to us; how full of love and condescension, of mercy and long-suffering; and in revealing a Saviour and Redeemer to Adam, God began to reveal to him the inexhaustible and unsearchable riches of the Divine Nature—of Himself. The means by which God's purpose and promise of salvation and redemption were recorded, so that mankind might read them continually, was in the institution of sacrifice. In this institution, therefore, God gave the first and most important lesson of spiritual truth. For, everything considered that has been argued concerning the origin of sacrifice, there appears but one rational and scriptural conclusion possible, namely—that God himself instituted it, and thereby opened to the human mind the possibly otherwise unattainable knowledge of the nature and means of the promised salvation. In it not only were SIN and DEATH brought together in a most significant manner, intimating their inevitable relations, but in it, too, were most strikingly set forth the fundamental ideas of the Mediatoral system, namely, substitution and atonement.

Thus, in the nature of man—or, if we can with any propriety say it—in the fallen nature of man was begun the foundation of a spiritual nature. Before, when he stood in the image and likeness of God—upright, perfect—as God had made him, a spiritual nature had been given him, thus raising man to the converse and companionship of God and the angels; but now, only by a low beginning and a slow process—for faith is weak and faculty is weak—only slowly indeed, with such faith and such effort as may be had, can the spiritual building be re-edified in the fallen nature of man—and at best as seen from any earthly stand-point, never but painfully contrasting with that, which through unbelief and disobedience, man himself had brought to the doom of ruin.

The means of this great building is the one great subject of divine revelation—this is “religion”—the God-conceived, God-revealed, and God-effected means of rebinding, or reconciling, man to God. Besides its formative power, as being the appointed means of spiritual attainment, religion is only the exponent of this spiritual nature. But it could not have been so to Adam, had sacrifice been to him merely a sort of unintelligible hieroglyph, to be solemnly copied from time to time, and not rather, as we conceive, an act of faith, which he had been taught to interpret, at least, so far that he could worship God therein with the heart and with the understanding. Shall we not say that to man, believing the promise of God, the Gospel of hope, this institution and the doctrine of it—that is, its meaning, its significance in reference to the promise, at least, to some extent—were given together, and given to set forth symbolically, in a kind of fact-writing as it were, some fore-glimpse of the nature of that which in the fulness of time would be the realization of the soul-sustaining hope, and ever-blessed divine promise, of the first Gospel? Or, shall we say it was not so? Consider this fact: When the fallen ones, suffering the consciousness of their nakedness and shame, fastened leaves together for garments, God himself helped the insufficiency of their merely physical resources, and clothed them with skins of animals. Now, shall we say that God taught man the use or adaption of the skins of animals, to clothe the nakedness and cover the shame of the body, while the nakedness of the outward form was but a faint reflex of the humiliation of the soul within; and that he did not teach him the far more important lesson, namely, that the gracious purpose of His Gospel, in the belief of it, and in the obedience of the faith as shown in the holy institution of sacrifice, was to clothe the nakedness of the soul, and to take away for ever the shame of sin? Shall we not rather say, on the contrary, that the recorded lesson is but the illustration employed to teach the higher and nobler one—that as God had found in the skins of those animals sacrificed on the altar, a covering for the nakedness of the body, so had He also found a fore-ordained covering for the nakedness of the soul—which COVERING the divine word of promise enabled faith to take hold of, and the institution of sacrifice, translating that word into symbolic fact, illustrating and explaining it thereby, still more enabled faith to take hold of—and a strong hold too?

But let it be remembered, that only by typical forms and things palpable to the senses, could man henceforth be taught in spiritual things. Man, in his first estate, could converse with God, and held familiar intercourse with his Creator and Benefactor, who was also his condescending instructor. Man fallen from his first estate, shunned the presence of God, forgot the very language he had first spoken, or remembered only so much of it as belonged to the things of earth—that part of it which was, in fact, like himself, “of the earth earthly”—the nobler part, the higher and purer speech of the God-communing hours of Eden, he could no longer speak, no longer understand.—Without a spiritual language he could no longer converse with spirits, or speak of spiritual things. But a deeper reason, one underlying this, must be remembered as the true and originating though unseen source within, of all that appeared with such humiliating manifestness without. In his fall, not only were the harmony and balance of his nature, in its trinal existence of body, soul, and spirit, disordered and lost, but disordered and lost also were higher and nobler perceptions—the very faculties by which these were reached, being themselves reduced to the weakness and poor beginning of an infant state. Strictly, indeed, infancy—we repeat, what we, even at this time before, already had occasion to remark, because of the importance of it—an induced infancy, in which there was at first no language, and hence even the faculty of speech. But how ever weak, since the beginnings of life were there, a spiritual language and spiritual perceptions began to grow slowly, indeed, and strugglingly, until the fearful retardations of sin, which was more and more corrupting the nature of man, and covering earth with darkness—in pursuance of the hell-meditated scheme of ambition to usurp the throne of universal dominion, to rule the destinies of man and of the fair world which God made for his habitation!

The question of human progress, however, could at no time (if rightly considered) have been a doubtful question. Almighty God had undertaken to carry it forward—to educate man and fit him for high destinies in the universe. But the school is a battle-field, and a wide one too—as wide as the whole world; and the day of battle is a long one—long as all the ages of time! Therefore it is not for those who shun the conflict, at all times, or hardly at any time while there, to see through the dust, or to hear amid the din, what is the amount of general result gained on the whole—which matter, to see and hear the truth of it, would indeed seem to require a very different standpoint. From some “mount of vision,” some spiritual height, overlooking human life, it is a sublime scene, this great battle-field—when ages, races, governments, institutions, systems, traditions, philosophies, literatures, arts, sciences, and what other forms soever there may or can be, embodying life in worldly thought, as spiritually or mentally manifested—forms of divine and diabolical presence and purpose maintain great warfare between light and darkness, truth and falsehood, right and wrong, good and evil—between life and death, heaven and hell, God and Devil.

Such is the scene of life, the field the world, the school and training-ground of every son and daughter of Adam. No garden of delights, no place of innocence and ease; but to the best and noblest "a garden of Gethsemane" rather, and a place where innocence is ever lost, and ease is never found. Unfortunately for themselves, however, men persist in trying to think otherwise; oftenest acting as if the things of time and sense were themselves the ends, and not the means of life—as if the Present were the All of man's life, and life itself, instead of being what it is, only the preparation for life, or at best, only a foretaste of the true life which is to come.

But we were not about to speak of partial, but general aspects—not of the degrees of temporary and local resistance and obstruction, but of the degrees of world-wide and lasting victory and progress. For thus, throughout the ages, the education of man in the knowledge of God and of himself, has been going on—not after the narrow and superficial methods of a didactic or a dogmatic philosophy, but after the divine conception of a philosophy of life, contemplating a full development of man, in and through his actual life-relations to God and to mankind—not merely a growth and training of the individual, but a growth and training of the inherited and transmissible nature itself, and that, too, in its entirety and trinal unity of body, soul, and spirit.

During the Patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations this was being gradually accomplished; the Bible history and ancient history generally may show us what manifold experiences of life, both of the inner and outer life, man was exercised in during all that period—each, of course, living on as a thought, and recording itself as a word, for use in all the future; and the teaching of Christianity and the writing of the Christian Scriptures, mark the proficiency of thought and language attained so far—sufficient to make a final revelation of divine truth and wisdom, and to enable men henceforth "to explain spiritual things in spiritual words"—or, if you will have it so, "to compare spiritual things with spiritual."

But if, notwithstanding all this, we feel to stumble at the slow, difficult, ever-struggling, and ever-much-retarded progress of spiritual growth, let us ask: Does it appear to be contrary to the analogy of the divine procedure elsewhere? For, of course, we could not consider the subject otherwise to any purpose—not at all otherwise, without presumption—for what are our poor faculties to take in the wide-extended relations of the parts of so vast a whole as God's universe is? And what is in us to conceive such a scheme of Government as that by which the All-wise and All-mighty God governs his universe? Here, indeed, all human knowledge were no better than ignorance; history a mere irrelevancy—the light of nature no clearer than darkness, and the light of revelation only as the rising of the morning-star—the promise of the coming day, when "we shall know even as also we are known?" To resume our question, then, though even it cannot be adequately considered: Does the slowness of man's progress in a spiritual point of view—the slowness of his spiritual developement, appear to be contrary to the analogy of the divine procedure elsewhere? Look back on the past and trace the progress of man as an intellectual being! Was it not slow, difficult, even struggling, and much-retarded—just as we have described the growth and progress of the spiritual nature of man? And now look away to material nature also:—there, I think, hastening of results will not be found to be a divine necessity at all. How many thousands, or ten thousands of years was the earth, from the "Bereshith," when God created it, till Adam's body was formed of its dust—preparing to become a fit dwelling-place for him and his race? All those uncounted ages, too, a busy theatre of action and life—not separable altogether from anything that acts and lives even now, that remote action and life—the products and results of which had ulterior ends, reaching even as far as to us and our wants. There was our fuel—those great coal deposits on which not only our machinery, but also our domestic hearth are largely dependent—there it was provided when the great forests, having treasured up the sunshine of a thousand Summers, were overthrown and themselves treasured up in the dark bosom of the earth. Analogies are everywhere—nature has but one voice of testimony.

The common stone from the quarry—the precious gem or metallic ore from the mine, or the veins of rocks in the deep-sunk foundations of the everlasting hills—yea, hills and valleys, lakes and streams—whatever God has made in all the earth—with one voice of innumerable voices, testify that the Creator knew the end from the beginning, and is God, who inhabiteth eternity!

How manifoldly written for us is the truth of God—manifoldly in the volumes of work, manifoldly in the volumes of word. Our Divine Teacher Himself has taught us to compare work with work and word with word, that we may learn the secrets of His wisdom, and the wonderful workings of His power. In the words of the poet—

"That to the height of the great argument
We may assert eternal providence,
And justify the ways of God to men."

From the known, by comparison and difference, man had to advance to the unknown, which thus became knowable. Thus, too, from the seen to the unseen, which also became visible. Thus, indeed, and not otherwise, have we been instructed in those things which before were all unknown, thus enabled to see what eye had never seen and could not see—to hear and feel what neither the ear, nor any other sense, could ever reach. So God taught us to think and teach spiritually, having with just analogies and true types imaged on our souls ideas of the eternal and infinite things which had been inaccessible and inconceivable to the utmost-flown aspiration of human thought. One great Teacher—one great principle of teaching—but various under-teachers, and various methods of teaching. As by endowing men with great intellectual powers, God made the thought of one age anticipate the achievement of many; made the already conceived possible rush far forth into the future—often so far as to seem to hold no vision or imaginable line of procession from the actual; so did God also, in the higher administration of the spiritual world, richly endow patriarchs and prophets with a depth and fulness of spiritual nature, so that they could and did live and die heroically—God's heroes!—or, if we will, the transcendent representative men, chosen by God to stand amid the ages, representing what man ought to be, and what he is to be, though they stand even yet amid the ages of a majestic isolation of pre-eminence, the pre-eminence of spiritual growth such as could not be outgrown in all time were it not now made possible to grow into the very likeness and express image of God Himself, as revealed in Christ.

What a possibility is here! O, fellow men! living, as ye are, in the Christian Age of Time, have you ever considered fit? Did not all the faith and hope of past ages—all the promises of God, whether given in words, or recorded in the hand-writing of ordinances—all prophecy and even history for it too was a living acted drama—prophecy, did not all these, with far-reaching rays, convergingly shine toward the second Adam, the seed of the woman which should bruise the head of the serpent? And has not HE brought life and immortality to light—instantly of the death, and the life unto death which passed on us through the first Adam's transgression? Yes! through Christ the impossible becomes possible—faith and obedience now can rest where what through unbelief and disobedience was marred or blotted out—the image and likeness of God in man! Yes! and more than was lost in Adam, and more than patriarch or prophet ever said or thought, or living or dying could realize, all and more may be found and realized in Christ! The first Adam was indeed a living SOUL, but the second Adam is a life-giving SPIRIT; the first was the earthly father of us all, but by the second we are begotten again unto a heavenly inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away! How worthy is he of the description of the prophet: "Wonderful—Counsellor—Mighty Potentate—Father of the Everlasting Age—Prince of Peace!"

What an exemplar and standard is the stature of the fulness of Christ! Nor alone as an exemplar and standard shall we regard Him, beyond all—beyond all this, we must conceive of him. He is "GOD WITH US"—the image of the Invisible God, and the expression and evidence of how God loves us! And that love, the love of God, is revealed in our Lord Jesus Christ, is not a mighty influence, and an undying principle of perfection—having, "li-light, an attraction power over all that has life to grow—drawing that growth upward and toward itself? To come to Christ is then to pass from death to life—for there is no death, no condemnation unto death—to those who are in Christ!

O then, what a divine possibility is here, from which no son nor daughter of Adam is excluded;—none excluded, but such as exclude themselves by continuing in sin—continuing in enmity to God and his Anointed, which is the consequence of sin. Amongst you, my hearers—for I ought to put this question, and I must put it, even here and now before we part this evening—amongst you, my hearers, is there any such?—nay, are there not, perhaps, even many such? If so, and surely it is so, O, my fellow men! O, my dear brothers and sisters! consider well of this, also present, divine possibility which the All-good and Everlasting FATHER OF ALL has placed before you in Jesus Christ. Through unbelief and disobedience, and the bitterness of disappointment, and the misery of remorse, which are the consequences of those twin-born evils, you are alienated from God, the All-good, One: yes, far from Him and His righteousness as your lives have been, your hearts are farther still. Alas, has Christ then come, showing the love of the Father and his own love, in vain for you?—Is it all in vain for you? When He laid down his life for sinners, every sinner hated him just as you have done? But He did not wait till they would love him, before He laid down His life for them, and bare their sins in his own body on the tree, and the infinitely darker, more terrible, and all-inconceivable horror and agony of the burden, and punishment of them in his pure and sinless spirit! Had He waited so, Hope itself would have perished in our souls; for men would have gone on in their sins, and grown on in their sins, “serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in hatred and envy, hateful and hating one another;” and as a necessary consequent, hating God more and more.

But while we were yet sinners—and such sinners—Christ died for us? He said, “I, if I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me!” O, was not this the greatest WORD of love that ever was spoken? And was it not followed, closely followed as was fitting, by the greatest WORK of love that ever was undertaken—that ever was done? Hear now, O attentively hear the word—it is for you too—even for you, as it sounds out of the ages! But neither it nor the WORK which it spoke of, and which so soon followed, neither word nor work can fail for ever! Have you heard the word?—then behold the work. Behold, for even across eighteen centuries ye can behold that ever-wonderful work of Divine Love! Eighteen centuries! The Cross of Calvary, the blood-stained Cross of Calvary, will be visible across the centuries of time, and visible too, to show the love of God to man, even from the shore of eternity itself! And O man, whatever thy age or nation, thy name or condition, look there! Look there, O sinner. Yes, look even through the gloom of eclipse—for the Sun has refused to behold the scene—look, though the earth shudders as if God in his wrath had smote it—look, if thou canst for weeping, on those hands, those feet, pierced and torn with nails; and hear that agonized cry, “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me!” In that voice ’tis a more than mortal agony that speaks. But when the agony has passed, or at least is silent there, see that ruthless spear, the wounded side, the issuing stream, mingling the symbols of sorrow and love;—sorrow, because death has sorrow in the memorial of sin, which separates from God; and love, because love triumphs over death, the soul being reconciled unto God. O yes, sinner, look! That thou mightest behold the “exceeding sinfulness of sin,” and the justice of God as well as the love of God, that Cross, that Bleeding Victim, is lifted up!

There, now, thou hast heard the Supreme Word—and seen, too, the Supreme Work of Divine love—appealing to thee—and is thy heart responsive? O, if there is a heart beating within thy bosom, fall on thy face before that Cross, and acknowledge the Christ of God, the Saviour of the world, as thy Saviour!

SCRIPTURAL "FAITH AND PRACTICE"

[We commend the following letter, which was addressed to a friend, in practical illustration of the principles of Christianity, contrasted with the errors of the day, to those who may have been baptized whilst under the influence of dreams or visions, in place of true faith and repentance; and who, consequently, are subject to continual doubts as to their union with Christ.]

THERE are times when a feeling of loneliness fills our hearts with sadness. We desire to seek consolation, and at the same time often imagine it cannot be found. There is only one source of blessed rest. It is to be found in Him who says, "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." To be candid, I must confess that I feel lonely when writing to you. Time once was when this was not so. Why the change? You profess to be a Christian, or, at least, you are a member of a church claiming the most direct communications from heaven—not from any outward or apparent cause, but because the recipients were eternally called, or predestined to be God's children, and will be such, regardless of the Bible, or any external influence. Now, let me say, in all candor, that when I was laboring under this delusion, and was a "predestinarian Baptist preacher," I was highly esteemed by you. Now to the proof that the Bible is a dead letter, is a delusion, as also is fatalism. "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye might have life through his name" (John xx. 30, 31.) What was John's testimony written for? "That ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." What was the necessity of believing? "That ye might have life through his name." This is enough to silence that wicked doctrine which says "the Bible is a dead letter, and none can understand it except the specially illuminated." The promise of eternal life is not to them who have dreamed dreams, seen visions, or had feelings; but Paul says, "To them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life" (Rom. ii. 7.) You can find in the same chapter a character whom "the goodness of God was leading to repentance; but after his hard and penitent heart treasured up unto himself wrath against the day of wrath, revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his deeds." Now say as you will, that I "am blind," and spiritually taught, these facts are an irrefutable argument against your "cious doctrines" of fatalism. You vainly tell me that "the blind lead the blind;" but if this is so, "your trine" is false, for you say "it is impossible for them to perish;" therefore the blind cannot lead them.

But to return. Having resolved, helping me, to obey only a part of a creed, by taking the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, as the "rule of faith and practice," and being unwilling to receive anything out of them as a religious requirement, I branded me with the name Campbellite. Let me again tell you, that if Mr. Campbell had written a creed, and I had subscribed to that creed, I should have been really "a Campbellite."

Jesus Christ has a creed, if I may be allowed to call it so—that creed is revealed in the Bible—that creed, worthy as I am, I am willing, heartily willing, to subscribe to—I am willing to wear any name it requires of me, such as Christian, Disciple, Friend, &c. I consider that I should be acting wickedly to religiously wear a name unauthorised in God's Word. I told you, a Baptist is one who baptizes. You told me that you had not baptized any one. I then asked and now ask you, for your authority, wearing the name, Baptist. Once, in ignorance, I did it, but hope, through God's grace, I have learned better. Jesus is the only Baptist named in the Bible, and he was so called because, as his occupation shows, his business was to baptize. John says he must decrease and the Saviour increase. You may find (Acts xix.) that when John's disciples, who had been baptized with John baptism, were told that they should believe on Jesus Christ, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. These facts show, that my old illusive idea, that the Baptist church must be the true church, because it descended from John, falls to the ground by the application of Bible facts alone. If John the Baptist is "the only name given under heaven whereby we must be saved," then it is proper to be baptized into the Baptist faith, and become Johnites. The record shows us too plainly this is not the case.

Again, by examining 1 Cor. i. 12, 13, you will find the fallacy of wearing human names. Are you willing to wear one, after reading Paul's exhortation to "hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love, which is in Christ Jesus?" (2 Tim. i. 13.) Or, again, after reading the Saviour's declaration, "Whosoever, therefore, shall be ashamed of me and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels." History will show us that six hundred years ago there was no Baptist church. From my early training, and my religious predilections, the name Baptist sounded like music in my ears. I loved the name perhaps as well as you do. I still love it, as showing the great business of the harbinger of Christ. But I do not desire any longer to love it as a human creed, authorized by him "who is the only name" in which we can trust for pardon, or hope for endless bliss in the world to come. Hence, when I was enabled to see these things, and willing to receive with meekness the engrafted word which is able to save my soul, I was willing to become obedient to the faith in Christ, and like John's disciples, was baptized into the name of Christ, for the remission of sins. Not on the strength of either "feelings," "visions," or "dreams," but from evidences presented to me, I believed Jesus to be God's Son, and was willing to become a member, unworthy as I am, of that kingdom which Daniel said, "there shall be no end." When I joined the Baptist church, I was baptized, not for the remission of sins, as the Scriptures require, but because I foolishly thought my sins already pardoned. I desire to make sure work. If anything is doubtful, let me choose that which is most certain. Heaven is a blessed place, and "we should work while it is called to-day, for the night cometh when no man can work." In that day, every one of us "shall be judged according as our works shall be." Then an approving consciousness of having obeyed God will be worth ten thousand worlds like this. I do not dictate what course others shall pursue; but the kingdom of heaven, now existing, has its laws. I dare neither add nor diminish therefrom (see last verses in Revelation); I must not change them. It is for you and me to examine ourselves, to see whether we are in the faith, which will make us free indeed.

I have some serious questions to ask you, and you may think me very plain; but it is better now for us to "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good," than to wait till death darkens our eyes. I desire above all things to know what is true, and do that which the Master requires as my reasonable service; for if I hide my Lord's talent entrusted to my care, I have his promise, in words this world cannot overthrow, that my portion will be where "there is wailing and gnashing of teeth." You may think it rather strange to see my letters to you in print; but I have found by experience that the best way to obtain information is to speak practically upon practical subjects, and if you are disposed not to consider these things, perhaps others may; and when we have used our talent, with singleness of heart and honesty of purpose, we may hope to receive the welcome salutation of, "Well done, good and faithful servants." I must remark, in order that I may not be misunderstood, that if others are satisfied with their baptism, received at the hands of sectarians, I have not a word to say. You seem to fear a new translation of the Bible. If King James had allowed his translators to give the pure English of the Bible, even at that day, I have little doubt one-hundredth of the sectarian differences of opinion would now have existed. The most manifest mistranslations are held too dear, for a basis of some worldly or fleshly order of faith, to allow them to be corrected. This I have repeatedly tested. In conclusion, let me ask you to study your Bible, not to prove any opinion you may hold, but to learn the truth as it is in Jesus Christ, that you may believe, obey, and receive an everlasting life.

"CHURCH OFFICERS."*

I SEE an article in a recent number under the head of "Church Officers." To a part of this article I desire to reply. In it our brother says many things which I approve—but when he comes to give his views of the proper plan for electing bishops and deacons, and the duties of these officers, it seems to me that he is mistaken. Of bishops, he says: "Their duty is to teach and take care of the congregation;" and again, he says: "We do not regard it as necessary that an elder or bishop should administer the sacrament of the Lord's supper. It is a feast spread for Christians and by Christians, and all are entitled to it. When an elder or bishop appropriates to himself the exclusive power of administering this ordinance, he has considerable leaven of Romanism working in his heart." I suppose that our brother will admit that "taking care of" means that the bishop shall see that the congregation "walk in all the commandments of the Lord blameless." Of deacons, he says: "Their work is to minister to those who are needy the funds of the congregation, no other work being given to them; they are not created deacons to minister upon the Lord's table, as is the custom of most congregations. This is a mistaken notion, which has grown out of human expediency in the manner of partaking of this sacrament." Here our brother attempts to destroy the established customs of our church officers, without attempting to give us a more scriptural plan. This seems to me to be inexpedient. He discards "human expediency"—and should we, at this suggestion, dispense with this, I cannot see how the congregation are to partake of the Lord's supper at all. Our Saviour said to his disciples, "Do this in remembrance of me"—and his commandment we must obey. And our brother discards "human expediency" will he be so kind as to point out a "thus saith the Lord" as to who shall provide the bread and the wine? Who shall carry it to the house of the Lord? 3, Who shall spread it on the table? 4, By whose mouth thanks be offered? 5, Who shall pour the bread and pour out the wine? Who shall bear it round to the disciples (or shall each one come to the table and help himself)? If so, who shall the word come? As it is the duty of the bishop to take care of the congregation, I infer that he is the proper person, according to the Bible, to do all this, or to direct it to be done by other members of the congregation. And this work he does not appropriate to himself, but the Holy Spirit, through the church, has called him to it. I think he may do it without fear of the "leaven of Romanism in his heart."

Again: we think our brother is mistaken when he infers from our custom of the deacons bearing the bread and wine to the disciples, that we think that the deacons were created for that purpose. We are far from it, for we think that the office of deacon was created, not even for all the work which we assign to them, but alone to minister to the widows. But inasmuch as certain men have been chosen as deacons by the congregation, and under the direction of the Holy Spirit, this gives them a preference with the bishop in directing any part of this service which they are present, believing that the service will be performed acceptably to the Lord and to the congregation through the hands of the deacons. We believe that our brother is mistaken in what he calls the "Bible plan" for electing bishops and deacons. He says "these officers should be elected by the congregation, as, for instance, was that of an Apostle as well as of the seven deacons." To this we reply, and admit that the Apostle Matthias was so elected. But * We quote this article from the CHRISTIAN REVIEW. The mode of choosing pastors or deacons here presented we recommend to the consideration of all churches who may need such officers, and who have brethren scripturally qualified amongst them.—J. W.

Lord chose him as his witness. But the record tells us that the multitude of disciples chose the seven deacons. Whether it was done by private written tickets, or by open word of mouth, is not revealed to us. Then our brother must guess at it, when he says it was by lot. We think that to determine these elections by lot is productive of strife, envy, and division, which things we should guard against, for we are commanded to "be of the same mind one toward another;" and besides this, we have no regular plan laid down for electing in this way; and if we should undertake it, another squabble is encountered. Some will propose to put the names of all the candidates in the box, and say that the first one drawn out shall be the officer; (we might, in this way, get a poor officer;) another proposes that each member of the congregation put in a ticket, voting for the man of his choice, and that the candidate having the highest number of votes shall be elected. (This way might make the officer by a majority of the church, and he might be objectionable to a large minority of the members.) And another proposes that the balloting be continued until some one candidate receives a majority of all the members present. This plan would take from the minority the right of choice, and create division and strife; this would be wrong, for we are commanded to be "perfect, of good comfort, be of one mind." Here is "human expediency;" but to me it seems inexpedient. But the plan that I consider the "Bible plan," is for the congregation to imitate the plan pursued by the apostles and elders, with the whole church at Jerusalem (Acts xv.); when they came together to consider the expediency of circumcision, and "when there had been much disputings," and some speeches made, James made a proposition, and to him they all agreed; "then pleased it the apostles and elders, with the whole church," &c. verse 22. Here they were all agreed, all of one mind. Then let us do likewise; when the name of one brother is proposed for the office, if there is any objection, let him be withdrawn, and another one proposed, and so on until one shall be proposed to whom there is no objection (like the proposition of James).—This would keep down strife, animosity, and division. Then each member would have his choice, and he would have confidence in his officer. Wherever I have seen this practiced, it has done well; all were of "one mind."

He further says, in speaking of the ordination of church officers: "The imposition of hands is a senseless thing for a Christian in this age to be engaged in. I have seen good and devoted Christian teachers lay their hands upon the head of a brother who had been elected to the office of a deacon, and reverently lift their eyes to heaven, as if some power from God would come down to their eyes as magnets, and pass through their hands into the head of a brother. To witness such solemn mockery, makes one shudder." Now, I cannot tell what are the feelings and motives of the brethren in other places, but here we impose hands in a sensible manner; and the brother is mistaken in our object and views, when laying hands on the head of a brother deacon in ordination. With us it is no mockery. We do not expect any "power from God to pass through our hands into the head of a brother." But we do it because we believe it to be the Lord's plan of ordination, to signify a change, a separation and a setting apart of the individual to the office of a deacon. We understand this to be the purpose, and the only purpose, for which the apostles laid hands on the seven deacons (Acts vi. 6); and the purpose for which the brethren laid hands on Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiii. 3.) The laying on of hands is the closing part; the fasting and prayer are preparations for the end. We believe that in all cases recorded where brethren have laid hands on other brethren, it signified a change. In like manner our laws have prescribed, whenever an individual has been elected to office, that he be ordained by taking an oath of office; this gives him the power to act in his office. This changes him from a private citizen to an officer, and until he is thus ordained he dare not enter upon the duties of the office.

In hope of a continuance and increase of brotherly love, and a better understanding of the Bible, I remain, your brother in Christ,

J. YOUNG.

THE INFIDELITY OF THOMAS DIDYMUS.

THE infidelity of Thomas, one of the twelve Apostles of our Lord, and his refusal to believe that Jesus had appeared to the ten, (as there was but this number left, besides Thomas, after Judas Iscariot "fell from his place,") during his absence, have no doubt often excited the wonder of readers of the New Testament. But there is no wonder about it, when his character and the circumstances are taken into consideration. It then admits of an easy explanation. His other name, Didymus, doubler, shows his sceptical character, and that it required more proof than usual to convince him of anything. He did not dispute that the ten had seen the form or appearance of the Saviour, but he doubtless regarded it as his spirit they had seen, and not his real body that had been crucified. We learn in another place, that whether there were really the spirits of persons to be seen or not, the disciples believed in their existence and appearance; for upon one occasion, when they saw Jesus walking upon the water, they took it to be a spirit, and were greatly frightened; and Jesus told them not to fear, that a spirit did not have flesh and blood as he had. Hence, as the Lord made his appearance, the first time after his resurrection, suddenly in their midst, when the doors were all closed, there was naturally a strong presumption in the mind of Thomas, that it was not really the body of Jesus, but his spirit, they had seen. And hence he required the tangible demonstration he called for: "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and take my hand into his side, I will not believe. We say that from the character of Thomas and all the circumstances, might expect him to require such clear and tangible evidence as this to convince him of the reality of the personal presence of Jesus. Our Saviour who "knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man: for he knew what was in man," heard Thomas and the other disciples, though he was invisible to any of them on that occasion; and when he next appeared to them, the doors being shut as usual "for fear of the Jews," and Thomas being present with them, addressed himself directly to him and said: "Reach hither thy finger, and believe on my hands; and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side: and believe, faithless, but believing." This was enough for Thomas — his appearance again among them as before, and letting Thomas know that he saw and heard him, although not visibly present — every doubt of his identity vanished, and he exclaimed in the language of full belief: "My Lord and my God." This, we conceive, fully explains the scepticism of Thomas: and the blessing that Jesus then pronounced, is worthy of our attention, as it applies to all with all its force: "Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou hast not believed; (that 'Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God,') blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."

ADDRESS OF DR. CONANT ON BIBLE REVISION.

THE eminent scholar, Dr. Conant, delivered the following address to the members of the Ladies' Bible Association, the anniversary of which was held recently in the Baptist meeting-house, New York:—

Dr. CONANT commenced his address amidst profound silence. He said, in no case had he ever addressed an audience with feelings warmer than on the present occasion. He came before the meeting at the invitation of the Ladies' Bible Union, to make some remarks congratulatory of their Association, he would do so in a few plain and simple words—for his heart was too warm in the cause of revision for any need of expression on the object of the Society. The old Family Bible—the sacred nomenclature of our fathers—was a term title used to cover the imperfect and errors of the received version of the Scriptures. Several translations of the Holy Scriptures had been received by the English people, in each of which necessary improvements had been made and all of which had contributed to erase errors from the volume of truth. The first English edition of the Scriptures had been given to the world by John Wyckliffe, in the year 1380; but that edition had been translated from the Latin Vulgate, and not from the Greek and Hebrew texts, and consequently partook of the acknowledged errors of the Vulgate. England, however, received through that edition of the Holy Scriptures a flood of light, which discovered the darkness of the age, and prepared the way for a more perfect and general translation from the original tongues in the English dialect. In the year 1626 William Tyndale had given to the people of England a version of the Scriptures, from which many of the errors of Wyckliffe's Bible were expunged. The name of Tyndale will be ever pronounced by the lover of the Bible with respect, and the English owed much of their Christian greatness to his exertions in behalf of Biblical truth. A version of the Geneva New Testament was given to the English people in 1556, and in the year 1660 the Old Testament followed. The King James's Version of the Scriptures was the last edition of the Bible, and while it had many beauties and excellencies, it was not worthy of the praise which had been justly given to the previous translations. The words in the margin of the English Bible were, in many instances, a better translation than the English text, and many of them were different from the words which the reader had the option of replacing by them. They thus plainly proved the necessity of revision. Many of these words were banished from the margin next the text—not because of a want of merit and appropriateness, but through the pressure of a majority vote in the convention of King James's translators. The Common Version of the Scriptures was full of many infelicities of expression, together with obsolete words. The speaker had made the study of the various translations of the Bible his practice, and he felt assured that no one was fit to undertake the translation of the Scriptures, without a previous acquaintance with the preceding editions of the Word of God. He quoted one instance, among others, in which God himself was misrepresented in the Common Version, and made to avow an open profession of changeableness to the people of Israel. The Rev. Professor, in support of this statement, referred the audience to the 4th chapter of Numbers, and the latter part of the 34th verse—

"Ye shall know my breach of promise."

In that passage God was totally misrepresented, and the words themselves were not only in direct variance with the original Hebrew, but were also contradicted by the modern translators. Should, then, a version be retained which falsely set forth that God announced Himself as a covenant-breaker, and threatened His people that they should "know His breach of promise?" The heart of every Christian responds with "No" to the question. But what are the proper words of this passage? Happily, there is no dispute about them. They are strictly translated—

"Ye shall know my displeasure (or withdrawal.)"

The Rev. Professor next referred to erroneous passages in the New Testament, which involved among other matters, the discipline of a church. In many cases, the italicised words in such passages altered the meaning of the truth, or were totally unnecessary. The speaker met a gentleman some time since, who made known to him, in a single instance, the necessity of erasing all errors from the Word of God. The gentleman referred to, had complained to the speaker of his inability to understand the beautiful Epistles of Paul. They were full (he said) of abrupt translations and seeming contradictions, and without the proper connections to make them harmonious and generally understood. In his reply to the gentleman, he sympathized with him, and endeavoured to show the beauties of Paul's writings under the inspiration of God. There were, it was true, a profound depth and hidden meaning beneath the fundamental truths which Paul set forth, but they were written for the common people, and the speaker, as one acquainted with the plainness of the original text, and the errors of the Common Version, would say that they were capable of being understood by all. The original was beautiful and harmonious, and why should not any translation of it be similar? But who are appointed to do this great work, and give to a Bible-seeking world an unadulterated translation of the Scriptures—who is appointed to do this? There must be no compromise—there has been enough already. A pure version of the Divine Volume must be given to the nations, whatever body of men may be called to do so. Tyndale was an example to them. He felt the necessity of a revision in Wyckliffe's Bible, and he applied himself to it with a zeal which terminated in its success, and his edition of the Scriptures added to the appetite for truth which resulted in subsequent translations. The speaker did not care what body of men, or what denomination of Christians commenced the work, but the work should be done. The American Bible Union was not exclusively a Baptist organization. It embraced in its folds members of all denominations, and had for its object a pure translation from the original tongues, irrespective of the views which such a Bible should support or condemn. He did not believe that himself, or even the youngest person present, would see the day when the Christian world would join together and struggle for a correct version of the Word of God; but the Almighty was fast removing the obstacles to the cause of translation, and the day would surely come when the world should be harmonious in the belief of its necessity, and the capability of accomplishment. The acknowledged errors of the Common Version will abundantly prove the necessity of its revision to the world. But there was a cry raised that the American Bible Union was a sectarian organization, which had for its object to deluge the world with a sectarian Bible. Such a cry only argued a want of knowledge in the accuser. Truth was the object of the Bible Union, and if truth in its nature was sectarian, then the Bible Union was sectarian. If the Word of God, correctly translated—and that was the object which the American Bible Union has struggled for years to accomplish—should be what the world would call a "sectarian Bible," then the Bible Union was struggling for such a Bible. But it was not so! And when the Bible Union shall have ended its labors by the accomplishment of its great work, then the world would give its adhesion to an edition of the Holy Scriptures which faithfully expressed the inspired meaning and words in Hebrew and Greek texts. The Professor, in conclusion, congratulated the members of the Ladies' Bible Union then present, for the assistance they had given the parent society, and prayed that God would spare them to see the final success of their labor of love.

OBEY THE SCRIPTURES OR PERISH.

AFFLICTIONS are often blessings in disguise. Confined to my house for some days by an attack of much severity, I have had an opportunity of realizing in a small degree the advantage of Paul's "thorn in his flesh," to the development of his noble character. True to a principle long since adopted of making every condition tributary to spiritual advantage, I have ranged through as much forest of reflection and meditation as my strength has permitted.

On one of these ranges, the following solemn and admonitory address concentrated all the powers of my soul, and I would through you present it for the admonition of all.

"Obey the Scriptures, or you perish. You may despise the honor done you by the Majesty above; you may spurn the sovereignty of Almighty God; you may revolt from creation's universal rule to bow before its Creator, and stand in momentary rebellion against his ordinances; his overtures of mercy may cast contempt on, and crush afresh the Royal Personage who bestows them; and you may riot in your licentious liberty for a while, and make good use of his indulgence and long-suffering. But come at length it will, when vengeance shall array herself to go forth, and anguish shall attend her, and fire the wheels of their chariots ruin the enemies of the King, whose destruction shall not tarry, and whose destruction, as the wings of the whirlwind, shall be swift—hopeless as the condemnation of eternity and the reversion of doom. Then around the fiery con-of the wasteful pit the clang of grief shall ring, and the flinty heart which repelled tender mercy, shall strike its fangs into its proper bosom; and the soft and gentle spirit which dissolved in voluptuous pleasures, shall also dissolve in weeping sorrows and outbursting lamentations, and the gay glory of time shall depart; and sportful liberty shall be bound for ever in the chain of obdurate necessity. The green earth, with all her blooming beauty and bowers of peace, shall depart. The morning and evening salutations of kindness shall depart, and the ever-welcome voice of friendship, and the tender whispering of full-hearted affection shall depart, for the sad discord of weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth. And the tender names of children, and father and mother, and wife and husband, with the communion of domestic love and mutual affection, and the inward touches of natural instinct which family compact, when uninvaded by discord, wraps the live-long day into one swell of tender emotion, making earth's lowly scenes worthy of heaven itself—all shall pass away: and instead shall come the level lake that burneth, and the solitary dungeon, and the desolate bosoms, and the throes and tossings of horror and hopelessness, and the worm that dieth not and the fire that is not quenched.

" 'Tis written, 'tis sealed of heaven, and a few years shall reveal it all. Be assured it is even so to happen to the despisers of Holy Writ. With this in arrear, what avails liberty, pleasure, enjoyment—all within the hour-glass of time, or the round earth's continents, all the sensibilities of life, all the powers of man, all the attractions of woman?

" Terror hath sat enthroned on the brows of tyrants, and made the heart of a nation quake; but upon this peaceful volume there sits a terror to make the mute world stand aghast: yet not the terror of tyranny neither, but the terror of justice, which abides the scorn-ers of the Most High God, and the revilers of his most gracious Son. And is it not just, though terrible, that he who brooked not in heaven one moment's disaffection, but launched the rebel host to hell, and bound them evermore in chains of darkness, should also do his sovereign will upon the disaffected of this earth, whom he hath long endured and pleaded with in vain? We are fallen, it is true—we found the world fallen into ungodly customs, it is true—here are we full grown and mature in disaffection, most true. And what can we do to repair a ruined world, and regain a lost purity? Nothing—nothing can we do to such a task. But God hath provided for this pass of perplexity—he hath opened a door of reconciliation, and laid forth a store of help, and asks at our hands no impossibilities, only what our condition is equal to, in concert with his freely-offered grace.

" These topics of terror it is very much the fashion of the time to turn the ear from, as if it were unmanly to fear pain. Call it manly or unmanly, it is nature's strongest instinct—the strongest instinct of all animated nature; and to avoid it is the chief impulse of all our actions. Punishment is that which law founds upon, and parental authority in the first instance, and every human institution from which it is painful to be dismembered. Not only is pain not to be inflicted without high cause, or endured without trouble, but not to be looked on without a pang; as ye may judge when ye see the cold knife of the surgeon enter the patient's flesh, or the heavy wain grind onward to the neck of a fallen child. Despise pain! I know not what it means. Bodily pain you may despise in a good cause, but let there be no motive, let it be God's simple visitation, spasms of the body, for example, then how many give it licence, how many send for the physician to stay it! Truly, there is not a man in being whom bodily pain, however slight, if incessant, will not turn to fury or to insensibility—embittering peace, eating out kindness, contracting sympathy, and altogether deforming the inner man. Fits of acute suffering which are soon to be over, any disease with death in the distance, may be borne; but take away hope, and let there be no visible escape, and he is more than mortal that can endure. A drop of water incessantly falling upon the head, is found to be the most excruciating of all torture, which proveth experimentally the truth of what is said.

" Hell, therefore, is not to be despised, like a sick-bed, if any be so hardy as to despise a sick bed. There are no comforting kindred, no physician's aid, no hope of recovery, no melancholy relief of death, no sustenance of grace. It is no work of earthly torture or execution, with a good cause to suffer in, and a beholding world or posterity to look on a good conscience to approve, perhaps scornful words to revenge cruel actions, and the constant play of resolutions or study of revenge. It is no struggle of mind against its material envelopments and worldly ills, like stoicism, which was the sentiment of virtue nobly down-bearing the sense of pain. I cannot render it to fancy, but I can render it to fear. Why may it not be the agony of all diseases the body is susceptible of, with the anguish of all deranged conceptions and disordered feelings, stinging recollections, present remorse, bursting indignations, with nothing but ourselves to burst on, dismal prospects, fearful certainties, fury, folly, and despair?

"I know it is not only the fashion of the world, but of Christians, to despise the preaching of future woe, but the method of modern schools, which are content with one idea for their Gospel, and one motive for their activity, we willingly renounce for the broad methods of the Scripture, which bring out ever and anon the recesses of the future to upbear duty and downbear weakness, and assail men by their hopes and fears as often as by the constraints of love of Christ, by arguments of reason and of interest no less. Therefore sustained by the frequent examples of Saviour, the most tender-hearted of beings, and who to man hath shown most excessive love, we return, and men to know, that the despising God's law and of Christ's gospel, by no means escape the most righteous fate. Pain, pain inexorable, tribulation and anguish shall be their everlasting doom! The smoke of their torment ascendeth for ever and ever. One thread snapped, and they are down the bottomless pit. Think of him who had a sword suspended by a hair on his naked neck while he lay and fell—think of yourselves suspended over the pit of perdition by the flimsy thread of life—a thread near worn, weak in a thousand places, ever threatened by fatal shears which soon shall cut. You believe the Scriptures, then you believe, which is true as that Christ died to save you from the same."

Reader, pause and think! C. D.

THE ARMY OF THE LORD.

To fight the battle of the cross, Christ's chosen ones are sent,
Good soldiers and great victors—a noble armament;
They use no earthly weapons—they know not spear or sword;
Yet right, and true, and valiant, is the army of the Lord!
Fear them, ye mighty ones of earth! fear them, ye demon foes!
Slay them and think to conquer, but the ranks will always close;
In vain do earth and hell unite their power to try;
They fight the better for their wounds, and they conquer when they die!
The soul of every sinner is the victory they would gain;
They would bind each rebel heart in their Master's golden chain:
Faith is the shield they carry, and the two-edged sword they bear
Is God's strongest, mightiest weapon, and they call it Love and Prayer!
And some there are—among us—the path that they have trod
Of sin, and pain, and anguish, has led at last to God—
They plead, and Christ will hear them, that the poor slaves who pine
In the blind dungeon they have left may see His praise divine.
Oh! who can tell how many hearts are altars to His praise,
From which the silent prayer ascends through patient nights and days;
The sacrifice is offered in secret and alone,
Oh, world! ye do not know them, but He can help his own.
They are with us, His true soldiers; they come in power and might:
Glorious the crown that they shall gain after the heavenly fight;
And you, perchance, who scoff, may yet their rest and glory share,
The rich spoil of their battle, and the captives of their prayer.
Oh! who shall tell the wonder of that great day of rest,
When even in this place of strife His soldiers are so blest?
Oh world! Oh earth! Why strive ye? Join the low chant they sing
"Oh grave, where is thy victory! Oh death, where is thy sting!" A.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

THE UNCLEAN SPIRITS.

THERE are spirits in the universe—invisible, intangible, intelligent, and energetic beings. It follows that they have moral character—are good or evil. This is the current belief of mankind, in all ages, and in all nations.

It is generally believed, also, that they come into communication with this world in one way or another, and have some influence on human affairs. Indeed the old heathenisms of Greece, and Rome, and Britain, and Germany, multiplied their numbers, and enlarged their influence much beyond the dreams of the most ardent modern spiritualist. Recognizing mind as the only source of power, and all motions as a result of power, and so, of course, all exercise of mind, they inferred the operation of a spirit wherever they saw motion of any kind. Old father Tiber gave perpetual impulse to his muddy flood, and Neptune and the Nereides and Tritons, kept the waves of the sea in motion. Vulcan poured forth the fires of Etna from his forge, and the Dryad and Hamadryad presided over the forests. Ignorant of an infinite Creator and Preserver of the world, they supposed an infinite number of finite powers, whose friendship they sought, or whose wrath they deprecated by sacrifices. When in great perplexity, they asked advice from some of these demons; particularly from Apollo, who was famous for his ambiguous predictions of the future, and for a certain superhuman knowledge of the present. He is reported to have told the ambassadors of Croesus, the Lydian, what their master was doing that day in Sardis—though Sardis was hundreds of miles from Delphi, and his business was exceedingly unusual; namely, boiling a tortoise and a lamb together in a brass vessel. Whereupon Croesus offered him costly sacrifices, and begged his advice in regard to a war with Persia, upon which he had set his heart, and was exceedingly anxious to regard as his manifest duty. The Pythian replied that Croesus crossing the Halys should overthrow a great kingdom. He crossed the Halys, and the great kingdom fell. But it was the wrong one—his own. The moral of this tale may be useful to modern presidents and spiritualists.

The dark lantern, however, was the best light which these poor heathens had. The great mass of mankind were not able to pay such clever devils as Apollo. They had to be content with women who had familiar spirits, and with wizards who peeped and muttered; in no respect superior to Miss Julias and the Madame Smiths, who act as writing mediums and table rappers to the American heathen. Of this description, doubtless, was the spiritual circle at Endor, whose distinguished medium had the honor of a visit from royalty, and the terror of greater revelations than she had bargained for. It is quite evident that she would not have been so terrified by the apparition of Samuel, if her daily intercourse with the spirits had not been of a very common-place character. Or, if it be supposed that the truth denounced against the royal sinner terrified her, we may infer that truth was a strange commodity there.

When God gave his oracles to his chosen people, he peremptorily forbade them to consult the spirits on any pretence whatever. The revelation given by his Spirit being perfectly sufficient to guide every man in all the affairs of this life, and to give him all proper information regarding the other world, the man who left the oracles of the living God to consult the spirits of the dead, was guilty of a high insult to Jehovah. He was to be treated as a rebel. "Is it not because there is no God in Israel, that thou hast gone to ask counsel of Beelzebub, the god of Ekron? Now, therefore, thou shalt not come down from that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die." By the law of God all mediums were to be put to death; and worse than that, they are certain to be damned eternally. Whoremongers and sorcerers shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone. Wherever the gospel has come in its power, it has turned men from these lying vanities to serve the living God. So the Ephesian spiritualists, when they were converted, brought the books connected with their mysteries and burned them, to the value of 50,000 pieces of silver. In like manner, Paul exorcised the Philippian medium, that she made no more gain by soothsaying. And wherever the Gospel came in power, the oracle became dumb; whether in Asia or Polynesia, in Greece or Caffraria, the Word of God has silenced the prophets of Satan.

It cannot, therefore, but be deemed noteworthy, that now in the nineteenth century after Christ, and in a Christian country, where the Bible is generally circulated, and among people able to read it, this old heathenism has revived, and spread to an extent unparalleled in antiquity. The spirits find no such employment and remuneration among the Bechuanas as among the Americans. There they are consulted only when some one is sick, or when the nation wants rain. Here they are employed if a lady loses her keys, or a lover is jealous of his mistress. The West coast of Africa is the only part of the world where the Greegree women and Jumbo men are so familiar and obliging. It is possible that our woolley-headed friends may have brought their deities with them, and that in this travelling age they have all taken a trip to the Northern States. It is certain that they have come down upon us in flocks almost thick enough to be seen. From "the Spiritual Register for 1859," just published, we learn "there are now about 5000 men and women in America who are more or less devoted to the public advocacy of spiritualism;" and that "in addition to these public advocates, there are nearly forty thousand private mediums, most of whom consent to hold sittings or circles only under retired and quiet circumstances!" It states also that there are published "scores of periodicals, tracts, pamphlets, and books," advocating spiritualism. It states the number of believers in spiritualism in America to be 1,440,000, and those inclining favorably to it, 4,500,000.

The spirits are not remarkable for accuracy, nor are their mediums at all particular about truth; so that if we take a 0 from each of the numbers, and allow about one tenth of the population claimed for it, we may not be very far from the truth. The solemn fact, however, will remain, that nearly a million of our fellow-citizens are living for light to the powers of darkness and deliberately casting off God's revelation of truth and duty that they consult the spirits of the dead. Whether they can actually accomplish desire or not, is of little consequence. The disposition to do so is in itself fearfully significant.

As may be expected, the doctrine of these new oracles are such as are proposed to be quite acceptable to the mass of mankind. Heaven is earth and earth is better. There is better weather here than there, more fun, and much the same business. There is no hell, and no Devil, and no punishment. "Ye shall not surely die." This is the one grand doctrine for ever. Diversity among the spirits. The doctrine of private judgment has grown to an excess among them, and is extended to the other world, to facts as well as to opinions. Even Judge Edmonds has lately acknowledged that one cannot have implicit confidence in every spirit. In plain English, they will lie a little. It is a great pity that our confidence in such pleasant doctrines should be shaken by such an announcement. Judge the tree by its fruits, they are in part as well as false. Under the name of spiritual marriages, free love, and fictive affinities, they advocate fornication and adultery. In every town and village where they obtain a footing, seductions, seductions, and divorces are the character of these revelations.

A new phase of doctrines has, however, been lately hatched for the West. It is found that these grovelling sentiments have had their run, and have enlisted almost all the Infidel Universalists, they cannot rationally expect any professors of Christianity to join them. Moreover, the universalists which they teach is suicidal to the organization; for if we are all going to heaven at any rate, why trouble ourselves with expensive churches and missionary operations? Decent Universalists also shunned the mediums, in consequence of their infidelity and lawlessness. So Satan thinks it is time for him to amend his ways, if he means to continue his teaching among the Americans. Having tried us with the pian Minstrels, he is now hard at work washing them, so as to give us entertainment by new characters—The Angels of Light.

Battle Creek, Michigan, is the place honoured by the first advent of these worthies; there they give revelations, print pamphlets, and send forth elders two and two to proclaim the new gospel, to preach, to pray, to proclaim the coming of the millennium, the destruction of the ungodly by the fires of the last day, the entire annihilation of soul and body, and to command all men and women to be immersed and receive the spirit. They charge no fees, take no collections, sell their pamphlets at a moderate price, preach in plain popular style, court no controversies, use abundance of Scripture language, and affect all the style of men who bear a Divine commission. Though but a few months since they began their operations, they have already sowed their seed of error in many places, and have in almost every place visited, beguiled some unstable souls; principally from Baptists and Methodists, but not excluding Congregationalists and Presbyterians also. They will doubtless visit localities inhabited by the people of the Reformed Churches. They have, in fact, been prophesying alongside the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Mount Vernon, Iowa.

We have no desire, nor need, to enter into any discussion of the truth of their claims to inspiration. They are all quite anxious to make this notion prominent, namely: that they have intercourse with spirits. One wretch, near Dundee, Illinois, affirms that he is en rapport with the spirits of Isaiah, Bonaparte, and Jesus Christ. It is said they perform wonderful tricks, and undergo strange convulsions while receiving the spirits. It is not of any consequence whether or not. If they tell truth when they say they are under the influence of the spirits, they are lying spirits. The spirits of God's people departed are with Christ in heaven, and are not sent wandering over the earth at the bidding of necromancers. If they lie when they make such pretences, they are under the influence of lying spirits still—of the Devil, the father of lies. We know that God has before now given men who believed not the truth over to the influence of lying spirits—and we know most certainly that the great apostacy is to be introduced by a giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines (teachings) of demons. Whether these be the unclean spirits which go out of the mouth of the dragon, and the beast, and the false prophet, to deceive the nations and gather them to the great decisive battle, time will tell. It is quite certain that they are of the same character, and have the same purpose in view.

By one infallible work they are known, and may be condemned by any Sabbath School child—they profess to teach religious truth not contained in the Bible, and to derive authority for their prophesying other than the warrant of God's Word. Therefore they are false prophets. It is written, Rev. xxii. 18, "For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book. If any man shall add to these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book." Let no Christian man or woman, boy or girl, assist them or countenance them in any way. It is sinful curiosity which would lead any man to hear them. Cease, my son, to hear the instruction which causeth thee to err. Remember what Eve got by listening to a medium. "If any man come unto you and bring not gospel doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed. For he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds."

IDOLATRY IN INDIA.—The Rev. B. W. Noel in his recent work on India, says, that in the Madras Presidency there are 8292 idols and temples, receiving from the Government £100,000 yearly; and in the Bombay Presidency 26,589 idols and temples, receiving £30,000. The annual expenditure on the part of Government in support of idolatry is £200,000.

MATTER INERT APART FROM GOD.—It is a cheering fact that the eminent scientific men of our country are, almost without exception, believers of a personal God, and in a revealed system of religion. They find clear and satisfactory evidence that the Book of Nature and the Bible disclose the character and plans of the same Deity, and that science and revelation must be in harmony.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"MESSIAH'S MINISTRY."

THE MEMORIAL NAME.

To the Editor of the Millennial Harbinger.

In acknowledging Bro. Milner's admirable reply to my former communication, I beg to accept a concession, to make one, and to offer a suggestion.

First: Bro. M. concedes that all Hebrew scholars are not agreed respecting the memorial name—Yahveh; and, moreover, forcibly controverts the great Gesenius's translation of Exodus iii. 14. As one of my formerly expressed difficulties arose from the circumstance that the expression in Messiah's Ministry seemed to imply the contrary, this difficulty is entirely removed by Bro. M.'s frank acknowledgment.

Second: I concede that Bro. M. has given a satisfactory solution of the difficulty, I had privately and publicly urged, as arising from such passages as Psalm cx. 1, Isaiah liii. 6, 10, &c. It seemed good to me to re-urge this difficulty in the March Harbinger, notwithstanding the fact that, soon after first suggesting it in a private letter, almost two years ago, a possible solution occurred to my own mind. For this pertinacity I am abundantly rewarded by finding my beloved brother revelling in the full light of the very solution of which I had caught distant glimpses. Yes! what the Son is immediately, the Father is immediately—YAHVEH, THE COMING ONE. And a most inspiring conception it is, that, in the Old Testament, it is just when the Messiah appears in humiliation—as the Servant—the Sufferer—or as the glorified, exalted MAN, that the voice of the FATHER is heard; his participation in man's redemption BECOMES manifest, COMES into view;—then, that his right to the grace-revealing name Yahveh is vindicated! When in the typical-prophetic representations of the Old Testament the Sent Yahveh comes to earth and becomes man, then does a Sending Yahveh, in the heaven of heavens, come forth to the eye of faith, garbed in the splendors of a philanthropy which lays on the incarnate One the iniquities of us all. From this point of view, what a fulness of retrospective, as well as present and prospective, significance attaches itself to the declaration of John, "No man hath seen God at any time: the only begotten Son, who is within the bosom of the Father, HE hath (ἐξηγήσατο) given an exegesis of him, led him forth to view."

Third: I would offer a suggestion. Yahveh signifies The Coming One; but it truly denotes The Becoming One; and the suggestion is, that the poverty of our language demands the practical uniting of both English verbs, in order to the obtaining of a full reproduction of the power of the Hebrew Havah. Our verb "come" primarily denotes "a moving from one place to another;" only occasionally, and by implication, does it denote "entrance into a new relation." The latter idea is the primary one contained in "become," hence the advantage with which "become" may be interchanged with "come" in the exposition of the Memorial Name. Before attempting an illustration of this, permit me to remark, that Bro. Milner has by no means lost sight of it, and my aim is to bring it out into greater prominence.

My position is this: That the demands of both philology and theology are amply and admirably met by combining the verbs "to become" and "to come" in exhibiting the full meaning of Yahveh.

(1) The demands of philology. The more common meaning of the verbal form of Yahveh (judging of the earlier Hebrew by the later and more common Hayah "to become." No competent person can deny this. Only occasionally does the verb signify "to come." Still it does signify this sometimes. To the instances cited by Bro. Milner may be added a class of which the following are examples:—"The word of the Lord CAME unto Abram" (Gen. i. 1); "To whom the word of the Lord CAME in the days of Josiah" (Jer. i. 2); "The word of the Lord CAME unto me" (v. 4); also verse 11; chapter ii. 1, and like. While, however, "to come" is occasionally the meaning of the verbal form, the history of the derivative noun (Yahveh) strongly suggests "coming." This Bro. M. has unanswerably shewn. Both derivation and history of "Yahveh" respected by combining "becoming" and "coming" in its memorable significance.

(2) The demands of theology. The thoughtful reader will not be displeased with the following attempt to combine "becoming" and "coming" in the meaning of Yahveh as applied to the Messiah. That the Messiah may become man, he comes from the Father into the world. That he may become subject to the law of Moses, he comes unto his own land and people. That he may become an example to men in holy obedience to God, he comes into society of men. That he may become a sin-offering, he comes forth without the gate of the heavenly Jerusalem. That he may become "the plagues of death, and the destruction of sheol," he comes into their dark domain. That he may become the Conqueror of Satan, he comes into the territory of his usurpation. That he may become the husband of the church, he comes to woo and call out his bride. Thus may meditation proceed with the theme.

And thus also:—The Son comes to earth to die, that the Father may become propitiations through his death.

And even thus:—The Son will come again and wind up the mediatorial reign, that God may become all in all.

Satisfied that with all this Bro. Milner will perfectly accord, I beg most sincerely and gratefully to thank him for calling attention to Yahveh, the Memorial Name.

LETTER FROM VICTORIA.

Camp Street, BEECHWORTH,
Jan. 17, 1859.

My dear Brother Wallis, — When reading the Harbinger, and feeling my interest excited in the cause of our dear Redeemer, the thought has often occurred to me, that I felt interested in what concerned the progress of the work of the Lord elsewhere, so you and other brethren might feel interested in a few details regarding the progress of the common cause in this distant part of the world. Though unaccustomed to writing communications of this sort, yet being willing to contribute my mite (no one else here seeming to be disposed to do so) I have at last laid hold of my pen to give you a brief account of the progress of the cause of our dear Saviour in this district. Beechworth is about 200 miles from Melbourne, and is now a town of considerable importance, being the seat of Government, and of the Court of Assize for a large district; and, no doubt, will yet become one of the most important towns of the gold-fields. The surrounding country, for a very considerable distance, is very mountainous, and, for picturesque scenery, is not surpassed anywhere in Australia.

I arrived here nearly four years ago, at which period the town was rapidly rising, in consequence of the discovery of rich gold mines in its immediate vicinity, as well as in its surrounding country; population flowed in, composed of almost every nation and tongue under heaven, bringing with them their varied vices, and leaving behind them all (if they ever had any) fear of God and regard for man. The great mass attracted to a new gold-field are bent upon one object — that object, alas! is not the promotion of the cause of Christ, and the acquirement of imperishable riches for eternity—it is the pursuit of the fleeting riches of this passing world, and the gratification of the lusts of the flesh: this is made painfully manifest by the fearless recklessness with which they plunge into the most abandoned excesses. All manner of wickedness abounds at such a time among such a population: drunkenness, blasphemy, gambling, fighting, low buffoonery, and licentiousness constitute the pastimes and pleasures of these deluded votaries of the flesh.

"The love of money is the root of all evil," says the Scriptures of Truth, and the saying has had the fullest verification in this land, where the passion has raged to the fever point.

The facility with which gold could be acquired has plunged multitudes into destruction and perdition. Prosperity on the gold-fields is not to be confounded with prosperity to the country. True prosperity must include intellectual, social, moral, and religious advancement, as well as an increase of the material elements of gold, wool, &c. A decrease in the latter elements may be considered an evil in itself, but good may be educed from that evil—as, for example, when the want of means prevents the vicious from becoming more vicious.

We acknowledge the hand of our All-wise Father in all the transitions and vicissitudes of states as well as individuals. I am more hopeful that a better day has dawned for this country; a day for consideration—a time of awakening and conversion for sinners, and of gladness and joy for believers. It holds true of all our gold-fields, that while our population is rapidly on the increase, the yield of gold is steadily diminishing; so that multitudes have had to encounter severe disappointments, privations, and hardships. This is no doubt changing the moral aspect of things here. During the most prosperous state of the gold-fields, even professed believers were cold and apathetic, "forsaking the assembling of themselves together." My partner in life and myself felt sad indeed, often melancholy, to see the indifference manifested by those who once professed "the one Lord, one faith, one baptism." For about two years we tried to seek out all who professed to be followers of Jesus, to induce them to meet with us, and attend to the ordinances of Christ; but the influence of the crowd sailing along the stream of vanity and fashion, attracted many whom we thought had more moral courage and love of the truth, than to unite with them and neglect the worship of Jesus. My partner in life and I continued to meet by ourselves, having confidence in Him who hath promised, "Wherever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst." Though I did not possess ability to go forth to the highways and proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ, we could at least bear testimony for him, by showing forth his death on every Lord's day. At length brethren Mitchell and Griffin arrived in this district, and we were comforted and encouraged by their coming, but the nature of their pursuits being so unsettled and migratory, (being miners) they were prevented from meeting with us often. Then Sister Brown, from Linlithgow, and another sister, arrived, who have ever remained faithful to the cause of our Lord and Master. We have had several additions since, and we now number ten members in all. Several of our number are located at some distance from Beechworth, and cannot meet every first day with us, but they come as often as they conveniently can, and we endeavour, as a body, to exert our feeble efforts to promote each other's spiritual welfare, and make known to those around us the love of Christ to poor sinners. We enjoy uninterrupted peace and harmony among ourselves, and pray for the prosperity of truth and righteousness in the world. We have hope that there are a few enquiring, and that we may soon have cheering news to communicate regarding the advancement of the cause of the Lord amongst us.

True disciples of the Lord Jesus, who have landed in these young colonies in search of a home, and with a view of bettering their worldly condition, find themselves placed in a very trying position; indeed, had they any correct prior knowledge of the social, moral, and spiritual state of these colonies, it is doubtful if the prospect, though much more bright and certain than it is, of acquiring a competency—would be a sufficient inducement to tempt them to forego the advantages of Christian association at home.

It is a lamentable fact that many, especially young Christians, have been disheartened and gone back to the world, through being entirely deprived of Christian society, and being thrown amongst the worldly and ungodly. I would, most earnestly, entreat all who intend leaving for these colonies, by all means, never—even under the most discouraging circumstances—neglect to meet together, though there should be but two—even let them be husband and wife—for the observance of Christ's ordinances on every Lord's day. No doubt God has a wise purpose to serve in scattering his children over the world; and oh! that we better understood our obligations and responsibilities, and were more faithful and enduring soldiers of the cross; and were enabled to diffuse great and glorious truths and principles which are the grand preserving elements of all nations.

Past history shows that it is no mineral resources, with a salubrious climate and prolific soil, that can make a people truly happy and prosperous.

Before I close this letter, I would avail myself of the opportunity to give a word of advice to those desirous of leaving their native land for these colonies; and foremost, I would beseech those who are married, Do not leave home unless you can bring your wives and families with you. I have seen some of the most painful results arising from this cause, while the rule, the married get on as well as the single here; but those who are comfortably settled at home, should on no account leave here. There are many classes not adapted for this country. An enterprising merchant may succeed, but the able hardworking man, who can plod on his way through many difficulties and hardships, is the most likely to succeed. Such a man, by industry, sobriety, and perseverance, obtain a more comfortable home here than he could ever hope to attain in the old country; in truth, there is no comparison between the prospects and position of the working class in these colonies, that of the working class in over-crowded Britain; for by patience and perseverance every industrious man may obtain a home upon the soil, and although he does not realise his full expectation of coming to these colonies, his family has many more advantages than at home.

In remitting to friends in Scotland, I have added a small mite for the Evans Fund, which Mr. Henderson will forward to you. Although we have many who need help, still I feel anxious to contribute in my mite with you, in the glorious work of proclaiming the love of God to perishing sinners in my mother land.

I have been suffering from impaired health for some time past, and it may be the all-wise dispensations of my Heavenly Father, who is too wise to err, and too good to be unkind, be found necessary for me to retire from the cares of business for a season, and return to my native home; and please the Lord to spare me, to return home. I hope to enjoy the happiness of paying a visit, for although personally unknown to me, still much beloved for your long and continuous works of faith, and labor of love. Oh! what a glorious hope; we shall meet again in that land where sin and sorrow shall never enter, and where we shall part no more. — I remain, dear brethren, your's in the blessed hope of immortality.

THE VOICE OF THE CHURCH ON HOLY BAPTISM.

THE above is, the not over modest, title of a somewhat remarkable lecture, delivered at St. Ann's Church, Manchester, by the Rev. Hugh Stowell, M.A. "The voice of the church." What church? As there is but one body of the Lord, one church, of which he is both the foundation and the builder, the church must be that one church. But no! Mr. Stowell sends us to the prayer-book, and the church, whose voice of uncertain sound he would have us to hear, is the church imposed by law established. But this is a remarkable lecture, containing truths which most Baptist ministers need to learn, and errors which all Christians should endeavour to overthrow. Hugh Stowell is an uncompromising Evangelical Anti-Papite, Anti-Tractarian, Anti-Maynooth, to the backbone. The Oxford school he will have naught to do with—baptism with him, as with the apostles, imparts no new life, changes not the heart, leaves the subject of it just where he was, unless he have repentance towards God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. "Indeed, did he but confine his teaching upon the use or purpose of baptism to adults, we would gladly pay over an annual subscription for the purpose of supporting him in a special mission to Baptist preachers, with a view to their much needed enlightenment in regard to the very ordinance from which they derive their name, and which, after all, they make less of than do the preachers of almost all other denominations. Mr. Stowell has no leaning to the Puseyite view, and as we hold with him entirely on this point, we have none. Thus he, ourselves, and the Baptists stand on common ground, but here they part from us, and we would send Hugh Stowell to instruct them. The rejected Tractarian view is set forth in the lecture by quotations following—

"I. The unsound notions advocated by Tractarian divines I shall but briefly bring forward; for, as you will perceive, our desire in the course of sermons begun on this occasion is not so much to expose error as to substantiate truth. In one of 'The Tracts for the Times,' written expressly on baptism, we find the following passage:—"This is our new birth, an actual birth of God, of water and of the Spirit, as we are actually born of our parents; herein, then, also are we justified, or both accounted and made righteous, since we are made members of Him who alone is righteous" (Pusey, on Baptism, p. 23.) Still more positively does the same writer express himself in a subsequent part of the same treatise: "But a commencement of life in Christ after baptism, a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness, at any other period than of that one introduction into Christ's covenant, is as little consonant with the general representations of the Holy Scriptures, as a commencement of natural life, long after our natural birth, is with the order of His providence" (Pusey, on Baptism, p. 28.) But as if even this language did not go far enough, he subsequently declares: "No change of heart, then, or of the affections, no repentance, however radical, no faith, no love, come up to the idea of this birth from above; it takes them all in and comprehends them all, but itself is more than all; it is not only the creation of a new heart, new affections, new desires, and as it were a new birth, but is an actual birth from above, or from God—a gift coming down from God, and given to faith through baptism; yet not the work of faith, but the operation of 'water and the Holy Spirit;' the Holy Spirit giving us a new life in the fountain opened by Him, and we being born therein of Him, even as our blessed and incarnate Lord was, according to the flesh, born of Him, in the Virgin's womb" (Pusey, on Baptism, p. 40.) To crown all, he quotes the following hymn from one of the old liturgies used on raising the child from the water as expressive of his own sentiment:—"Spread thy wings, holy church, and receive the gentle lamb which the Holy Spirit hath begotten of the waters of baptism; hail! thou new Lamb, Son, begotten of baptism, whom I have begotten of the waters in the name of the Trinity."

So much as showing what Mr. Stowell rejects, but a few words from his first page will shew that he by no means falls in with the Baptist notion which degrades baptism to a mere confession of faith, a badge of discipleship—

“Some in their zeal to magnify the ordinance of Christ—others in their anxiety to arm the priesthood with power; others in their wish to make the way to heaven easy, have confounded the sign with the grace which it signifies, and given to the institution the semblance of a material charm rather than of a reasonable and believing service. Recoiling from these extravagances, many have either set aside the institution altogether, or else, retaining the form, have degraded it into an unmeaning ceremony; a badge of discipleship, not a seal of grace. The minds of multitudes are utterly at sea as to the purpose, the nature, and the benefit of baptism.”

According to which, baptism is not a charm in which, or by which, the Holy Spirit changes the heart—yet at the same time it is not a mere badge of discipleship—the truth lies not in either of these extremes, but occupies a central position. Without vouching for every line thereof the subjoined is given, in which Mr. Stowell comes very near, if not quite to New Testament teaching.

“Alluding to the preservation of Noah and his family in the ark from perishing by water, the Apostle adduces that deliverance as beautifully typical of our salvation by Christ, and of baptism, as the expressive symbol of that salvation. ‘The like figure wherunto baptism doth now save us.’ Had he stopped here he would have seemed to countenance the idea that the outward ordinance (alone) saves; but, as if to guard against this error, and to make it clear that the ordinance never saves but when it is faithfully received—that it is the consummation rather than the cause of the new birth—he adds, ‘not the putting away of the filth of the flesh,’ that is, not the mere washing of the body from pollution by water, ‘but the answer of a good conscience toward God.’ His allusion is to that profession of faith which we find from Holy Scripture always preceded the reception of baptism; consequently, the efficacy of the ordinance is made to turn upon the truth and sincerity of the belief avouched, rather than on the due administration of the visible rite. The point thus brought out is of so much moment in this discussion that we will enlarge upon it a little, instead of adducing more of the texts relied upon by the advocates of absolute baptismal regeneration.

Let the instances of baptism which recorded in the Bible be fairly analysed and it will be found that repentance and faith are represented as preceding, rather than originating in the sacrament; as requisites, rather than as consequences. Repentance was to be deepened, faith confirmed, and both of them manifested in the laver of regeneration, neither of them was to be therein begun. But if repentance and faith are functions of spiritual life, and if spiritual life is the result of new birth through the Spirit, it follows that baptism is the bringing forth of the child of God into the bosom of the church, rather than the begetting and quickening of the babe in Christ; the complement, the commencement of regeneration. So Saint Paul teaches us, ‘With heart man believeth unto righteousness and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.’ Now, baptism is the believing man’s confession unto salvation. In support of this view, let it be remembered how St. Peter, on the day of Pentecost, exhorted those who asked what they must do—to ‘repent and’ (then) ‘be baptized;’ and how we are afterwards told ‘then they that received the word gladly were baptized.’”

Surely we shall not be called upon to shew in what this last quotation is in accordance with the Scriptures of truth. If, however, this is demanded, we need only say that they are one in at least the following particulars. Baptism saves—never when it is not faithfully received. It is the consummation rather than the cause of the new birth. Faith always preceded baptism—faith and repentance are pre-requisites, not consequences. To put the whole in one sentence, baptism translates those subjects into a new relation to Christ and his church, whose hearts have been previously changed by the belief of the truth, thus it is “into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.” Stowell next addresses himself to the task of showing that the Prayer Book is thoroughly in harmony with the conclusions. He says—

“Having, as we trust, fully brought out the teaching of our church on the subject under discussion, as recorded in her confessions of faith, we should next refer to her baptismal services; nothing doubtless but that they will be found to harmonize with her articles. Still reserving the case of infant baptism! it is to the order of the

tion for such as be of riper years we first invite your attention. Let it be noticed, in the outset, that the rubric requires that before the baptism of adults, the bishop shall be apprised of their desire to be baptized, and appoint some minister to attend to them, in order that due care may be taken for their examination, whether they be sufficiently instructed in the principles of the Christian religion, and in order that they may be exhorted "to prepare themselves with prayer and fasting for the receiving of this holy sacrament." The candidate being thus prepared, is required in the service to make a solemn profession of his repentance, faith, and steadfast purpose to keep the commandments of God. This profession is the very hinge of the ordinance—on the strength of it baptism is administered. It is the avowed entrance of the person into that covenant which baptism avouches and confirms. The church assumes his sincerity in making it—and if sincere, if he has the answer of a good conscience in the sponsions which he makes, the saving efficacy of his baptism is not to be mistrusted; but if insincere, impotent, and unbelieving, he receives the form, but lacks the power; the ordinance is neutralised, except in so far as it brings the professor under weightier obligations, consequently under heavier responsibility, and through his own unfaithfulness, under deeper guilt. The church assumes the sincerity of him whom she baptizes. Could she do otherwise? Could she do less without adjudging him a hypocrite? and if she had evidence of his hypocrisy, ought she not to shut him out altogether from her pale? Shall our church then be arraigned for pronouncing the baptized adult regenerate, and thanking God for his regeneration, after the care she has taken to insure his preparation, and assuming, as she does in charity, that he has been sincere in his profession, and has therefore "rightly received" the holy sacrament? Would her service be one of faith, hope, and charity if she did not on this wise express herself? She is only consistent in so doing; all her services are constructed on the same principle. They are framed for faithful penitents, not for faithless sinners. How else, indeed, could they have been framed! What prayers, confessions, or thanksgivings, could be drawn up for the unbelieving? She has the Holy Scripture for her model in going on this principle—for all the Apostolical Epistles, addressed to various churches, use similar language, and proceed on the same ground. Blame, then, the discipline of our church if you will, but blame not the spirit and tone of her baptismal and other services; the former has, indeed, fallen into sore laxity and decay, but the latter are scriptural, consistent, and full of faith."

On this we shall not comment further than to say—very plausible! and but for the fact that the same language stands in the Prayer Book applied to infants, who, if they are not "faithless sinners" cannot be "faithful penitents," we might admit a good case also made out for the Book of Common Prayer.

But what now can Hugh Stowell do with infant baptism? He declares baptism does not regenerate, and that New Testament baptism was always preceded by faith and repentance—that faith and repentance are pre-requisites, not consequences. Does he with the Irvingites tell us that infants can believe? No. Does he urge that Sponsors have faith for them? He does not. His attempt to make infant baptism stand upon the above principles must remain without attention on our part for another month, when, as we do not see the like every day, we intend some further notice.

PREACHING AND PREACHERS.

BAPTIST.—I have heard in your discourses, and seen in your papers, expressions of dissatisfaction with modern preaching and preachers. I am, however, not fully informed, as to what you consider should be demanded, in order to perfection. Do you consider that the preachers of your own party are up to the mark?

EVANGELIST.—The Acts of the Apostles supply numerous faultless, if not perfect examples, and our wisdom is to study and imitate them. You will do better to look to that book for a standard than to our writings.

BAP.—What mean you by saying "faultless, if not perfect, examples? Is not that which is faultless perfect?"

EVAN.—I mean that those examples are recorded as models, and as the preachers and historians were inspired, they are faultless, and, as far as they go, perfect; but as we have classes to instruct which did not then exist, and errors and omissions to correct which those preachers never heard of, we at times find it requisite to defend what was never then questioned, and to plead for what was never omitted; and hence were we to take the apostolic sermons as containing all that we require to say, some important items of modern growth would escape attention.

BAP.—As an illustration, I may allude to a discourse of your's to which I recently listened. The Apostles preached Jesus and the resurrection, you preached baptism in water—their theme seems to have been Jesus, your's immersion in water—they insisted that no other name is given by which a sinner can be saved, you that unless a sinner is baptized, he cannot enter the church. Now as a Baptist, it struck me that you could have been better employed, and that certainly you could not find an apostolic mould in which your sermon has been cast.

EVAN.—Have you heard me on other occasions? If you have, I would ask whether the discourse just alluded to is intended by you to describe my general preaching?

BAP.—Certainly not. I have heard you several times, and your subjects have been Christ and sinners, salvation and judgment. I only allude to the one discourse, thinking you may occasionally deliver such, and feeling that in no instance on record did the Apostles say so much about water.

EVAN.—Very good! With your explanation you may take the instance selected by yourself, as a very fair illustration of my meaning. You know we have now to deal with men who believe the Gospel facts, but who set aside the Lord's ordinances—you know they are not few in number, and that by subtlety they strive to draw away disciples after them. The Apostles never met with such men; they did not combat this error because it did not exist, while some things they had to contend against have no existence with us. Our duty then is to hold up Christ to all as the sinner's only hope, and also to combat those forms of evil which now oppose the truth.

BAP.—But in doing the latter you meet with opposition on every hand—in the street, in the pulpit, on the platform, and by the press—and are you not in great danger of giving excessive attention here to the neglect of the cross?

EVAN.—Certainly! The danger is very considerable, but dangerous work must not be given up merely because it is dangerous. It can be done while Lord is supreme in the heart and in speech, and therefore to leave it undone would be unfaithfulness. We must tend for the faith, and for every disappointment. We must watch, pray, and the Lord will keep us.

BAP.—I cannot dispute your position, I may, however, say, would it not be better that you caution your brethren against this danger, rather than fault with modern preaching?

EVAN.—We should do both. I confess you seem to have a tendency to do only one thing out of two, when both should be done; and you imply that we do not caution our brethren, perhaps know not how often we do so in words like those which I happen to be able to read you from a recent issue of one of our periodicals—we do so, which may not have been intended for ourselves only, but which certainly was not designed to exclude us. They read thus:—"There is need of much more plain, pungent, and scriptural preaching of the gospel among us. Many are now in the business of preaching, rather preach themselves than the Lord Jesus. In many communities there is much more preaching on the ordinances of the gospel and the theory of salvation, than there is of presenting and pressing the claims of the Son of God on the souls of the hearers. The former course makes theorists and professors; the latter brings men to Christ and makes them CHRISTIANS. One corrects some errors, the other saves sinners. The one fills the converts with criticism and debate; the other brings into the soul the spirit of Christ. I am probably not unjust to declare that theorizing, speculative, opinionative courses are alarmingly abundant, while the ineffable glories of the crucified Redeemer, the love of God, the condescension and humiliation of the Holy One, his sufferings for our sins, and resurrection for our justification, themes so appropriate and full of mercy to man, are less frequently the subject of discussion and appeal."

BAP.—I quite agree. I therefore understand that if preaching the ordinances of Christianity and a theory of salvation makes theorists and professors, while preaching Christ makes Christians, then you ought not to preach the former, and—

EVAN.—I beg pardon! This is your mistake repeated—the one is to be done, and the other not left undone. It is a question of degree. A man may be Christian and full of ordinances and the philosophy of the plan of salvation. Peter to the thousands on Pentecost, Paul to the jailor, and Philip to the eunuch, did not omit to give instruction upon and command baptism, and yet they been opposed by those who say, “Never mind this non-essential,” they would have confronted such perverters of the right way, as they did those who taught circumcision. They were set for the defence of the whole, but as it was with them, so it must be with us, Christ, the never-setting Sun, must be seen over all, the centre of attraction, the sinner-saving power.

BAP.—But I heard in one of your discourses something like a theory of spiritual influence—surely that was not preaching Christ.

EVAN.—I, at times, deliver discourses which I do not for one moment set forth as proclamations of the Gospel. At the same time I will say, that the theories of spiritual influence (orthodox and heterodox) promulgated on every hand, in season and out of season, never have, and never will, convert even one soul.

BAP.—Then surely your time is wasted when you set forth your theory.

EVAN.—If I exhibit the Holy Spirit's teaching upon the work of the Spirit in the conversion of sinners in place of preaching Christ, or make it the predominant theme, you are right. But I find a class of persons (not a small class) which the Apostles never had to do with—persons who weep on account of their sins—who believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God—who repent, and who go mourning all their days, unable to find assurance of pardon. Never did apostolic preaching produce one such case. What has produced thousands of such? False theories of “spiritual influence.” For the comfort of such, to rescue them from despair, and to fit them for usefulness, I feel compelled to examine their condition, bring forward the Scripture teaching which bears upon that condition, and surely Paul, Peter, James, and John (had such cases then existed, as now they do) would not have passed them without an attempt to deliver the sufferers from fear and bondage. We then require preachers who, while giving due attention to the ordinances of the Lord, and to theories which keep men from Christ and usefulness, will ever hold up the cross, the preaching of which was to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness, but which to the saved is the power and wisdom of God. We require workmen, living, spirit-stirring, light-shedding, love-diffusing, zeal-producing, fruit-bearing, sin-subduing workmen; yes, men whose minds are quickened by the electricity of heaven, and whose souls are expanded to overflowing with the Lord's life-message, which he asks his people to carry to all who dwell beneath the skies. Workers we must have—workers we must all be, or perish we certainly shall, as idlers ought. We need men who are gospelly robust and self-sacrificing, in whose hearts Christ dwells by faith, and who therefore are enabled to show Christ to others, and implant in the souls and affections of men what is deeply and abidingly implanted in themselves.

BAP.—I should like to put a few questions concerning the best method of obtaining such preachers. I understand our mode of making ministers does not suit you.

EVAN.—I will seek an early opportunity to converse with you on that point.

PEWS AND PULPITS.

THE following is from The Times of March 31, 1859:—

“Much scandal has been caused in New York by a great sale of pews, in the church of that popular preacher, the Rev. Hy. Ward Beecher, pastor of the Plymouth church, New York. A certain scale of upset prices was affixed to the pews, according to their situation and comfort, and those who offered the greatest amount of premium on that price were declared their owners for a year. The sale was a scene of great excitement, extravagant sums were given for the best pews, and the amount realized was 25,000 dollars. The chapel will hold about 8000 people—the numbers who seek to enter it every Sunday are estimated at 6,000, and one of the results of this mode of disposing of the pews is that 500 members of the church are excluded altogether. In reply to remonstrances Mr. Beecher writes—a church when it deals with material things is subject to just the same commercial laws as any other body—buying and selling in a church is just the same as in a store. Both should be honest and equitable, and if they are, it is all a sham to talk of a church being too sacred for worldly things. Whenever a church comes to that part of the business which is secular, and requires commercial wisdom, then it must stand fast like any other honest concern, subject to all the equitable laws of matter and money. The pews must be sold, and taxed or rented every year, and this must be done publicly, that all may have a chance; and if the pews are not much sought after there will be but little trouble and complaint. But if the pews are fewer than the applicants; if ten men want seats where but one can be accommodated, how are we to select which shall have them? Shall there be a perpetual scramble?—Then the strongest will get them—Shall they be rented privately? Then the alert and shrewd will get them—Shall they be rented openly and in fair competition? Then inevitably they must follow the commercial law—and the men who want them most and have the means of paying the most must have them."

And so Mr. Worldly-wise-man, in the person of that Mr. Beecher who says such cutting things on mere Sunday religion, worldliness, and the follies of our age, is content that 500 members of his church should be left without seats in their own temple, because unable to pay as much for them as richer neighbours are willing to bid. Yes, Mr. Beecher defends this state of things—he don't see how it could be otherwise without being worse. It has never occurred to him, that the first churches not only did not thus act, but that they did far better. Would not the weekly free-will offerings of the members sustain Mr. Beecher and keep open the house?

But if the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher does like the pew and its rent, he does not like the pulpit, and so far as it goes the following is as good as the above is bad:—

As to the pulpit, but one thing is usually considered necessary, and that is, that it should be put as far as possible from all sympathetic contact with the people to be influenced by it; that it should be so constructed as to take away from the speaker, as far as it can be done, every chance of exerting any influence upon those whom he addresses. Therefore, the pulpit is ribbed up on the sides, set back against the wall, where it looks like a barn-swallow's nest plastered on some beam. In this way the minister is as much as possible kept out of the people; and all that is left is his voice. Posture, full of gesture, motion, and that most effective of all gestures, the full form of an awkward man, from head to foot, right before the people, advance or retreat; in short, whole advantages which the body gains when thrown into arguments or positions, are lost without any equivalent gain. In this sacred mahogany tub or rectangular box, the man learns every kind of bodily awkwardness. He stands on one leg, crooks the other, like a slumbering bear at a hitching post; he leans now on one side of the cushion, or lolls on the other side. And when a man, thoroughly tired by one of these dungeon pulpits to rest his legs and feet as superfluous, except some awkward and uncouth way to crook him up to the level of his cushion and platform is brought out upon an open platform, amusing to watch the inconvenience to him of having legs at all, and his various experiments and blushing consideration of what he shall do with them! Is it a wonder that so little is done by preaching when, in a great church, with a small congregation, so scattered that no two touch each other, the bust of a man, peering above a bulwark, reads a stale manuscript to people, the nearest of whom is not more than twenty-five feet from him? The wonder is that anything is ever done. Dr. Webster is reported to have said, that a lawyer would risk his reputation before a jury if he had to speak from the pulpit, and that he considered the surviving of Christianity in spite of pulpits as one of the evidences of its divinity. We do not vouch for the truth of this as an anecdote, but we indorse it as a truth in philosophy.

But we object to the pulpit on a higher and higher ground—we object to the symbol of a system which says that the church, ONE is your teacher, and the Rev. Pastor placed over you, who people ye are, him shall ye hear at certain times; and though many among ye have teaching gifts, yet ye shall not use them, for your Rev. Pastor is the channel through which all your divinity comes. When, therefore, Mr. Beecher substitutes the state-chair and platform for (using the words of Webster) the tub-pulpit, we think the gain is small, and he must still be considered to stand with the pulpit-men who do not know what should be God's herald, but which in most cases becomes profitable lot of the self-styled ambassador whose people the occupants of the pews are understood to be. D. K.

CONFESSIONS OF A FOOLISH MAN.—No. IV.

"ANYTHING for peace and quietness." Yes — anything : error in doctrine, error in practice, error in the pulpit, or error in the pew. "Anything for peace and quietness." That pool has been long stagnant ; don't touch it, or your sense of smell will be offended. That family has been long let alone, don't meddle with it, lest there be a disturbance. That church has long neglected discipline—woe unto the man who dares to introduce it now.

You, Mr. Minister, who for five years have been toiling in that snug little village, know what I mean. When you have been musing over that old-fashioned Bible, and been down on your knees that you might better understand it, has't your eye sometimes been fixed upon a portion of it which, if put into practice to-morrow, would to-morrow dim your prospects, and cause Mr. So-and-so to be wrathful with you ? And when you have heard the prattle of the little ones outside, your heart has sunk within you, and you have said to yourself, "What's to become of them, if I get unseated here ?"

"Anything for peace and quietness." Yes ; there's that church which twelve years since numbered 300 members—look over its register. That gloomy word "dead," you may write against many a name : gone are these to the last account. But where are they who though now living, never come to worship ? "Backslider," you may go on writing against a multitude of these. Have they been visited at all ? Were they brought under the notice of the church when first they went astray ? Was the sin rebuked ? No, verily. It was unpleasant work. It might cause a stir amongst their friends. Each one had a small circle of acquaintance who might have been displeased had an investigation been made. And so, nothing was done ; the world has them now, and no man careth for their souls.

"Anything for peace and quietness." That young man has just left college—has just settled over a church. Certain things he believes, and certain things he disbelieves. He knows what the creed of the church is, of which he is the pastor. He reads his Bible ; he begins to test his old notions by the written word more closely than he has been wont to do. Daylight shines through the crevices, and he begins to take down the shutters. What's the matter now ? Why he has begun to preach and to teach publicly what he has learnt ; and of course the straight-laced lovers of the old creed don't like it. There's whispering amongst them. There's talk of "this won't do." And so, earnest truth-seeking is put a stop to—the fear of being called heterodox arrests him in his course—the chapel-deeds where the creed is written must be his Bible rather than the Word of God. If he pray for Divine enlightenment, the prayer itself is prejudiced ; and instead of spiritual progress in knowledge and love, it becomes with him a stereotyped "as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be."

"Anything for peace and quietness." Yes, we have seen much of this — too much. Peace is a grand and glorious thing, and every true-hearted disciple of the Lord will pray for peace in Zion. But where truth is dishonoured—where right is not observed—where there is truckling and winking at iniquity—where there is the lack of an honest avowal of convictions come to by a diligent study of "the lively oracles"—where these and like things are paid for peace, the price is too high, and the bargain is a bad one.

No ! not anything for peace and quietness : not truth. "First pure, then peaceable," is the wisdom that is from above. Would Paul give way to the "false brethren" for the sake of peace ? "To whom," saith he, "we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour ; that the truth of the Gospel might continue with you" (Gal. ii. 45.)

A word to the wise is enough. Have pity, all ye church members, for preachers who, like my friend Joseph, are sorely tempted to come to the fatal conclusion, "Anything for the sake of peace and quietness." I shall give you more of the detail in my next, and shall then show how Joseph smarted because he could not be brought to say, "First, peaceable."

OUR SAVIOUR.

WERE I, dear reader, to place before you the portrait of a being of calm and benignant mien, his countenance pale by nightly vigils and protracted fasts, and bearing the traces of many sorrows and many griefs; his eye so mild, expressing the very depths of pity, compassion, and love, and yet so powerful that its glance strikes deep into the heart, and fathoms the thoughts of sin which lurk in its recesses; and then, that form so striking clothed in purple, that head crowned with thorns, that hand so gentle bearing a reed; and were I to ask you whom this portrayed, would not the response spontaneously arise, Our Saviour? But have you ever weighed these wondrous words? When used by you, they imply your recognition of him as your Saviour; they imply that you have repented of your ways, and fled to him for refuge; that you have abhorred your sins, and joyfully accepted his righteousness; that you have despaired of any other help, and have laid hold of salvation,

"So sweet, so full, so free."

But is it so? Has the wondrous love of God touched your heart? Is the salvation which Christ has procured by the sacrifice of himself, your salvation? Is the righteousness which he has perfected, your righteousness, and can you indeed approach the Father through him? Have you laid your burden of sins on him, and received his promised rest? Have you rallied round the standard of the cross, and enrolled yourself among his disciples? Have you been baptised into his death, and have you risen with him to newness of life? Is Jesus your hope, your life, your all? If so, then he is indeed your Saviour, for he is able to save unto the uttermost all that come to God by him.

Oh! remember that purple robe, that crown of thorns, that bloody sweat, that dreadful cross! Was ever love like this, that God's own Son should die for you—that he who had done no sin should become sin for us, and bear our sins on the accursed tree. Oh! ponder these things and say, shall they be in vain? Will you despise this love? Will you neglect this great salvation, thus dearly purchased, by the life of the Son of God? Will you esteem as nothing that righteousness through which alone you acceptably approach the Father?

But remember, it is one thing Jesus to have died for the sins of the world, and another for us to profit that death. Blessed be God, his death has made a full and perfect provision for all; but to be partakers in accruing reconciliation, we must hold of it—we must embrace it. We must flee to Christ, believe in him, love him to the end.

Dear reader, these words are written to deter you from calling your Saviour, (for it is a delightful title) but that you may prove him in deed and in truth. T. D. V.

SCRIPTURAL CHRISTIANITY.

1. Scriptural Christianity has one creed—the faith of the Lord Jesus Christ; i. e. a personal belief in Him as revealed in the Scriptures; so that God has left men to compile a creed for themselves or others.

2. Scriptural Christianity acknowledges but one name, that of Jesus Christ, in which his disciples are called and distinguished; and at which the universe must bow; it reprobates all party names or denominations, and enjoins the faithful not to recognize them.

3. Scriptural Christianity requires of believers in the Lord to confess His name with the mouth, and by immersion to enter the one Christian body or church.

4. Scriptural Christianity regards as members only such persons as partake of the service, worship, and privileges of the house of God, requires them to be faithful unto death, and prohibits them from religious fellowship with the converted or disobedient.

5. Scriptural Christianity recognizes the whole body of the disciples as comprising the ministry or clergy; requires of each member, according to gift, grace, and opportunity, to fulfil his official duty; and warns against the encroachments of a man-made ministry.

6. Scriptural Christianity shows the order for all the churches everywhere, and through all time, by which, on the first of the week, the disciples meet for the breaking of bread, the fellowship contribution, the worship of God by prayer and praise, and mutual edification by reading, teaching, and exhorting one another from the Word.

ITEMS OF NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM.

During the present month we have added three by immersion. Various are the indications of the power of truth—the waters move where persons concerned wish them to remain quite still. The bringing together in a few months of about 70 disciples to worship according to the primitive order, and to contend for the same, is not the work accomplished by the truth we have proclaimed in this town, but only a portion of it. It is the immediately apparent portion only. Several churches, or the pastors of them, find certain awkward enquiries and requests urged by members who don't seem easily put off, and great caution is inculcated in regard to persons "whose business it is to disturb churches." In almost every instance the pew is in advance of the pulpit; some of the people would move—the minister is the obstrusive. There is, however, in Birmingham, at least one honorable exception—one instance in which the minister will not keep back what he holds to be God's truth, from fear of personal loss. Those of the readers of the Harbinger who have seen a sermon by S. J. Chew, entitled, "The Lord's Supper and the Lord's day; the one as often as the other," will not be at a loss to guess the person we allude to, more especially as they have been informed that the church in Bond Street, of which he is minister, has restored the Lord's Table to the position it occupied in the primitive church. Though Mr. Chew may be said to have consented to all the demands we make, when with the Bible in our hands we plead for a restoration of the faith and order delivered by the apostles, he has felt it his duty to retain his connection with the church in Bond Street, so long as they would hear what the Word of the Lord says on those points in which the Baptist sects differ from the Apostolic church. His reasons for this conclusion were quite valid.

1. They are all immersed believers.
2. They have adopted the weekly commemoration of the Lord's death.
3. He has been instrumental in adding to the church, in a few months, over 200 members, chiefly by immersion.
4. They are willing, for the most part, to hear the truth.

Of late, however, powerful and un-Christ-like opposition has been manifested, peace seemed to have departed, and little, if any, prospect of carrying on the Lord's work to the conversion of sinners and the edification of saints remained. Under these circumstances he felt called upon to place his resignation in the hands of the deacons, and to avow his intention to become a member of and worker with the church in Cherry-street—an announcement which left the impression general that a large majority of the church would at the same time leave. We, however, are not sorry to be able to add, that such a step is not now requisite. It ever gives us more pleasure to find a church resolving to hear the truth, and promising to be guided by the Divine Word only, than to see a number of its members coming out because it will not do so. The remaining facts are these. A large majority requested Mr. Chew to withdraw his resignation, to which request he replied in the following words, and by requiring that certain disorderly walkers should be at once withdrawn from:—

"I thank you, my friends, for your soliciting me by a large majority to withdraw my resignation.

My answer to that request will depend upon your reply to the statements and enquiries I shall now bring before you.

My more recent investigation of the Word of God has convinced me, that in the sayings and writings of Christ and his Apostles, the following things are taught:

1. That in every Christian church, after the model of the New Testament, and completely organized, there will be a body of elders, whose work it shall be to preside over the church. And that those senior brethren who possess the qualifications laid down in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus, should be put into such office.

2. That baptism was administered to every penitent believer upon the ground of his confession, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God; and that such an one was immersed upon the first opportunity after such confession.

3. That disorderly walkers are to be admonished to repentance, and means earnestly and affectionately used to bring them to consistency of conduct and of spirit—but that if these fail, the command is to us to withdraw ourselves from them.

4. That there was an opportunity afforded in the primitive churches for mutual exhortation and teaching. All was not left for one man to do.

5. That faith and obedience are necessary to acceptable worship, and that it is injurious to do anything which would naturally tend to encourage the notion, that without faith it is possible to please God. Being convinced of this, I could not sanction the engagement of any one who is not a Christian in the singing of praise.

6. That the Word of God is a sufficient guide of faith and practice, without the use of man-made creeds; and that the making of subscription to any creed framed in human language rather than Divine, a term of membership—or a refusal to subscribe such creed a ground of expulsion, is disallowed and tends to schism.

7. That there is no authority for pew-rents. Moreover, that the distinctions between rich and poor which this system necessarily creates, are strictly prohibited. If upon the giving up of pew-rents the income were to fall short, I would be content to be the sufferer; but my own conviction is, that where love is, there will be no diminution of supply, though all rested upon free-will offerings.

8. That the existence of sects is a sore evil, and that the true bond of union is the grand creed-truth of Christianity, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God;" and that "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," is to be kept through an acknowledgment of "one body and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all" (Eph. iv. 3, 6.)

9. That the work of the evangelist, or preacher, is to proclaim the Gospel, to seek the conversion of sinners, and to do all that his other opportunities and talents will allow him for teaching, and building up the church.

10. That the work of deacons is to attend to the temporalities of the church.

11. That the existence of denominational bickerings is greatly owing to the party names which are in use; and that the designation, "church of Christ," ought to be enough.

This is my statement of the order of things that ought to be. I do not ask you to endorse it now. What I wish to ask you is this—Are you willing to be instructed in the New Testament order? Will you leave your minds open to conviction? And when thus convinced, will you obey?

I know not how long an instruction you would require. As to the matter of dealing with disorderly walkers, possibly you are enough convinced already to begin in any clear case to act. I do not wish you to make this a personal thing. 'Tis willingness to learn of God and to obey; or 'tis unwillingness and disobedience.

It has been told me how under previous pastorates contentions and divisions have been common in this church. These are the almost certain fruit of existing deviations from the Divine order of things, and I am persuaded that strifes will still be here, if you come not to the Word of God.

Should I be the instrument in the Lord's hands of bringing about such a reformation as He would accept, I could then continue to labor amongst you as an Evangelist, or Proclaimer of the Gospel; but in event of the obstacles being too great, course only is open to me, that of retiring from this church, and from all church not in submission to the Divine will. I have labored in hope and fear until he departed, and I saw no prospect of a successful issue; and therefore you receive the notice of my intention to terminate connection.

It has, however, been urged upon me that it cannot be the path of duty to separate myself from a majority so considerable, who seem willing to be guided by the Word of God. To this in some measure my heart responds.

If, then, you are willing, without sinning or tolerating un-Christ-like temper, to bring into practice the teachings of Christ and his Apostles, so soon as you are instructed and convinced, I will withdraw my resignation. I will then labor on amongst you, hoping that you will be specially careful to do nothing that might injure the lambs of the fold.

My first question is—Are you prepared to receive instruction from the New Testament on matters of church government in order, and will you so soon as you are convinced practically obey?"

To this question an immense majority immediately consented, then the disorderly walkers were convicted and cut off. Mr. Chew consented to remain, in order to do the work of an evangelist in that church and neighbourhood. In the event of the church proving faithful to its promise, may long continue to do so—if otherwise we believe he will at once abandon it.

Mr. Chew preached last Lord's day amongst our brethren in Manchester, and also last week in Manchester and Wigan. Bro. King preached at Bond-street the last Lord's day.

CROSSGATES.

I have much pleasure in stating, that the church in this place is in a prosperous condition. We had an addition by immersion on the 17th instant, when the husband and one of our sisters joined the ranks of disciples. We have a goodly attendance of strangers, who appear to be earnestly seeking after the truth, as taught by the Lord and his Apostles; and I have no doubt that some of these will shortly follow the example of the above.

DUNDEE.

I have to report, that on the 14th of last month four young females were immersed and added to the church; and on the 5th of the present month four other females also made the good confession, and were added to the church in the appointed way, henceforth to walk in newness of life.—This is indeed refreshing to us.

April 15th, 1859. JAMES AINSLIE.

Public Debate between Mr. T. H. Milner and Mr. John Bowes, on Baptism, Justification, and The Second Advent.

This debate commenced on Tuesday evening, 29th March last, as announced by large placards throughout the town.—Alexander Easson, Esq. the chairman mutually chosen—a most honorable and talented gentleman—appeared on the platform about eight o'clock with the disputants and their committees. The Chairman having delivered a few introductory remarks to the large assembly convened, then read the propositions to be discussed, and introduced Mr. Milner to the meeting. He launched into the subject at once, without any prefatory remarks, and commenced to prove the truth of Proposition No. 1, by referring to the commission of the Messiah, as given by Matthew, Mark, and Luke—then to the Acts of the Apostles, where baptism is recorded, and also to the Apostolic Epistles, from which he endeavored to shew, in a most convincing manner, that baptism was a term or condition of forgiveness. His address was truly brilliant, and could not fail to rivet the attention of the audience—so logical, and therefore so conclusive. Mr. Bowes, instead of replying to the arguments advanced by Mr. Milner, commenced reading his defence, which was wholly made up of allusions to passages where faith is only mentioned, apparently wishing to make Scripture contradict Scripture, according to his interpretation of it. It appeared evident his aim was to evade, draw improper inferences, and make appeals to the feelings of the audience. But it would not do, as they felt it come under it. During the whole of the evening, he never made a formidable attack on Bro. M.'s opening address. We were not a little surprised to perceive that Mr. Bowes, the experienced debater, should have had his defence prepared beforehand, whatever arguments Bro. M. introduced in his opening speech. We did not expect this mode of warfare from one especially who is continually in debate, it appeared so very lame. The assembly was most orderly, and very attentive. Thus closed the first evening's debate.

On Wednesday evening Proposition 2 was discussed. Mr. Bowes commenced by recapitulating the arguments he advanced on Proposition 1, which amounted to this, that faith was the great thing required, and that the obedience of the faith, or baptism, was no term or condition whatever. He then commenced with chapter 4 of Bro. Milner's book to prove it unscriptural, but how complete the failure all witnessed.—Mr. B. first recommended it to the assembly, and wished them all to read it—then made some exceptions, and animadverted on them; but really it appeared to us he did not know well what to say on it; in substance his address aimed at justification by faith alone.—Mr. Milner, in reply, commenced recapitulating his arguments on the previous evening, and endeavored to demonstrate, in a most able manner, that while faith was absolutely necessary, baptism was equally so, being a positive ordinance, as exhibited from the passages of Scripture he adduced, to which Mr. Bowes had never formally replied. As a skillful logician, he exposed the fallacy of Mr. Bowes' arguments, which could not be gainsaid. Regarding chapter 4 of his book he said, that he felt at a loss how to reply to Mr. B. he having made no attack on it, but rather recommended it; and then endeavored to demonstrate, that no man could be justified by faith only, as the Apostle James amply testified—that faith without works was dead, being alone. At the same time he ably sustained the chapter which Mr. B. attempted to condemn. Such was the substance of the discussion this evening.

On Thursday evening Mr. Milner gave a short summary of the arguments on the previous evening, and then introduced Proposition 3, by commencing with the promise made to Abraham, that in him should all nations of the earth be blessed, (Gen. xxii. 18) evidently referring to the Deliverer who was then to come, even the Christ. Mr. M. then demonstrated that Jesus, at his second appearing, will not come to convert the world and introduce the Millennium, but to judge the world, as the following Scriptures testified—Rev. i. 8, Mat. xxv., John v. 28 and 29, 2 Thes. i. 7, 8, 9, 10, Jude i. 14, 15, &c. In the course of an eloquent speech he stated, that these quotations required no comment, and the audience could not but perceive their applicability to the question at issue.—Mr. Bowes, instead of replying to the arguments advanced by Mr. M. evaded them, and went away to Daniel and the Prophets, attempting to shew that the kingdom which the God of Heaven was to set up in the days of the four great monarchies, was not yet properly established, and would not be until Jesus returned to reign in Jerusalem with his ancients gloriously. It appeared to us that Mr. B.

never came up to the proper point during the evening, though pressed on often by Mr. M. to do so. Mr. Bowes never had a better opportunity to demonstrate his theory of a personal reign, but he evidently failed to do it.

The Chairman, at the close, thanked the audience for their patient and orderly conduct during the debate, after which the disputants moved a vote of thanks to the Chairman, for his able conduct in maintaining so good order throughout, which was carried by acclamation.

Two competent stenographers were employed to report the discussion, and as it will be published about the 18th of this month (April), we would recommend all the readers of the Harbinger to obtain a copy of it, which will amply repay a perusal. The price will not, I am informed, exceed 1s.

Such are a few brief hints concerning this debate, the full details of which may be seen in the report alluded to. A better arranged and conducted debate was never held in Scotland, or even in Great Britain.

A LOOKER-ON.

ST. HILIER, JERSEY.

Since writing you some four months ago, there have been changes and unpleasantness in the little cause here. The embers of discord and self-will amongst a few, the prevailing features, I am sorry to say, amongst the brethren, and which have in so many instances brought the holy profession into disrepute, lie at the foundation of it. After making several efforts at conciliation with the conflicting parties, but all in vain—for a few were for this party, others for the opposite one, and each determined to have his own way—several of us resolved, that as such strife would be detrimental to the cause, it would be better to open another place of meeting, and accordingly a chapel was obtained about a mile from the old one, which will seat some 250 persons. Mr Burt is the pastor, and he is a brother of much self-denial and earnestness in the cause of our Lord and Master, and a most effective proclaimer of the truth. Our meetings are very good, from 60 to 90 attending, and on the 10th we had 130 present. A fortnight ago four persons made the good confession and were baptized, on which occasion the chapel was crowded, and an excellent discourse delivered on believers' baptism. The cause is exciting inquiry here, and we expect more baptisms shortly, of which I will inform you.

Our meeting-house is in Hilary-street, near St. Saviour's-road, St. Hilier.

MANCHESTER.

Although you do not frequently hear from us, yet you must not on that account conclude that we are in a dormant state. It is quite true that, considering our numbers, we may seem apathetic. Since commencement of the new year nine of us saved have been added to the church, two united with us from the Baptists, having seen the way of the Lord more perfectly. During last week we had the pleasure of a visit from Mr. Sanders J. Chew, a Baptist minister of Birmingham, who has you are aware, latterly given some attention to the "ancient order of things." On Lord's day, 17th, he broke the loaf with us when he took occasion to specially address the church from these emphatic words, "Buy the truth and sell it not." From this address we could perceive the leading and workings of his own mind, and the struggles that had set in; evidently speaking from the heart, it reached the hearts of others, and we should hope, confirmed the faith of some. All the brethren who possibly could get out were present. On the evening of the same day we had our meeting room crowded, many having to stand. After our devotional exercises Mr. Chew addressed the meeting, his subject being "Apostolic Preaching, in what did it consist?" It was not a dry sermon, but the old fashioned kind of preaching which we gather from the Acts of the Apostles calculated to reach the sinner's heart; setting forth the great central truth that Jesus is the Christ, the love of God in the gift of his Son, and the conditions of faith, repentance, and baptism, in order to the enjoyment of the remission of past sins. He touched each item with a vigorous hand, and dealt a well directed stroke at that pernicious doctrine, Non-essentialism. We expect some fruit to spring out of this address. Several had conversation with him afterwards. On the following evening, Monday, the 18th, Mr. Chew again spoke in our meeting-room, the subject being "Christianity as it is."—He took a rapid glance at the more prominent and popular religious errors, and freely used the dissecting knife: he gave a peep behind the scenes, and showed that the boasted union of the Protestant Dissenting Sects was but a rope of sand. Political and other meetings in the city somewhat interfered with ours. On the Wednesday evening following, however, we had a good gathering, when Mr. Chew again spoke on the subject, "Christianity as it was"—a remedy for popular religious errors. In this lecture he was exceedingly happy and dwelt at length on what foundation

Christian union alone could be based—that party names, and sects, and creeds must be uprooted, and the seven golden pillars be the only stay, support, and sure foundation among Christians. On the next day several of us accompanied him to Wigan, and there he preached in the evening in the meeting-house of our brethren. The next day, called Good Friday, was made good use of; there was a meeting at eleven o'clock, and Mr. Chew preached to a goodly company, the meeting-house being well filled. He spoke very effectively, and at the conclusion three made the good confession. At three o'clock in the afternoon he addressed an out-door meeting in the Market-place; and at four in the afternoon there was tea in the school-room, after which, in the meeting-house above, there was an interesting service held, addresses being delivered by several brethren. Mr. Chew and Brother McDougal made earnest appeals, when two others made the good confession. All five went down into the water, and were baptized by Bro. Coop. Thus ended the service of the day.—Next morning (Saturday) we accompanied Mr. and Mrs. Chew to the station, on his return to the scene of his labors in Birmingham, with warm and prayerful aspirations that his life may long be spared to labor in his Master's cause, and to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. We trust hereafter to hear many good things done by this Baptist minister. We commend him to God, and earnestly exhort him to continue to buy the truth and sell it not.

NEWTOWN.

We are happy to report that this town is quite in a stir respecting the claims of Primitive Christianity.

In March, a lecture was delivered on The Causes of Infidelity, to a good audience, which seems to have quickened the apprehensions of divers sectarians, who troubled themselves to print and circulate an anonymous caricature of the lecturer and his sayings.

Hence, on the 7th inst. another lecture was delivered, expressly on Sectarianism: through the aid of our anonymous reviewers it was listened to with greater interest, and by a larger company—indeed, many could not find admission. At its close, a lively discussion ensued, which will be found faithfully reported in the following report, sent (no doubt by its correspondent) to the Shrewsbury Chronicle of the 15th inst.

“LECTURE ON SECTARIANISM.—On Thursday evening, a lecture upon the above subject was delivered in the large room, Unicorn Inn, by Mr. J. B. Rotherham, minister of the Primitive Christian Society. Mr. Evans, of Penrallt, near Llanidloes, was voted to the chair. After an address of considerable length by the chairman, in which the peculiar views of his party were brought forward, Mr. Rotherham proceeded to deliver his lecture, the object of which, and the line of argument adduced may be inferred from the lecturer's own syllabus, ‘A Sect not Sectarian—a confederation of sects not unsectarian—a return to the faith delivered to the saints, the means of a permanent Christian Union.’ Discussion being invited at the close, Mr. J. Bevan put a series of questions to the lecturer, touching some of the more prominent views urged by him, to which Mr. Rotherham replied with considerable tact and ability. Ultimately, it was proposed to defer the proceedings for a time. Another lecture is to be given by Mr. Rotherham upon the evils of sectarianism, and with the same liberty as at the close of the preceding lecture.”

The intention expressed in the last sentence of this excerpt has been modified, so as to give birth to the following notice, now being published:—

“Public Discussion on the Evils of Sectarianism, in the Public Rooms, Newtown.—A public discussion, on the above subject, will (D.V.) take place in the Public Rooms, Newtown, on Thursday, April 23rd, between Mr. J. B. Rotherham and Mr. John Bevan. To commence at half-past seven o'clock.—Mr. Rotherham will affirm, and Mr. John Bevan deny, the following proposition:—‘That Sectarianism, as such, is essentially evil.’—Moderators, Mr. Ed. Evans and Mr. Ed. Stephens.—Admission free.”

A report next month.

FILTDOWN.

The visit of Bro. Wallis, on the 13th of March, did us much good; all the brethren were rejoiced to see his face in the flesh. It revived and encouraged us, and we hope that by this time he is restored to health, to assist in carrying forward the cause of our Redeemer. It is a pleasure to inform you, that we added one to our band of believers, and others are inquiring as to the way of salvation.

Uckfield, April 18, 1859.

WIGAN.

We have great pleasure in informing the brethren, that the work of the Lord still continues to prosper amongst us. Since our last communication through the Harbinger, 11 persons have been united to Christ by baptism, three of whom have been attending the meetings of the brethren at Newtown.

Last Thursday, April 21, and Good Friday, April 22, we were favoured with a visit from our excellent Brother S. J. Chew, of Birmingham, whose addresses were listened to with great attention.

After his address on Good Friday morning, three of the above-named persons rose and confessed their faith in Christ, and were baptized. And in the evening two others followed their example, and were buried with Christ by baptism, and we trust have all risen with him to walk in newness of life.

NEWS FROM VICTORIA.

PRAHRAN.

The church of disciples in this town is enjoying peace and growing in the knowledge and love of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ. During the past year we had 18 additions, 9 from other churches, and 9 by immersion. 2 brethren have removed to other parts of the colony. We now number 32, 3 of whom are temporarily absent. Several brethren are useful in proclaiming the good news, both in-doors and out. During the past year the gospel trumpet has been frequently sounded on the beach at St. Kilda, and lately we have commenced holding open-air meetings in the afternoon at Mount Erica, in this neighborhood. Our meetings at the Mechanics' Institute (the place in which we worship) are well attended, morning and evening, and our prospects are good. The Baptists are very kind to us, in granting us the use of their baptistery when we require it.

SOUTH BRIGHTON, MOORABBIN.

During the past nine months, evangelical labors on Lord's days have been carried on in this place; for the first three months by Bro. Service, of Melbourne, and Bros. Picton and Coles, of Prahran, alternately; and since then, and up to the present time, by Bros. Kidner, Picton, and Coles. A church was formed contemporaneously with the commencement of the effort. Brother Walker, Brother and Sister Keir, and Bro. Penny, formed the nucleus around which others have gathered, and now this happy and united church numbers 14 members.

MORDIALLOC

is about four or five miles from South Brighton. The brethren have commenced laboring in the fishing village in this large and thinly populated district, which has been in a state of spiritual destitution. The meetings are held in the open air, beneath a shady tree, on Lord's day afternoons.—Our first meeting was on the 26th December instant, when Bro. Coles addressed a rather numerous gathering from the words of the Saviour, "Come unto me all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." The following brethren have engaged to assist in carrying on this good and most desirable work:—Bro. Walker, of South Brighton; Bro. Burt, of Melbourne; and Bros. Kidner, Picton, and Willder, of Prahran, the latter formerly of Geelong.—May the Lord sustain His servants, that their labors may be instrumental in making this desert rejoice and blossom as the rose.

OBITUARIES.

On Monday, the 4th instant, our aged and beloved sister, MARY BARRIE, fell asleep in Jesus, in the blessed hope of a glorious resurrection to immortality and eternal life. Our departed sister was a punctilious attendant at the institution of the Lord's house, and even a fortnight before her death, when in a very weak state, she was present with the saints at the breaking of bread in commemoration of Jesus. The Gospel of Christ was her favorite theme, and her mind was richly stored with its sacred truths. She was ever ready to converse on religious subjects, having known the Scriptures from her early days. Our sister made the good confession on the 13th February, 1840, after hearing the apostle's gospel proclaimed by our esteemed Brother Reed. Her sufferings were borne with Christian resignation, for the hope of immortality, through a risen and exalted Saviour, supported her in the last moments of earthly existence, and her end was truly peaceful. She went down to the grave like a shock of corn fully ripe, and fondly hope has entered the presence of Jesus.

"Where the saints of all ages in harmony meet Their Saviour and brethren transported to greet
While the anthems of rapture unceasingly roll,
And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul."

I have also to record the death of Sister DAVIDSON, aged 80 years, who, after a protracted illness, died in the fulness of joy and a desire to be with her Lord. Our sister was consistent in her walk and conversation, holding fast the profession of her faith to the end.

It is also my painful duty to announce the death of a son of our beloved brother Robert Clark, on the 4th instant, in the 19th year of his age, after a long affliction. He was an amiable young man, and was to have been immersed had he lived. Some time since our Bro. Clark lost his loved partner, a sister, after a long illness borne with resignation to the will of his Heavenly Father; after exhorting her family to follow in the footsteps of Jesus, she died in full assurance of a joyful resurrection. May the Lord strengthen our brother, under his heavy trials, for the discharge of those duties which a numerous family claim at his hands.

THE ANXIOUS SEAT AND ALTAR.—No. I.

BY A MINISTER.

WHATEVER is not as old as the New Testament is of no authority in the church, and must be regarded as an innovation. Only "that which was from the beginning" is worthy of our fellowship and esteem. It is with some reluctance, that we write on the subject that forms the caption of this work; not because we have any doubts in regard to the views we shall present and defend: but for fear, lest we may be misunderstood, and may be regarded as one who, with sacrilegious hands, would touch what is deemed both sacred and divine.

In order, then, that we may not be misapprehended, we may at once state that prayer is a most invaluable blessing, an important duty, a divine command, and an inestimable privilege. Without it there is no piety, no life in the Christian. Only while we pray, we live. Many promises and encouragements are given us in the Old Testament and in the New, in reference to prayer; and among the men of faith, under any past dispensation, this was one of their chief characteristics, that they "prayed always."

What has not prayer done? Its power and privilege surpass all belief! It would have quenched the fires of heaven over Sodom and Gomorrah, if ten righteous men could have been found in those cities. Its "cry" divided the waters of the Red Sea, by the wonder-working rod of Moses. It occasioned "all the goodness of God" to pass before this eminent servant of the Most High. It arrested the wing of pestilence on its way to destroy the rebellious nation of Israel, and converted the vengeance of God into mercy and clemency. "I have pardoned," said God to Moses, "according to thy word."

It opened the all-devouring earth, that Korah and his men, his goods and houses, might "go down alive into the pit." It stayed the plague, between "the dead and the living," when Aaron swayed the censer (of prayer) with fire from off the altar. It shut up heaven for the space of three years and a half—and Elijah "prayed again, and the heaven gave rain and the earth brought forth his fruit." It has stopped the Sun and Moon in their orbits. It once sent an angel to breathe into the camp of the Assyrians, and there was left dead on the ground a hundred, fourscore, and five thousand. It brought back the shadow on the dial of Ahaz ten degrees. It turned the captivity of Job, and gave him twice as much as he had before. Under the influence of faith, it has subdued kingdoms—obtained promises—stopped the mouths of lions—quenched the violence of fire—turned to flight the armies of the aliens. Prayer has raised the dead: and from the lips of the crucified One brought pardon to his murderers. Prayer anticipated the wonders of Pentecost—the sound of the rushing mighty wind—the immersion in the Spirit—the cloven tongues of fire—and the gifts that followed. And the gathering of that great and only Pentecostal harvest was due to its power. From the lips of Stephen, prayer raised to his feet from the throne the admiring and merciful Redeemer. It brought the kingdom "like a great sheet, knit at the four corners," to the family of Cornelius. It sent an angel to the Herodian prison—opened iron gates—dissolved old and rusty chains—and brought deliverance to the Apostle Peter. It has "shaken" the houses in which disciples have met—and filled them with the Holy Spirit.

It is not necessary to give special examples, however, of the power of prayer, as every page of the Bible will furnish them. Our object is to place this subject in its true attitude and relations, and to point out and expose the departure from apostolic usage, as found in the house of God. This duty we deem to be important at the present time, when abuses so enormous have crept into the Christian church, and when each one thinks himself authorised to adopt any expedient to accomplish his ends and increase his converts, independent of the will of God, as expressed in the divine oracles.

We shall examine a sufficient number of cases found in the Bible to show that the anxious seat, mourning bench and wooden altar, have had no place among the Patriarchs, Israelites, or Christians of the olden times. If they fulfilled the divine commands, and received for themselves and others all that was contemplated by a life of faith and prayer, then these modern appendages may well be dispensed with, inasmuch as they are not only unauthorised, but are offered as substitutes for the ordinances of Christ!

In the first seventeen centuries in the history of our race, from Abel until the flood, no mention is made of any one of these appliances. And yet there must have been many persons "anxious" about their souls—as, indeed, we learn that there were those then who feared the Lord, walked by faith, and called upon his name.

Mention, to be sure, is made of altars. There were altars of stone, and of earth—and in later periods altars of brass. But since the world began, God never authorised any one to make or erect an altar purely of wood. And therefore, if any are now erected, they have no sanction from him, either in the Old Testament or in the New. On this subject, God has been very specific. He has left us no discretion in regard either to the materials of which an altar shall be made, the manner of its construction or the uses to which it may be applied. Thus altars of stone, and of brass, and even of gold, are frequently referred to in the Old Testament; but never simply and alone of wood. This would have been a violation of all law precedent under both the Patriarchal and Jewish economies.

Altars, indeed, are most sacred things. They are of divine origin—they were sanctified with blood, and set apart for the highest duties of religion. The name of Jehovah was written upon the altar of burnt offerings: and those who came to it had the promise of meeting him and receiving a blessing at his hands. This was certain and infallible. It was not necessary to repeat the offerings: or to come again and again to be assured of the blessing; but every devout worshipper who came to the altar of the Lord was accepted and blessed. This was a law in Israel. How different from the wooden altar of man's device, now seen in religious chapels!—different in their construction and use, and equally different in regard to the blessings appended to them, and the certainty of getting them.

What a misnomer to call a foot-bench flanked by pillars and railings, and constructed of wood, surrounding the open space before the pulpit, an altar! Who gave the pattern? Who finished the design? Was it given on the mount? Such an altar was unknown to Abel, to Noah, to Abraham or to Aaron.

The heathen first made their altars of turf, then of stone or marble, and finally of wood and of horn, as those of Apollo in Delos. They were made in various forms: some round, others square, triangular; and all of them were placed towards the East, and stood lower than the statutes of the gods. These were adorned in various ways. Before temples were erected, altars were raised in groves, sometimes in the public highways, and on the tops of mountains. In the great temples at Rome, ordinary they had three altars; the first was placed in the sanctuary, at the foot of the statue of the divinity; the second was before the gate of the temple, upon which they sacrificed victims; and the third was a portable altar, upon which were put the offerings, gifts, and sacred vessels.

The altars of the Old Testament saints, at first were very rude. The altar that Jacob set at Bethel, was nothing but a stone, which probably served him as a pillow, on that night, when the vision of the ladder and the angels was seen by him. That of Gideon, a stone before his house; and the first which God commanded Moses to erect, was probably of earth or unpolished stone, without iron; any altar made of iron was considered base and impure.

The principal altars of the Jews, were the altar of incense, made of shittim wood, covered with plates of gold; one cubit in height, one in width, and two in breadth. On this, the officiating priest, morning and evening, offered incense of a fragrant odor, and of a particular composition. The altar of burnt-offerings was also made of shittim wood, covered with brass. This altar was placed in the open air in the court yard, that the smoke might not sully the tabernacle, and to fulfil an important idea in the typical service of the Jews.

Some have called the table of shew bread, covered with gold in the tabernacle, an altar. It is after this, that the communion tables, in modern churches, are sometimes called altars. In the first centuries of the Christian church, these were made of wood, so that they might be easily moved and carried from place to place. But the council of Paris, in 509, decreed that no altar should be made but of stone. At first there was but one of these altars in a church, but their numbers soon increased; and from the writings of Gregory the Great, who lived in the fifth century, we learn that there were sometimes even twelve or thirteen—an altar for each of the original apostles; and the last one for Paul!

In the Cathedral of Magdelburg there are now no less than forty-nine altars. I suppose that each of these fulfil some important idea in the Papal church.

But in none of these churches do we find any mention of such uncouth altars as are now so common in modern chapels, around which sinners kneel to "get religion," and to obtain pardon; and where communicants receive, at the hands of the preacher, the bread and wine of the supper! For such purposes, and with such services, no altars, Patriarchal or Jewish, were ever used; and in vain may we find in the New Testament any allusion, however, remote, to any such altars.

Incense was burnt on the golden altar in the sanctuary—and burnt-offerings were made on the brazen-altar in the court-yard; but altars, upon or around which any one was to kneel to obtain pardon, were unknown under the Jewish age. Besides which, all these appendages belonged to an age of types and symbols, in which materialistic things were used to appeal to the senses, and which should find their true meaning under the Christian dispensation.

FORMATION AND MAINTENANCE OF CHRISTIAN CHARACTER.

VERY few people seem to be aware—at least, as fully as they ought—of the importance of forming and maintaining Christian character, in order to be saved eternally in heaven, and become capacitated to enjoy its glories and happiness. And yet, according to the Bible, it is absolutely essential, and without it none can ever enter that blessed abode, much less possess and enjoy these. There are no promises to any others. What is the language of the Bible on the subject? "None but the pure in heart shall see God"—"Except a man be born again, he shall not see the kingdom of God"—"Without holiness, no man shall see the Lord"—"Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and enter through the gates into the city." To these we might add others, until we have "line upon line, and precept upon precept."

"If I can just get into heaven, it is all I ask," is the language we too generally hear. Now, suppose you could, with all your sins upon you, it could be no heaven to you—it would be a hell instead, for you would not be prepared to enjoy its society and the presence of God—you would not have formed the necessary character. As well could a wild savage Indian, or an ignorant Chinese, or a Hottentot, who were strangers to our language, manners, customs, &c. enjoy themselves in our society! The idea would be just as reasonable. Hence, a death-bed repentance, as Sterne says, "is a weak and slender plank to trust our all upon," for the plain and obvious reason that there is then no time to form a character for heaven. It is a most delusive thing, and yet there are thousands represented, after living in sin and wickedness all their lives, in the service of the D as being converted on a death—"professing a hope in Christ," going "straight home to heaven." What an awful deception and delusion! Are we to suppose, that after serving the Devil all their lives, God is going to accept the fig-end of their existence? "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth," is the divine command.

Reader, do you wish to be saved eternally in heaven, and to enjoy the society of God and Christ, and angels and archangels, and the "spirits of men made perfect?" Then you must form a character for it. If an alien to Christ, you must first become a child of God, by faith in him, and putting on in baptism. You "must be born of water and of the Spirit," by being "buried with Christ in baptism, rising to walk in newness of life." There is no other way, according to the Bible, for you to form this character. You must then maintain it by "daily growing in the knowledge and favour of Lord Jesus Christ." You must "be severe in well-doing, seeking for glory, honor, and immortality," that you may receive the reward of eternal life. Remember the admonition of the Spirit to one of the seven churches of Asia: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

ETERNAL LIFE.

WHAT can appear more paradoxical than this: to live, and yet be dead; to be dead, and yet to live? How difficult, how hard to be heard, was the word of the Messiah—"If a man keep my saying he shall not see death." Is it possible that a believer in Christ shall never die? Jesus said to Mary, "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; he that liveth and believeth in me, shall never die. Believest thou this?"—What sayest thou, kind reader? Believest thou that thou shalt never die? If thy faith is yet established, come, let us reason together.

We will visit first the garden of Gethsemane. Who is this, that is upon the ground and prays—"O Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me?" Why is it that he is in agony? Do you see that his sweat is not water, but blood? Great drops of blood falling, the ground? Can it be that he fears the suffering which his body must undergo, while upon the cross? Can the prospect of physical suffering account for this agony? The thieves, who suffered with him, are they enduring this intense agony in view of the cross? Where will you find an instance like this? It cannot be found. There is the Saviour of the world. He has come to the hour which he dreaded. The sins of the human family are laid upon him—and he suffers for man. He is about to become a curse for us, while he bears, in his body, our sins upon the tree of the cross. He is about to make his soul an offering for sin, and endure, in mind and body, that curse that is due to us. See, now, an angel comes and strengthens him; and he arises and goes to his disciples, and meets the traitor and his company of officers and men, who have come to take him. He is bound and carried to the High-priest. He is delivered to Pilate, and condemned to death. There is darkness over all the land, from the sixth till the ninth hour. Hear him, as he cries, “Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani!” What means this? Has God forsaken him? Yes! For he has become a curse for us: and God withdraws from him while he is a curse. Sin is upon him. Our sins are counted to him. He dies for us: and we can never die. He abolishes death. By his death he takes away death; and we live for ever in him. If he dies for us, we cannot die. Strange, would it be, that we should die after that he has suffered death for us. It cannot be that we shall ever die. We live because he lives.

But God had forsaken him only while the curse was upon him. The wages of sin is death. He has now endured the curse. He has discharged the debt. The curse is removed, and he rises, no longer cursed; but now, free from the curse, he is accepted of God, and offers himself to God, in the Holy of Holies in heaven. God accepts the offering, and we are free. We cannot die. “If any man will keep my saying, he shall never see death.” “He that believeth on me shall never die.” Do you believe this, reader? If you do not believe this, then do you believe that he has died for you? How, then, can you die? Do you think of the dissolution of soul and body, and conclude that this has been the lot of the Apostles and Prophets, and of all the followers of Christ, in all ages? And do you count this the death from which you are freed? If so, you labor under an error. The dissolution of soul and body is not the death from which you are freed. Nor was it the dissolution of soul and body that the Messiah so much dreaded. He was separated from God on account of sin. Inasmuch as he assumed our nature, and our sins were laid upon him, he must endure that which was due to sin—a separation from God, while he thus endured the curse. This is the death he underwent for sin. And as he took our sins upon him, and died for our sins, we are surely free from death, being free from sin, whose wages is death.

The Apostle to the Gentiles reasons thus—“The love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead.” The human family is dead. Christ died for them, that they might live. If all have died, there is a cause—the sin of our first parents. “In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die.” The fruit was eaten, and our parents died that very day. They were alienated in mind from God, and as proof of that alienation, that inward death, they hid themselves from Jehovah. Man has hid himself from God, from the day of transgression until now, being alienated in mind. Separation from God is the consequence of alienation. Mental alienation, or, if any one wishes, spiritual alienation, is the death that Adam died on the day on which he eat the fruit. His personal separation from God was a consequence of that alienation. His posterity have been, and are now, alienated from God; and hence, their personal separation from him. Sin is the cause of this. Sin is begotten in the spirit. This is spiritual alienation. Sin is brought forth in an act—and then follows a separation of ourselves, in person, from God. Adam died in the garden, and was driven out because he was thus spiritually separated from God.

But now, Christ has died for us, having taken our sins upon him, and endured that most terrible of sufferings, being forsaken of his God. What now constitutes the glad tidings of great joy? Christ has died for our sins. We believe in Christ, and live. We pass from death unto life. We shall not come into condemnation. "He that heareth my word, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." Jesus is that Eternal Life which was with the Father, but has been manifested to us. He came into the world in which darkness and death reigned without restraint. He is the true light, who, having come into the world, gives light to every man. As the Sun is the source of light and life to the natural world, so is Jesus the source of spiritual light and life to the spiritual world. Those who receive his truth are enlightened in mind, and warmed into life in spirit. The spirit of man, though an ever-active, ever-enduring, never perishing substance, is, as respects God, in a state of death. When the gospel is heard, which is the word of life, the spirit of man is made alive, begotten again, and by means of the word of life, has a new life imparted to it, by which it is enabled to enjoy the reign of God. The Spirit of God begets life in the human spirit by means of truth. On the part of the spirit of man, there is a conception of divine life, which, diffusing itself through the whole inward man, manifest itself in the production of fruit and righteousness. The divine life, which is imparted by the Spirit of God, is everlasting life which the Saviour promises to those who hear his word. The receiver of this life cannot die, provided he remains faithful to the Lord Messiah. He is alive, and his life is sustained by the Lord of life.

Now, if the dissolution of soul and body, which was endured by Jesus, and the death which he suffered for us, would follow that we could not survive thus; for we cannot endure that which he endured for us. We being under the power of death, he came and died for us, that we might be saved from the power in which we were held. He entered the prison-house, and broke its bars and set us free. Delivered from sin and death, we live to God in Christ.

To be, or to exist, is not to live. The human spirit will endure through the ages of ages. Yet, whether it lives or not, depends on its acceptance of eternal life, which God gives through the Messiah. To cease to be, is not to be found in the oracles of God. To perish or to be destroyed, is not to cease to be. "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." Yet Israel was in existence. The righteous perish, as Isaiah, and no man layeth it to heart. The righteous cannot cease to be. To be dead, is not to cease to be. Death is not non-existence. It is true that the Sadducees used the word in the sense of non-existence—for they denied the existence of spirits or angels. When men died, they ceased to exist, in that estimation. When the Saviour, in reply to a question put by them on the subject of the resurrection, quoted the words of Jehovah—"I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob;" he most pertinently added, "God is not the God of the dead." Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were dead in a Sadducean sense; that is, if they had no existence; then, it would follow that God is the God of nothing, or something not existing — which consequence was so obvious and so manifestly opposed to reason, that even the Sadducee was silenced by it. God, then, is the God of those who live; therefore, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob live; and as they live, they will again come forth to life.

But Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are among the dead. Then, the dead yet live; and being dead, is ceasing to be in a certain state or condition; in other words, death is a change of state. Dissolution of spirit and body, is the death to which we all tend. By this dissolution we enter another state of being.

It may be profitable here, to notice the style of the inspired writers. The distinction between the "me" and the "not me," is made broad and clear by the inspired men. Hear Paul, in his letter to the Philippians: "I am in a straight between two, having a strong desire to depart and be with Christ; which is far better: nevertheless, to abide in the flesh is now needful for you." There he speaks of himself as departing and abiding in the flesh. Now, if he departed, evident is it that he would leave behind him that in which he was then abiding—the flesh; for, surely, no one supposes that Paul went to heaven in the flesh. It is, therefore, evident that Paul, and Paul's flesh are not the same. The "I" that departed—the "I" that abode in the flesh, certainly was not the flesh. I, and my body, are two things. The "I" is not the body — but something, which, though abiding in the body for a while, departs after a while, and leaves the body. When I say my body, I speak of that, which, though mine, is not me or myself. Thus the Ego, and the non-Ego, are distinguished by the great philosophers of Holy Writ.

Peter also makes the same distinction. "The Lord Jesus has showed me, how that shortly, I must put off this, my tabernacle. Peter, and the tabernacle of Peter, are most obviously distinguished. Peter is the Ego—the tabernacle of Peter the non-Ego. Peter is the true living being—the tabernacle of Peter, that in which he lived. The pulling down, the destruction of a tabernacle is not the non-existence of the inhabitant. Therefore, men, though dead to us, live to God. They are unseen of us, but known and seen by God.

But there is a life, which the righteous possess, which never dies—the everlasting life. The spirit of man possessed of the truth of God, becomes, as we have seen, alive to God; is possessed of a life which makes it akin to divine nature — indeed, the Apostle Peter speaks of our being "partakers of the divine nature." This divine nature is the true source of the everlasting life. We receive Christ—and from him, is imparted to us the divine nature, which gives that new life, by which we become victorious over sin and the flesh.

The Apostle John gives these words of John the Baptist: "He that believeth on the Son, hath life; he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." The wicked exist eternally without life—a paradox; be it so: it is true. They exist eternally — they possess that existence which belongs to the nature of spirits; but without that life, which results from being partakers of the divine nature. Without the divine nature, no spirit can love God or be obedient to him. This divine nature is imparted to us when we believe in Christ. It is not faith which gives us this divine life. Jesus himself, who is the life of the world, gives us this life through faith. Strong, indeed, are the words of our holy Apostle:—"We are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones." We are to Christ what Eve was to Adam. We are his bride. We partake of his nature, being joint-partakers of his spirit. He took our nature, and thus raised the human to the divine. He lives eternally, and we are supported by him. He is our light, our life, our strength. From him there comes forth a vis activa, a vis viva, a living, active power, that entering into the spirit of man, vivifies, enlightens, and transfuses life through the whole man.

God is light. God is life. God is love. What must be the condition of that spirit, which is enlightened by the divine light, quickened by this life, and filled with this love? Is it not a partaker of the divine nature? Has not the divine descended and taken flesh? Why should not the divine transfuse itself into the human? Is it credible that the Logos became flesh? Then the divine has united itself with the human. When we are united to Christ, the human becomes united with the divine. Else, how is he that is joined to the Lord, one spirit?

We are to Christ as Eve to Adam, Paul being judge: "We are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones." Wonderful words are these! Wonderful union with the Messiah!

How, then, can we die? Death is abolished. Life reigns in us. Though our bodies must see the dust, we live, and shall live, for evermore. The present body is unfit for that habitation which God has prepared for the righteous. It must undergo a change, either by being raised from the dust, or by being changed when the Lord shall descend from heaven: "For we shall all sleep," no; some will be found on earth when the Messiah comes; these will not sleep, but undergo a change which is necessary for that they may meet our coming Redeemer. A living, regenerate, sanctified body in which to live for ever—a resurrection, becomes a consequence of the possession of a life by the spirit. The body will be given a life which is eternal. A pure spirit will inhabit a body that is immortal and incorruptible. This mortal (body) must put on immortality—this corruptible (body) must put on incorruption. In this body there is nothing that can secure it from corruption. From the dust there can come nothing that is immortal. That which is immortal and incorruptible comes from heaven. So our Apostle teaches that "if our earthly house of this tabernacle perish, we have a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." This heavenly house, or body, which is immortal, will swallow up mortality. Our mortal body will be clad with an immortal one from heaven, which will thus swallow up all that is mortal, and then our living spirit will inhabit for ever a living, immortal, incorruptible, heavenly body. Death will then be swallowed up of life.

CHRISTIAN UNION.

"Neither pray I for these alone; but for them also which shall believe on me through their word: That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." (John xvii. 20-21.)

FROM this prayer we learn that it is not the Lord's will, that all professors of religion should be one. Judging also from the different effects of the various religions on the heart and life, it seems neither desirable nor possible for them to be united. When we call to mind the very politic unions of denominations, to conduct "revival meetings," and witness the pious trickery in the division of the converts, and the subsequent hatred of all the parties, we can but doubt the moral influence of such efforts.

The Saviour prayed for the union of such "as should believe on him, through their (the apostles') words;" and from this prayer shall stand on record that shall be able to find no other foundation of union. I will briefly notice a few points, viz. :—

- 1st. The union of early Christians.
- 2nd. The early and continued union of disunion.
- 3rd. The terms upon which Christians will be united.

The first Gospel sermon of Peter introduced some three thousand persons, who cried, "What shall we do?" The answer was prompt: they gladly received his word, and were united upon the baptism which God had laid in

"They continued steadfastly in the Apostle's doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers" (Acts ii. 42.) A few days after, Peter delivered his second sermon from Solomon's portico. "Howbeit, many of them who heard the word, believed; and the number of men was about five thousand" (Acts iv. 4.) At this juncture, there must have been at least ten thousand who had believed the Apostle's words, and given themselves to the Lord. "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and one soul" (Acts iv. 32.)*

The divine arrangements led the servants of Christ next to Samaria. Philip preached, "And the people with one accord, gave head unto those things which he spake. And there was great joy in that city. But when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women" (Acts viii. 5-12.)

Thus we find the preaching of the word filled the city with joy — and so soon as the men and women believed the word concerning the kingdom and name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized; and the Jews and Samaritans, who previously had no dealings, became as one people in the Lord.

Next, "The Gentiles saw his righteousness and kings his glory" — the house of Cornelius was saved — no longer were foreigners to be called unclean, and the Lord placed a "new name" upon his servants. "The middle wall of partition contained in ordinances was removed," and Jews and Greeks were built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone. In whom all the building, fitly framed, grew into a holy temple in the Lord. (Eph. ii.)

The converts were all the children of God by faith, "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ." There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female :

* Let the reader remember that among this multitude there were no Gentiles, the very thought of their introduction being an offence to many of these converts. Here, then, we have the first cause of division in the one body of Christ. — Ed.

for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 27-28.)

The divine formula upon which the first Christians were united, is : "There is one body and one spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling. One Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all" (Eph. iv. 4-6.) This spiritual creed was a sufficient basis for the union of early Christians. The items of this creed are few, and cannot be misunderstood. The question of the age is, whether this creed will answer.

Observe, "There is one body" or church. What church is this claiming supremacy? The Romish hierarchy was not then in existence — Presbyterianism was not born till fifteen centuries after, and there was no Campbellite or Baptist church. The church of God, the churches of Christ, and the churches of saints were then prevalent. All Christians drank into the same spirit of love. There was but one Lord or Lawgiver, but now the least faction assumes the throne of heaven's law reporter. Christians, at first, had the one faith; and it is a question, if all who believe the Scriptures at all, do not believe precisely the same things yet. There was then no controversy in regard to the one immersion into Christ. Whenever we let the Spirit speak, we have the identical immersion still. The same God was acknowledged by every saint. It may be proper, also, to suggest that the servants of God, in the early ages, were zealous for "the name of Christ" — Christians. In the designation of the New Testament, there is nothing offensive to good men; but while religionists will presume to wear denominational titles, and suppose there is no evil in them, it will be vain to think of union.

2. How long did the Disciples remain united? With the exception of small factions, Christians enjoyed great unanimity till the third century. But it was not till the year 325 that error gained the ascendancy, and the apostacy became fully enthroned. At the council of Nice, the first human creed was made by Constantine. It was regarded as dangerous and damnable for the people to express their belief in scriptural language, and the most unrelenting anathemas were pronounced upon all who could not conscientiously subscribe to the articles set forth. All other creeds of Christendom have been taken from the Nicene, and the effect of each is the erection of a human standard in the place of the Bible. Creeds have created all the sects, party names, and party practices of the world, and through their influences Satan gains his highest triumphs.

3. Upon what terms can Christians be united? This, of all others, is the most important question of the age. It is now a matter of doubt whether men can become Christians, or honor God under the guidance of a creed. If the proposition that the Bible is a perfect creed, be true, there is but little difficulty in ascertaining the proper basis of Christian union.

The apostle informs us that "All Scripture given by the inspiration of God, is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect—thoroughly furnished unto all good works." Again, we are authorized to believe that we have furnished in the Scriptures "all things that pertain to life and godliness." Both Catholics and Protestants assert that they adopt the Bible as an infallible rule of faith and practice, but they, at the same time, establish other rules which completely paralyze the Scriptures. The Catholics, in no country, are willing for their people either to read or believe the Scriptures. The rule by which they supplant the Scriptures, consists in the authoritative interpretation of the church. This interpretation of the Scriptures by the church, they ardently desire their people to read and believe. If this is reading and believing the Bible, then they do both. Protestants deny the authority of the church to interpret the Scriptures, but adopt the rule, that every man has a right to interpret the Bible for himself, which is certainly quite as subversive of scriptural authority. The Bible alone, with the right of private judgment, is the creed of Protestantism. Shall I have the honor of denying the right of every man, woman, and child, privately and publicly interpreting the Scriptures? This most specious device of Satan—the right of private interpretation—under the pompous profession of freedom to believe what we please, is the key to all Protestant heresy.

If the interpretations of the Bible are to constitute but one creed, in the name of God, let us have the interpretation of the church, instead of the interpretation of each wayward individual. In the multitude of councillors there is more safety, than in the endless variety of unstudious individuals.

But to relieve the reader from needless suspense, I state fearlessly that God's book contains all the interpretation of his mind necessary for faithful practice. His interpretations are adapted to the exigencies of the human mind—and the idea of interpreting what heaven has commanded us to believe, as it was written, is the essence of folly. On this point Peter gave a rule that needs no interpretation. He, "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of Scripture is of any private interpretation" (2 Peter i. 20.) The apostles were commanded to "preach the Gospel," and the Saviour promised that responsible men would be able to believe the Gospel without an interpreter. Paul, in view of the death and judgment, commanded his servants to "Preach the word." Jesus said, "that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."

The point in all these passages is, that the words of the Spirit are the signs of God's mind—the images of heaven's will, that speak to the heart of man, and they need no interpreter. The Word of God faithfully translated, is to be "rightly divided," and preached as the word of life, "which works effectually in all that believe." But enough on this particular subject. The reader may anticipate a final conclusion. Belief through the apostle's words will completely unshackle honest hearts.

Those who thus believe, cannot understand each other. Suppose the nominations were to assemble, as bodies or by representations, and agree to be governed, in all things by the Scriptures—would they have the desired effect? Let us endeavor to put this matter to the test.

I would respectfully call attention to the power of the book of law and the Jews. When Israel was in disorder, Hilkiah found the book law, and the good king, "Josiah, gathered all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem, and went into the house of the Lord, and read in their ears all the words of the book of the covenant, and the king stood in his place and made a covenant before the Lord, to walk after the Lord, and to keep his commandments, and his testimonies, and his statutes with all his heart, and with all his soul, to perform the words of the covenant which are written in this book; and he caused all to stand to it. And Josiah took away all the abominations out of the countries that pertained to be children of Israel, and made all that were present in Israel, to serve, even to serve the Lord their God. And in his days they departed not from following the Lord, the God of their fathers" (2 Chron. xxxiv. 29-33.)

If such a wondrous revolution was accomplished by the Jews "standing to, and obeying the words of the Lord," what might we not anticipate, if all who profess the Christian religion would but receive the words of the new covenant and "stand" to them? If the churches or representatives could be induced to adopt, in fact, the Scriptures as the only foundation, sectarian distinctions could not exist an hour.

While men profess to be governed by the Bible, however, and practice party theories, either in avowed creeds or locked in their own hearts, we have but little to hope in regard to Christian union.

These views are hastily thrown together—but I trust they are intelligible, and if they should be the means of aiding any of my erring fellow mortals in investigating the truth, I shall feel amply rewarded.

OPENING SPEECH IN THE NEWTOWN DEBATE ON "THE EVILS OF SECTARIANISM."

NEWTOWN, APRIL 28, 1859.

Gentlemen Moderators—Ladies and Gentlemen.—The subject which my worthy opponent, Mr. Bevan, and myself have met to debate in your hearing to-night, is expressed in the words, "The Evils of Sectarianism." That this confessedly "grave and important topic may not be treated in a vague, and therefore unsatisfactory manner, the disputants of this occasion are agreed to debate the following logical proposition, viz.—"That Sectarianism, as such, is essentially evil."

Since this discussion has grown out of a lecture recently delivered by me; and since, in fixing the present debate, no exception was taken by Mr. Bevan to my former definition of Sectarianism—I beg to repeat that definition. "By Sectarianism," we then observed, "we denote that general state of things which consists in many professedly Christian parties, inclusive of all such principles and practices as are calculated to foster divisions." To this definition of Sectarianism, it may be well to add those formerly given of the related terms, Sect and Sectarian. They are as follows:—"By SECT we mean neither more nor less than a party; a sect we understand to denote simply a party."—"By Sectarian, as an adjective, we mean the quality of belonging to Sectarianism; of being imbued with the divisive principles and tendencies of Sectarianism."—"By Sectarian, as a noun, we mean (not the person who happens to belong to a sect, but) the person [who maintains divisive principles, who upholds Sectarianism, who by word or deed tries to keep up the multiplicity of sects which now exists. Every such person is a Sectarian—more or less inveterate according to circumstances." From these previously-given and unchallenged definitions, every person may conclude, with certainty, what is the precise point in dispute. It is clear that by Sectarianism we are to understand DIVISIONALISM. Divisionalism amongst believers in Christ—Divisionalism in principle—Divisionalism in spirit—Divisionalism in practice—Divisionalism in fact. About such Divisionalism we disagree. I affirm that it is essentially evil;—that, whatever may be its accidents, evil is its essence; that, however the loving Jesus may have brought occasional and accidental love out of it, Divisionalism amongst believers, as such, in its own proper character, its own essential nature, is evil, only evil, and that continually. That Divisionalism, as such, is essentially evil, is the ONLY thing I am here to affirm and prove—the ONLY thing which it will be in place for my opponent to deny and refute. If he would prove anything to the point, he must prove that Sectarianism is, either not evil at all, or that it is only accidentally evil, while in its own nature it is essentially good. This, then, and this alone, is the true subject of debate.

My course, in endeavoring to prove the essentially evil character of Sectarianism, will be, first, to submit a series of arguments to that effect from the Word of God; and then to add such corroborative considerations as prudence may suggest and time allow. Along with these positive arguments I shall offer such notices of my opponent's arguments as will in my judgment entirely deprive them of any force for sustaining his denial. In like manner, I shall expect him to follow the train of my arguments, and disprove them if he can.

For the sake of distinctness and convenience of reference, I shall number my arguments (first, second, &c.) as I proceed.

ARGUMENT I. is founded upon the beautiful words of the Psalmist, contained in cxxxiii. 1, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." Now here the Psalmist's opening exclamation, "behold!" denotes that an object of interest stands out to his vision? What is that object? "Brethren"—children of one Father—"dwelling TOGETHER," not dwelling apart—"DWELLING together," not occasionally coming together, as if to apologize for being generally divided—"dwelling together in unity," not dwelling together in strife and dissensions. This, then, is the object. The Psalmist says behold it—"Brethren, dwelling together, in unity." In rapture he characterises the picture. "Behold how good and how pleasant it is." It is good in itself—intrinsically excellent. It is seemly, comely, beautiful—pleasant to behold, and in all its influences. It has these qualities in a high degree; "how good"—"how pleasant!" Words cannot express the excellence, the beauty.

Now, with this oracle to sustain me, I affirm the evil—the essential evil of Sectarianism. Sectarianism in its rise, leads brethren dwelling together to dwell together in strife. The strife comes too hot! Strife leads to division. Schism leads to sects. The brethren dwell together no longer. Such is the result of Sectarianism. Hence it is, in itself, and, in its appearance, lamentable.

I call on my worthy respondent to overturn this argument. The advocate of Sectarianism says, it is no evil—this goodness—this pleasantness is just as good—just as pleasant as brethren to dwell apart, to be at variance—asunder—if not rather more so. My opponent must go so far as to prove it to be better, pleasant, for brethren to dwell apart, to be divided into many sects, than to dwell together in unity, or else abandon his defence of Sectarianism.

ARGUMENT II. is based upon Isaiah iii. 9, in which God says, "will I turn to the people a proverb, that they MAY all call upon the name of the LORD, and serve him with one consent." Now the state of things from which deliverance is here promised, is most clearly a state of sectarianism. Sectarianism both is signified by, and in its turn occasions "impure language." Witness the multiplicity of metaphysical creeds, jarring and barbarous phrases, and its endless disputations about questions on which the Divine Word is silent. It is essentially characteristic of sectarianism, that within its pale it does not "call upon the Lord, and serve him with one consent;" but rather "many dissensions." Some Sectarians call on the Lord's name according to forms prescribed in a parliamentary prayer book, and some object to some try to serve him in infant baptism, while others regard it as a mockery. In this prophecy the Lord promises deliverance from Sectarianism, purity of speech and dissension, peace, or from something essentially evil. Will my opponent dare to say that a Sectarian state of things is not evil, that it is a pity that the Lord has promised to deliver his people out of it?

ARGUMENT III. is founded upon a principle involved in our Saviour's words, (Mat. xii. 25) "Every kingdom divided against itself is brought into confusion; and every city or house divided against itself, shall not stand." There is something of a proverb ture in this saying of our Lord ; and that, like all proverbs, it is not of universal or absolute application. For instance, in this case, we do not understand, that when a kingdom is divided against itself, it falls in a moment, or that the division may not be healed and the kingdom saved. But on the other, we do understand that for a kingdom, city, or house to be divided against itself, is an essentially evil thing. Some accidental good may, perchance, come out of it ; but its proper nature is evil, its native tendency is evil. Certainly, it may be a good thing for a bad house, city, or kingdom to be divided against itself ; but we are speaking of something good, viz. of the community of believers—a community whose welfare is to be desired — and hence, in their case, for them to be divided against themselves is for a great calamity to happen—for an essentially evil thing to be in existence. Hence it follows that Sectarianism, which is Divisionalism, which therefore consists in believers being divided against each other, is essentially evil.

It remains for Mr. Bevan to retrieve Sectarianism, if he can, from this heavy condemnation. Sectarianism, just to the degree to which it exists, does divide believers against each other. The Lord here teaches us to regard such a Sectarian condition as one of weakness, one of exposure to danger, one tending to destruction. Can my worthy respondent deny this ?

ARGUMENT IV. is derived from the tenor of an important paragraph in the valedictory prayer of our Lord, recorded in John xvii. Verse 11, latter part, "Holy Father, keep through thine own name, those whom thou hast given me, that they MAY BE ONE, as we are." Verses 20-23, "Neither pray I for these alone ; but for them also which shall believe on me through their word : THAT THEY ALL MAY BE ONE, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that THEY ALSO MAY BE ONE IN US, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. And the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them : THAT THEY MAY BE ONE, even as we are one : I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one, and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them as thou hast loved me." set aside all and sundry pleas for Sectarianism. For : (1) They are petitions offered by the Son of God ; hence, for a blessing essentially good, the loss of which must be an essential evil. (2) The blessing desired is the direct opposite of Sectarianism. Sectarianism prevents believers being one in the manner here desired : "That they may be one, even as we are one." A necessary condition of the union subsisting between the divine Father and Son, is communion—constant, free, full communion. Consequently, the union desired for his followers by Jesus was one inclusive of such a communion—a constant, free, full communion. Sectarianism stands in the way of this communion between all believers. It is an essential barrier. Introduce such a communion, and you remove every vestige of Sectarianism ; introduce Sectarianism, and you destroy that communion. Divisionalism, consequently, robs Jesus of an answer to this prayer ; and his followers of the unspeakable benefit of that answer.

Can Mr. Bevan deny that since Divisionalism necessarily thwarts this sublime prayer in its benevolent petitions for perfect unity among all believers, it must be essentially evil ? Does not our Lord pray for the continued absence of Sectarianism ? Does he not assume, as an undoubted truth, that the introduction of Sectarianism would hinder the conversion of the world ? Can such a hindrance be anything else than essentially evil ? Most emphatically do I call Mr. Bevan's attention to this argument, solemnly convinced as I am that it alone fully sustains my proposition, and will victoriously repel his most daring assault !

ARGUMENT V. is found in Romans xvi. 17-18 :—"Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences, CONTRARY TO THE DOCTRINE WHICH YE HAVE LEARNED, and avoid them, for they that are such, serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly, and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple." On this passage, I remark, that in view of what the Apostle here positively says respecting the persons he characterises, no man can deny the "essential evil" of their work. The persons to whom he alludes were to be "marked"—to be "avoided"—they were persons who served their "belly," instead of "Christ," and by soft, deceitful language, deceived the hearts of the simple. Find up the doings for which men are thus condemned, and you find up an "essential," intrinsic, necessary "evil!" I affirm that these men were Sectarians of the deepest dye. The work of their hands, so far as the vigilance of the Apostle allowed it to be wrought out, was SECTARIANISM, neither more nor less! Sectarianism is Divisionalism: "Mark them that cause divisions." What could be more to the point? But, since Sectarians are prone to charge divisions on those who are not the guilty parties, Paul adds—"Mark them which cause divisions and offences CONTRARY TO THE DOCTRINE WHICH YE HAVE LEARNED." Whom does Paul here address? The Primitive Christians. What was the doctrine learned by the primitive Christians? Certainly, the doctrine of inspired men—the doctrine of the New Testament—the "form of sound words" left us by the Apostles. Now, Sectarianism has arisen altogether in the manner here described; by the causing of divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine (or teaching) delivered by inspired men to the first Christians. Without such divisions and offences, Sectarianism could never have come into being! Let Mr. Bevan name a single sect that has been caused in any other way since the days of the Apostles! In every instance, on one side or the other, often on both, there has been the causing of divisions and offences contrary to New Testament teaching!

Sectarianism has entangled many better men than those here described, but is the legitimate fruit of men such as these sensual, hypocritical deceivers; and hence is "essentially evil."

ARGUMENT VI. stands conspicuous in 1 Corinthians i. 10-13. It may be brought out by reading these four verses, and interweaving brief comments.

"Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing."

Sectarianism says, "Oh, that is impossible! We shall never do that! We must have our party creeds speaking contradictory things."

Paul goes on—"And that there be no DIVISIONS among you"—literally, no

schisms among you. Now it is universally agreed that the difference between a schism and a sect is this,—that a schism is a party division within a church, while a sect is a party division from a church. The schism is the growth of the sect: without a schism first, a sect cannot be produced; condemn a schism, and you condemn the sect, or the multiplication of sects. Well, then, Paul in here forbidding schisms among Christians, condemns sects among Christians—and therefore, Sectarianism. Hence Sectarianism is "essentially evil."

But Mr. Bevan says—it is not. He will he settle his difference with Paul? We shall see!

The Apostle adds—"but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment."

What will the advocate of Sectarianism say to this? Will he say, "dear! What a pity Paul did not better understand the subjective forces and subjective differences of human nature! Perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment! deed! Why, how perfectly unphilosophical!"

The Apostle proceeds—"For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions among you."

So, then, Sectarianism consists of multiplied sects—sects originate in schisms; and schisms originate in "contentions," or are cradled in them. "Contentions"—works of the flesh: Sectarianism "essentially evil" in its very origin!

Further, proceeds Paul—"Now I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul, and I am of Apollos, and I am of Cephas, and I of Christ." Such is Paul's accusation against the Corinthians.

Now, unquestionably, were Paul to look into the Sectarianism of the present day, he might similarly exclaim—"Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Luther, and I am of Calvin, and I am of Wesley," &c. But of course, according to my friend opposite, this, now, would be a very trifling accusation. It would not be the condemnation of something "essentially evil!"

Finally, exclaims Paul—"Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you?"

or were ye baptized into the name of Paul?" So, then, Sectarianism, "as such," does what it can to divide Christ! It robs him of his honor! It divides the glory which belongs to him alone, between him and those whom it idolizes and exalts into party leaders!—After this will Mr. Bevan venture to say that "Sectarianism, as such, is NOT essentially evil?"

ARGUMENT VII. may be found in 1 Cor. iii. 1-4. "And I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ. I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able. For ye are yet carnal: for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men? For while one saith, I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos, are ye not carnal?"

As this passage is precisely similar to the last quoted, it needs but little comment. This speaks of divisions, and that spoke of divisions. This condemns the exalting of men into party leaders, as that condemned it. Both deal with Sectarianism. They deal with it in the germ. They condemn it in the germ. In other words, in both passages we find that the Apostle Paul, led by the Spirit of infinite wisdom, regarded Sectarianism as so "essentially evil," that, to use an expressive phrase, he endeavoured to "nip it in the bud."

The point peculiar to this quotation from the third chapter, first Corinthian, is this, that in it divisions are spoken of the product of sinful human nature—of the "FLESH." "Ye are yet carnal—are ye not carnal, and walk as men?"

I ask my worthy respondent a few questions here:—Where would Sectarianism be without "divisions?" Does not the Apostle describe "divisions" as springing from the flesh? Does not the flesh, generally, in Paul's writings, and particularly here, denote the corrupt principle or tendency of fallen human nature? And is not this principle or tendency essentially evil;—does not the same apostle himself say, "In me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing?" If the flesh be wholly evil, if in it dwelleth no good thing;—how comes it to pass that Sectarianism, which springs from the flesh, is something not wholly evil? Has Mr. Bevan, at last, discovered an evil tree bringing forth good fruit? Or can he deny either, that the fruit of the flesh is essentially evil, or that Sectarianism is a fruit of the flesh? Will he answer me?

ARGUMENT VIII. springs out of Paul's enumeration of the works of the flesh, in Gal. v. 19-21: "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these, [mark them well!] adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, HATRED, VARIANCE, EMULATIONS, WRATH, STRIFE, SEDITIONS, HERESIES, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, AND SUCH LIKE: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God."

The argument from this quotation may be expressed in a sentence:—The word "heresies," a Greek word, left untranslated in the above list, means SECTS, in the plural number, and so Sectarianism; hence, Sectarianism is one of the works of the flesh, and "essentially evil." That "heresies" does signify "sects" is evident, from the fact, that of the total number of the occurrences of the word haireisis in the New Testament, (viz. 9) it is simply left untranslated in four instances, but in five is rendered sect—"sect of the Sadducees"—"sect of the Pharisees"—"the sect everywhere spoken against," &c.

Hence, this argument is perfectly conclusive. Mr. Bevan must either destroy it, or give up his advocacy of Sectarianism! He cannot do the former, I hope he will the latter.

ARGUMENT IX. is derived from Titus iii. 10-11:—"A man that is an HERETIC, after the first and second admonition, reject; knowing that he that is such, is subverted, and sinneth, being condemned of himself."

As haireisis means sect, so hairetecos means the man that makes and upholds sects. It is exceedingly unfortunate that my opponent should stand forth to-night as the "Defender of Sectarianism;" for this reason, that my arguments seem, several of them, as if forged to seal his doom, personally, in a very uncomfortable way. I can only apologize by remarking that I do not aim them at his person—only at his cause. His cause, they do terribly shiver to atoms! As for his person, I do fervently trust it may be truthfully said of him—"He does it ignorantly in unbelief. Father, forgive him, he knows not what he does!" Let it be understood, then, that I do not charge Mr. Bevan personally, with being, in the full sense of the word, in Greek—"hairitecon anthropon;" in English, "a man that is a factionist," or a deliberate promoter of Sectarianism. Still I do kindly and solemnly warn him to beware, lest he come under the condemnation here pronounced. "A man that is an heretic (promoter of Sectarianism) after the first and second admonition, reject; knowing that he that is such is subverted, and sinneth, being condemned of himself."

I ask, would the Apostles have thus spoken, had they NOT regarded Sectarianism as essentially evil—so inherently bad, that it must, by even the severest means, be crushed in its first beginnings?

Thus have I developed nine biblical arguments to prove the proposition, "THAT SECTARIANISM, AS SUCH, IS ESSENTIALLY EVIL." And I beg you to observe, that in doing this I have unfolded "the EVILS of Sectarianism"—its evil consequences or effects immediately from the same divine standard of appeal. Allow me briefly to enumerate "the EVILS of Sectarianism," as they lie expressed or implied in the quotations from the Holy Scriptures to which you have listened.

EVIL FIRST.—Sectarianism sets aside the will of the Lord Jesus.

EVIL SECOND.—Sectarianism weakens the force of Christ's claims in the estimation of unbelievers.

EVIL THIRD.—Sectarianism puts back the conversion of the world.

EVIL FOURTH.—Sectarianism robs the communion of believers of its universality, its intimacy, its power to conform believers to divine example.

EVIL FIFTH.—Sectarianism robs believers of the rapture with which they might otherwise exclaim respecting the one, vast, unbroken Christian brotherhood—"Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!"

EVIL SIXTH.—Sectarianism begets a number of peculiar dialects used in relation to the Christian faith, so that, instead of all Christians being trained in "the form of sound words" left by inspired men, they frequently scarcely understand each other's important technical language.

EVIL SEVENTH.—Sectarianism weakens the power of the flesh from which it springs.

EVIL EIGHTH.—Sectarianism keeps its votaries in a condition of spiritual babyhood.

EVIL NINTH.—Sectarianism manifests an inveterate tendency to glorify men—to exalt men to party leaders.

EVIL TENTH.—Sectarianism weakens the power of church discipline, arising from its factionist character, which is highly deprived of the power to "reject the man that is a factionist."

Now, let it be noted, that I claim no right to file these EVILS against Sectarianism, directly on SCRIPTURAL GROUNDS, and not on the ground of mere opinion. It is not merely my opinion that these things are so; it is God's testimony that they are. True, I may have misinterpreted God's testimony, since I am not infallible. I have misinterpreted the passages quoted, it is for Mr. Bevan to shew wherein. My firm conviction is, that I have NOT misinterpreted any of them, but that with consentient voice they bear out my proposition, and must obtain victory for my cause.

With all good feeling, and with confidence in the impregnability of my position, I await my worthy opponent's attack. At what point will he endeavor to storm my citadel?

Will he assail my SUMMARY of TEN "EVILS" chargeable on Sectarianism? Then he must prove that they do not lie expressed or implied in the passages submitted!

Will he assail my SERIES of NINE ARGUMENTS, consisting wholly of Scripture quotations, with brief reasonings thereon, to shew their applicability to the case in hand? Then he must shew that they do not bear on Sectarianism, or not on Sectarianism, "as such," else he must shew that while they bear on Sectarianism, they do not prove it EVIL, or, at least, not "ESSENTIALLY evil."

How many of these passages will be able to take away from me? Can he take one of them? Let him remember, that should he succeed in this, nay, should he succeed in taking from me all EXCEPT one—even then I should gain my point. Since I am in the affirmative, one Scripture passage sustaining that affirmation will bear me through in the judgment of believers, in the divine authority of the Bible. Because, if the Bible may err in one passage, it may in one hundred.

Mr. Bevan has consented to become my respondent in this debate : I call on him to respond to my arguments, by proving them erroneous. He has accepted the office of denying : will he now deny that Sectarianism, as such, is essentially evil. He has consented that I should lead, and he would follow : will he now, before this audience, FOLLOW where I have LED the way ?

PETER AND THE PENTECOST.

CHRIST is enthroned. The Holy Spirit has descended. The Gospel in its fulness is preached, the church is formed, and the way to eternal glory is clearly pointed out. At the building of the Tower of Babel, the righteous indignation of God was manifested in the confusion of tongues. They were smitten and confounded ; in a moment they were separated from each other, and barriers erected which could not be surpassed. And to this day the world feels the effect of this awful judgment. Different languages estrange us from each other, and greatly tend to divide the hearts and hopes of the people. We love language because it is so moral and social. How faithfully it represents the feelings of the soul ! How it kindles in the hearts of others kindred sympathies with our own ! In all ages of the world it has been one of the most powerful instruments in the enlightenment and exaltation of the human race. And it affords us pleasure to know, that in our mother tongue the glad sounds of the Gospel are preached to millions of the human race. At the day of Pentecost there was no confusion of tongues, for the Apostles were endowed with a miraculous power, which enabled them to speak so that they could be perfectly understood by the Parthians, the Medes, the Elamites, the Cretes, the Arabians, and others, for they all heard them speak in their own tongues the wonderful works of God. Was not this indicative that the Gospel should be preached to all, and its truths proclaimed in every land ? When the devout Jews who had come from every nation under heaven heard of it, they, with the multitude, gathered together. On that memorable day the Holy Ghost, in all his fulness and power, descended, assuming the form of cloven tongues, as of fire, and it sat upon each of them, and they spoke as the Spirit gave them utterance. What a difference betwixt the tongues of Babel and the tongues of Pentecost ! In the former all was confusion and estrangement ; in the latter all was order and harmony. In the former it was a judgment which scattered ; in the latter it was a merciful miracle which enabled them all alike to hear something of Him who is the way and the life. And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all in one place. The great events of the death, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord had taken place, and they had not forgotten his promise. They were the subjects of great excitement, holy thoughts, and ardent desires. The power of the Great Teacher had never left them, and now the time had come for the fulfilment of his promise. And suddenly their minds were illumed by the light of God, and their hearts burned with devoted love. They are surrounded and encompassed with unearthly glory. They felt the power and unction of the Divine Presence, and were prepared by inspired teachings to proclaim the truth as it is in Jesus. Peter now stood forth ; his experience had proved bitter, and he had been humbled. Great sins had been committed, of which he had truly repented. He had denied his Lord with an oath, and like a coward had fled from him in the hour of peril and death. But then he had run to the sepulchre, and since his resurrection he had seen and conversed with his Lord ; and he had felt the hallowed influence of forgiveness and love. He now stands forth to utter the most amazing and important truths which ever escaped the lips of man. No man had ever filled such a position — no man had ever had such a subject ; and there is nothing in the whole range of ancient oratory to be compared to the theme which was the burden of his speech. Cicero, with his refined and classic taste, in the heights of his pure and charming eloquence, had no subject equal to that which pertained to the man Christ Jesus. Demosthenes, the greatest orator which Greece ever knew, and of whose fame the world has heard, had subjects which were low, grovelling, and sensual when compared or contrasted with the doctrines of the cross. Plato, though he reasoned well, and spoke elaborately of immortality, knew nothing of Him who is the way, the truth, and the life. And poor blind Homer, with his magnificent soul, could not strike a chord which spoke of Him who was touched with our infirmities. He sang of war and of its damning desolations. But Peter had to speak of a Conqueror who had conquered death and hell by a power which was holy and divine. Reaching back to the time of the Prophet Joel, he commenced his oration by referring to the wonders in heaven above, and signs on the earth beneath; blood and fire, and darkness and smoke. The Sun shall be turned into darkness, and the Moon into blood. These great wonders were the substratum of his glorious theme, all of which, we think, refer either to physical actualities, or to great moral changes which should be connected with the death, the resurrection, the ascension, and enthronement of our Lord. Peter was an honored instrument, for he was the first to make known the truth in all its completeness and glory. "Ye men of Israel, hear these words. Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles, and wonders, and signs which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know; Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain; whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden by it." He then refers to some of the statements made by the Psalmist, in reference to the Captain of our salvation, and gives us a portion of gospel truths which are therein contained. This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses. How solemn and truthful was the declaration! This Jesus, whom you have seen and heard, and whose wonderful miracles you have seen — Jesus, whom you have insulted, persecuted, and slain — this Jesus, of whom you said, "crucify him, crucify him," this Jesus, on whose sacred brow placed the crown of thorns — this Jesus, whom you have hated and despised — God of your fathers hath raised up; it was not possible that he should be held by the power of death or the powers of the grave. With what power and wisdom he speaks. He is no moral and spiritual hero. With what questions which they could not question, charges home upon them the murder of our Lord, and shows that because they had killed God had raised up to be a Prince and a Saviour. How convicted they stood — how smitten with a sense of the great wrong they had done! They were pricked to the heart, and in the bitterness of their souls exclaimed, "What shall we do?" The question implies that what they had done would not save them. They worshipped God even in his holy temple — they had chanted some of the quaint and soul-stirring Hebrew psalms — they had seen the glory of the shekinah — they had heard again the reading of the Law — they had seen the sacrificial victims and the fire — and their minds had been directed to the one true and holy God. Their mothers had been mothers in Israel, and their fathers had been patriarchs and prophets; but all these things were not avail. A new subject was presented to them; the facts of Calvary could not be ignored. They had crucified Christ, and with all their craft, ingenuity, and prejudice, they could not deny that he had risen; many had visited the sepulchre, and some must have heard the plaintive cry of Mary. "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." He was not there, and the witnesses who saw him ascend to glory were faithful and true. Their own remembrance tended also to self-conviction, for doubtless some had seen the wonderful works he had wrought; and all had felt the darkness in which Jerusalem had been ingloomed. The elements had been mournfully and strikingly eloquent in attestation of his divinity; and rending rocks and shrouded Sun borne their witness that this man was the Son of God. Here was a sub-full of light, life, and power. Jesus, at the Passover, was slain. Jesus, at the Pentecost, was spoken of as an exalted King and loving Saviour. Peter's subject comprehended prophecy and its fulfilment—sin and forgiveness—God's counsel and foreknowledge—wicked man and a crucified Lord—the crown of thorns and the crown of glory—the pains of death and the joy of immortal life—the power of the grave and the triumphs of the resurrection—the cross and the sceptre of universal dominion—supernatural darkness and heavenly light—a Saviour despised and a Saviour adored. It referred to heaven, and all the house of Israel was to know that God had made that same Jesus whom they had crucified both Lord and Christ. With what holy fervour he spoke. His hearers trembled beneath the power of the truth. God was speaking in him and through him, and when the guilty persecutors and murderers of the Lord felt indeed that he was now the risen and glorified Christ, they earnestly cried out, What shall we do? They knew that he had worked miracles, that he had been dead and was buried. They knew also that they had crucified him, and they saw the light of the Pentecostal glory, and they felt the presence and the power of God. What shall we do? In themselves they could find no answer. Nor could their politics or philosophy give the reply. Nature was beautiful around them, and the streams and plains were full of life: but to this important question they could give no answer. The Sun of day and the beautiful stars of night are equally incompetent to reply. They are beautiful, as expressive of God's power and wisdom, and there is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard; but in relation to the question which then had to be answered, they are dumb as the rock and silent as death. The question involved a belief in immortality, and the answer was the most merciful and soul-melting ever given to man. "Repent and be baptized, every one of you; in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." And they did as they were told. Though they had rebelled against God, and hated the name of the Crucified, they were not required to make any personal or financial atonement; they were not required to perform long pilgrimages, nor were they called upon to make a public confession of their guilt. But they were told in mercy what they must do. They must believe on him, and they must be baptized in his name. He had shed his blood for them, and though enthroned at the right hand of his Father, having conquered principalities and powers through his Apostles, he speaks in terms of mercy and love to those by whose wicked hands he had been slain. Here is a manifestation of mercy. Enemies are loved, and eternal salvation is offered to those who had been the instruments of his death. Peter had these glorious truths to proclaim, and he spoke words which were for the healing of the nations. He recognized no material appliances—he had the opening and the enforcement of a question which comprehended the immortal destiny of man. The words he uttered were spirit and life. His soul was full of love for the risen Saviour; every sentence is a testimony for God and the truth. The future Christianity of the world was to derive its glory and splendour from the burning thought to which he gave utterance. There was the divine fire without, and the holy love within; and though but a fisherman he was an honored apostle, and his words will live for ever. All human systems must perish, but the truth of the Gospel will not only endure through all the generations of time, but they will also live through the countless ages of eternity. Peter has now become the medium of gospel light—the proclaimer of Heaven's best truth. He is the representative of the cross and the crown, and right well does he speak for his Master. He has made ample atonement for his former cowardice. He is full of the strength, the power, and the spirit of God. Though the inhabitants of Jerusalem hate the name—though the Priests and Pharisees mock—though the proud and haughty look of the wealthy Jew be cast upon him—he is a stranger to fear, and being filled with the truth and supported by God, he proclaims to all salvation through the name of Christ. His heart is full of love; he remembers Calvary, and the love which Christ had shown to him after the resurrection; and now his gracious promise has been fulfilled—a divine animation quickens all the powers of his soul, and his words are pregnant with life. He feels the responsibilities of his sacred trust; his affections are in heaven; his heart is bound to the eternal throne, and upon his utterance hangs the destiny of the world. Here we learn a glorious lesson of the Father's love—here we are told how Christ is exalted—here we learn the way from earth to heaven—here we learn what we are to do, and how it is to be done—here is a manifestation of the light and love of God. And dare we pass them by? Shall we turn from these rich and heavenly truths, and sell our spiritual birthright in the marketplace of Rome, or for the dogmas of a state? Shall we leave Peter, and go to the Pope? Shall we forsake the holy, hallowed Pentecost, to sit down amidst the cold creeds and formalities of Westminster? In the all-prevailing name of the Christ who died, we answer No!

Every human system must be discarded—we cannot serve God and Man. The Apostles left all and followed Christ. And so must we. No compromise, no consideration must keep us from God. No business or prejudice must keep us from him. He is our life. Without him we are dead and lost forever. His words are life, his looks are life, his precepts are imperative, his commands must be obeyed, his commands must not be neglected. It is an eternal peril to live in disobedience. Hearers of the Gospel, will you believe, will you be baptized? Will you come into the fold of Christ? We warn you not to delay. Come now, gaze upon the cross, and you shall behold the life of God, who taketh away the sin of the world.

CHRIST'S CHURCH IDENTIFIED.—No. V.

"Upon this rock will I build my church."

HAD I aimed to be methodical or systematical in this discussion, I would have observed the following order:

1. The foundation of Christ's church—the Messiah—"the Son of God"—"the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

2. The materials—"Living stones, built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God, by Jesus Christ,"—"a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, to show forth the praises of Him who hath called us out of darkness into the marvellous light of the Gospel"—a conscious, active, spiritual membership; and therefore, by necessity, not unconscious babes!

3. Terms of admission—"As many as gladly received the word, were baptized, and the same day there were added to them about three thousand souls." They must pass through the converting process, in order to become "living stones," spiritual materials, suited to compose a spiritual house.

4. The church covenant, or constitution—"Adapting my laws to their understandings, I will write them on their hearts; and I will be to them a Father, and they shall be to me a people." They shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord, for a man shall know me from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unbelief, and their sins and their iniquities I will remember no more. The old covenant was written on tablets of stone, the new on the hearts of the covenantees.—2. God, under the old covenant, is the God of Christians in a higher sense than he was to the Jews, and Christians are his people in a higher sense than were the Jews, because the covenantees of "a new covenant, established upon better promises."—3. Under the old covenant many were included, who were unconscious babes, and probably many ignorant adults, who knew not the Lord. Not so under the new covenant, the covenantees having the law written on their understandings and hearts know the Lord from the least to the greatest.—4. The sacrifices of the old covenant could not take away sin—"could not perfect the conscience." This the blood of Christ accomplishes. "It perfects for ever them that are sanctified."

them that are sanctified"—"purges the heart from an evil conscience," and "the conscience from dead works,"—and their sins and iniquities are remembered no more for ever.

5. The creed.—This is the gospel, the only infallible rule of faith. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned." This cannot, in truth, be said of any human creed. The stream rises not higher than its fountain. If men condemn us for not believing a human creed, the condemnation will be merely human. But if we believe not the divine creed, we make God a liar, and treasure up wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the terrible judgments of the Lord God Almighty.

6. The Gospel being the rule of faith, in Christ's church, did Christ also give it a rule of practice? Yes, "the royal law," for "the royal priesthood," enacted by the "one Lawgiver," the only "Head," and consequently, the only Lawgiver of Christ's church. "Whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he not being a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deeds."

7. The name.—Did Christ name his church? Yes, "Church of Christ," "Church of God," "Church of the living God"—and the members, "disciples," and "Christians first at Antioch." Hence an Apostle encourages his brethren, by saying, "If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye," &c.; and "if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed." Suppose, however, that I suffer as a Baptist, or a Methodist, or a Presbyterian, or under, or for any other sectarian name, where is the promise? Echo answers, where?

8. Its banner.—Changing the figure from a house to a ship, or an army, we may represent the church as having a banner. This was the cross. "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ,"—banner red with the blood of the hero of our salvation—gemmed by one glorious star—the lone, luminous day-star of Calvary—the union banner of the kingdom of Prince Messiah. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me!"

We have now given eight characteristics of Christ's church. And these characteristics so certainly belong to the church, that I cannot conceive how any one of them can be successfully controverted. Now, if these are certainly characteristics of Christ's church, can a church be Christ's that has not even one of these characteristics? A church, for example, which builds upon a human foundation; which, instead of living stones, built up a spiritual house, admits a mere flesh and blood membership, making, in so far as this membership is concerned, a mere carnal, or flesh and blood church; which admits persons to membership on terms very different from those prescribed by the Apostles; which, instead of the covenant, or constitution of the primitive church, has a human covenant or constitution; which, instead of the Gospel, as its only articles of faith, has a human creed, and instead of the perfect law of liberty, a human law or government; which, in perfect consistency with its principles and practices, calls itself by a name or names, by which Christ has never designated his church; and the members of which march and battle under a party banner, which had no existence until more than fifteen centuries after the organization of Christ's church had been gloriously perfected. Can a church be identified as Christ's, which presents these eight antagonisms to the church of Christ? I cannot believe it! Call me uncharitable, or call me whatever else your charity may dictate, I cannot believe that two things, diametrically antagonistic, in many essential points, are one and the same thing!

I have recently finished the reading of a Baptist work, for the most part, a very able production—entitled "Ten Days Travel in Search of the Church," in which the characteristics, or "tests" of the church are given as follow:—

"1, It consists only of professed believers in Christ.—2, Its members must have been baptized upon a profession of their faith in Christ.—3, It is a local independent organization, recognizing no authority above its own, but that of Christ.—4, It has Christ alone as its lawgiver.—5, Its members are made such by their own voluntary act.—6, It holds, as articles of faith, the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel.—7, It was founded by Christ, and has continued to the present time.—8, It never persecutes for conscience sake.—9, No apostate church can be a church of Christ."

The tests harmonize, with but one important exception, with those which I have given of Christ's church. This exception is given in the sixth test. "It holds, as articles of faith, the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel." I would say, it holds, as articles of faith, the Gospel—it believes the Gospel! The writer of this test seems to teach that a part of the Gospel is fundamental, and a part not fundamental—a part essential, and a part not essential. The part which is essential, or fundamental, must be believed under penalty of damnation. The part, or parts, not fundamental may be believed or disbelieved, as best suits our pleasure, our prejudices, or our convenience. Such is not the doctrine of the Great Lawgiver of Christians. "He that believeth not the Gospel"—the whole Gospel being fundamental—"shall be damned." And as of a piece with this palpable departure from Scripture style and propriety, we have in this test the word "doctrines." We read in the Scripture of "the doctrines and commandments of men," and of "the doctrines of devils," but never of the doctrines of the Gospel. When the truths of Christianity are indicated, it is always doctrine, as "speak thou the things that become sound doctrine." I am sorry that the author of "Ten Days Travel," should have travelled ten whole days through the Scriptures, without obtaining a correction of his perniciously sectarian style, as exhibited in his sixth test. These men, however, must have room for dodging; and the aberration of which I complain, points unmistakably to the deep canker of sectarianism, of which, even the most enlightened of our Baptist brethren, have not yet been able to free themselves.

Truth often strikes the mind with its greatest force, when contrasted with error. The author, to whom we have referred, accordingly presents his "tests," in contrast with Methodism. The reader will please to refer to those tests, and read the Methodistic contrasts as follows:

1st. Test—Its opposite. "It," the Methodist church, "consists in part of baptized (sprinkled) infants, and of converted seekers." (pp. 306-317.)

2nd. "Most of its members have been baptized at all, since sprinkling and pouring are not baptism; or, all, in infancy, without personal profession of faith." (pp. 317-330.)

3rd. "It is subject to the preachers. It cannot even decide who shall be its own members. It is subject to its bishop.—It cannot even choose its pastor. It is dependent for its existence as a church." (pp. 330-347.)

4th. "It is obliged to submit to the laws of conference in matters affecting even church membership." (pp. 347.)

5th. "It regards baptized children as members, and so far they do come in, but are brought. Its actual members, however, are those who have been received again with their consent." (p. 375.)

6th. "It holds and teaches salvation by faith; but this doctrine is discredited and partly nullified by that of baptismal regeneration." (pp. 376-378.)

7th. "It was conceived and established by Mr. Wesley, and other men, began in 1784, by the authority of its bishops and sixty preachers."

8th. "It has never had the power to persecute."

9th. "It was, as coming out of the Church of England, apostate in its very origin." (p. 401.)

Thus do the "evangelical sects," each claiming to be the church of Christ, or a church of Christ, or more frequently a branch of the church of Christ, calumniate and excommunicate each other. But the point. Are the Baptist and Methodist churches one and the same church? Certainly not! And why? Because of their numerous points of dissimilarity.—Their organizations almost wholly different—as different as the governments of Great Britain and the United States. How, then, can they be identified with one another there? They cannot. For the same reason, therefore, their numerous characteristics in which they are wholly unlike the apostolic church, if not antagonistic to it—the sects cannot be identified with it. You might just as well tell me that the Baptist church and that of the Romanists are identical—or that the sheep and the goat are one and the same animal!

In order to set this subject in a somewhat different light, the reader will please to accompany the writer on a visit to Jerusalem. We shall take our position on the most convenient and commanding eminence. From this eminence we shall be able, through the light of apostolic testimony, to contemplate Christ's church, rising under the hands of the inspired architects, the Apostles, in all its magnificence and heaven-appointed proportions. Our eyes rest with thrilling delight on the heavenly building. It is the temple of the Holy Spirit. It is the pillar and the support of the truth. Its foundation, elect, precious. Its materials, regenerated souls—having believed the Gospel with all the heart, and from the heart obeyed it. Its whole architecture is divine. It is the desire of all nations, the admiration of the whole earth. But behold! Yonder are other buildings presenting themselves to view. They appear far less well proportioned and beautiful than that superb structure which we first contemplated. How different they are from the original edifice, and very nearly all different from one another! These are the "evangelical sects." That toward the South, is called the Methodist church. That in the extreme North, frosted like an iceberg, is the Calvinistic Baptist church. That in the East is the Episcopal church. That in the West the Presbyterian. Yonder, on the Mount Olivet, stands the missionary Baptist establishment. And yonder, beyond, the Episcopalian; and almost enveloped in impenetrable smoke, stands the Roman Catholic church. It is observable, too, that a thinner stratum of this smoke rests upon pretty much all the circumjacent buildings, whilst heaven's sunshine streams down with beautiful effect upon the temple being constructed by Christ on the rock of salvation. Those smaller buildings situated in the whole vicinity around, some with thatched roofs, and some wholly without roofs, are the thousand and one sects which have never risen to any great eminence in the world. Now reader, tell me—you certainly can if you will—which of these buildings is "the house of God, the church of the living God?" You answer, that which is lifting its ample dome, under the skilful fingers of the apostolic workman. You are right. These sectarian organizations, had they existed then, would not have been the Christian organization! And if not, then, by no possibility known to me, can they be Christian now.

But to make the case, if possible, still plainer, permit me to add that the apostles were all identified with that superb structure upon which our eyes first rested; or, to drop the figure, were all members, not of any of the numerous sects, but of the one body or congregation which we have exhibited, and which the Scriptures exhibit, under the figure of a temple. They were the members of that divinely organized body, the terms of admission into which, and the rules for the government of which I have already given. Nor can it be supposed, with any show, either of reason or Scripture, that had the various sectarian organizations to which I have pointed, existed in their day, that they would have identified themselves with any of them. But suppose, if you please, that they would have sought membership among the sects. Then Peter might have been a Presbyterian, Paul a Calvinistic Baptist, James an Episcopalian, John a Methodist, &c. Each apostle would, in this case, have been pulling down, to some extent, the work of the others! The witnesses of Jesus would have been divided among themselves. The sword of their testimony would have become pointless and edgeless. Jews and Heathens would have laughed with scorn at their imbecility. And Christianity would not, in the present age, have been heard of, only as remembered with the exploded superstitions of other times.

But it will, perhaps, be objected, "that there are Christians in all sects!" Grant it! Still this does not alter the case. There are republicans in England, and monarchists in the United States. The British government, however, remains a monarchy, and ours a republic, notwithstanding! There are Christians in Babylon! "Come out of her my people." Does this constitute Babylon, the church of Christ? A. R.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL IN KENTUCKY.

AFTER some twenty odd years' acquaintance with Alexander Campbell, through his published writings, and an occasional correspondence with him during that period, I saw and heard him preach, and had the pleasure of a personal interview and acquaintance with him on Monday, the 21st day of March, for the first time in my life. It was an occasion I had long been desiring, and a meeting I had long been expecting, but somehow I had always been prevented by various circumstances happening at the same time and place, on the same occasion, from hearing him, and from being thrown into his company, and forming an acquaintance with the most extraordinary man of this or any age.

He was to have been at Paducah, on his way South to Memphis and other Southern points — perhaps even as far as New Orleans — on a tour to raise funds for the rebuilding of Bethany College, but was prevented by ill health. His visit continued to be deferred until we had almost given him up, when on Saturday night before the Monday to which I refer, the steamer landed him at our wharf, accompanied by his lady, Sister Margaret Campbell, and Bro. W. K. Pendleton, a former son-in-law of Bro. Campbell, one of the Professors in Bethany College, one of the corps of assistant editors of the Harbinger, and one of our most talented, able, and learned men.

The news soon flew over our little city on Lord's day morning, and our Baptist friends having very kindly promised us their house—large, and more conveniently situated than our own little, out-of-the-way, shanty sort of a building—for Bro. Campbell's use, to address the people in, at eleven o'clock the house was filled by one of the most intelligent and attentive audiences ever assembled in our city. Had his arrival been generally known in the country, no building would have been capable of containing the vast assemblage which would have congregated; nothing short of one of our capacious tobacco warehouses would have held them.

Not being apprised of Bro. Campbell's arrival until Sunday evening, living in the country as I do, some four miles from town, and learning that he was to preach on Monday, as I had never seen nor heard him, and knew not that I might ever have the opportunity of doing so again, I immediately dismissed my school for the day, and went into town for the purpose of attending his appointment, and listening to and becoming acquainted with him. The house was again filled to its utmost capacity with a large, intelligent, attentive, discriminating audience, among whom was the Methodist presiding elder, as well as some other Methodist and Baptist preachers, several of who professed themselves highly pleased. Mr. Hendricks, of Clarksville, Tennessee, one of the most distinguished Presbyterian preachers of the West, was also in the city, preaching or lecturing, but with very slender audiences, as I learned; and his name was scarcely heard at all during Bro. Campbell's stay, completely was he overshadowed by the great name and fame of the latter.

In speaking of the personal appearance of Alexander Campbell, I must confess that I was somewhat disappointed, as is too generally the case with us in reference to great men. They rarely ever come up to the conceptions we have formed of them in our own minds. We are apt to form pretty much the same ideas and conceptions of their persons as of their minds; and as great men are not often remarkable for fine and noble-looking persons, they are generally more or less disappointed in their appearance on seeing them. Hence, on my first beholding Brother Campbell, I was almost tempted to exclaim in my mind, "Is this Alexander Campbell?" But so soon as he had read the portion of Scripture which he had selected, prayed, and entered on his discourse, I was struck with the sense of that real greatness I had always conceived of him from his writings, and impressed with the sublimity of his character. Never can I forget him, such was the impression he made upon me. The tones of his voice, his manner, his appearance and looks, his few but appropriate gestures, will all of them remain vividly impressed upon my mind as long as I live. And the impression, too, which he made upon his audience was such that it can never be effaced from their minds.

One of the greatest characteristics of Bro. Campbell in the pulpit, (as well, too, as out of it) is the air of piety, devotion, earnestness, and sincerity by which he is distinguished. Those who have never seen and heard him, and who have formed their ideas of him from his writings, particularly from those of a controversial character, may have formed conceptions of sternness and rigidity of character and severity, and harshness of manner in reference to him, than which nothing is further from the reality. And in company and conversation his affability, courteousness, gentleness, and familiarity of manner, are calculated to make one soon feel at ease, without detracting from that greatness and superiority which distinguish him. In preaching, he seems to be entirely absorbed in his subject. The transcendently great theme of the Christian religion appears to take entire possession of his soul, and to be paramount to everything else. But his manner, gestures, and the tones and modulations of his voice — how shall I describe them! They are better tell than described, and it is necessary to see and hear him, to form a just conception of them.

But age is at length making its inroads upon the physical constitution and mind of this theological Sampson. Its effects are beginning to show themselves upon him in a perceptible manner on his hoary head, now almost entirely white; and his long, white, flowing beard giving him, along with his pious, devotional manner, a most venerable appearance — in his somewhat shattered and tremulous, though still strong voice, and in a loss of memory, perceptible in unnecessary repetition in his praying and preaching. But it is not to be wondered at, when we consider his great age, now about seventy years, and the immense amount of labor he has performed in studying, writing, preaching, &c. such as would have required an intellectual Sampson or Hercules to have undergone. The wonder is, that he has borne up under it as he has, without having long since begun to decline from its effects. Few men, in any age, could have sustained it as he has; and nothing but the greatest and most unrelenting attention to his health, and regularity in his habits, could have enabled him to do so. But he has the same gigantic mind he always had — the same comprehensive, grasping intellect — the same nice discrimination, quick and keen penetration, correct and decisive judgment, and far-reaching sagacity.

His noble Roman nose, and high, broad, expansive forehead, give Brother Campbell an air of superiority and a commanding appearance, indicating that extraordinary development of the intellectual and moral organs for which he is so remarkable. But one of his most striking features is his eyes. The eyes have been aptly termed the “windows of the soul;” and they are truly so in reference to him. His eyes have a peculiar expression, which is to be seen in his painted portraits — an expression of great depth, penetration, and sagacity of mind, and of philanthropic, devotional, religious feeling — in short, an expression of peculiarity, such as I have never seen before in the eyes of any man with whom I have met.

I have referred to the discourse of Bro. Campbell, to which I had the pleasure of listening. He is not by any means what might be termed an eloquent man, or orator, in the popular sense of the term, as all know who have heard him. Hence we have hundreds of men who surpass him in oratory, and who are far more successful as “recruiters,” or in making converts to the Christian religion. His great forte consists in his powers of argument and reasoning, in which he has few, if any superiors; and in the illustration, explanation, force, and lucidness attending what he says. He seems to throw new light on everything he touches, and to make us see it and feel its force as we never did before. His emphasis, the intonations and modulations of his voice, the expressiveness and force of his language, all combine to rivet the attention of the audience, and to leave a vivid impression on the mind of his power and greatness, not soon to be forgotten or effaced from the memory.

It is generally admitted, even by his most violent and bitter opponents, that Alexander Campbell is one of the most talented, learned, powerful, and greatest men of this, or any other age. Such is the universality of his genius, talents, and knowledge, that he throws light upon every subject and topic of religion that he discusses or notices; and such has been, and is the influence exerted by his writings, preaching, and debates, that it has well been remarked, "there is not a pulpit in the land but is more or less indebted to him"—though perhaps, most of the sectarian world might, and probably will, deny this, and repudiated the source to which they are indebted. His writings have been plagiarized upon, borrowed from, pilfered, &c. ; more, perhaps, than those of any other man. The "divines" of the day, many of them, are guilty of "stealing his thunder," and then abusing him ; and many a theological jackdaw struts the pulpit, decked off in plumes borrowed or stolen from him.

Agreeing in sentiment with him, as we do, we regard him as one of the greatest uninspired men the world has ever produced ; and that such a man has not lived since the days of the Apostles. We regard him as the great restorer of Primitive Christianity to the world—the great instrument in the hands of God, of stripping the Christian system of the human traditions, errors, and appendages by which it has been corrupted, perverted, and obscured, and presenting it to man in all its original purity, brightness, loveliness, attractiveness, and power. In reference to this, we regard him as occupying the position now as to Christendom, that Elijah did in restoring the law to the Jews ; or rather as filling the office of Nehemiah—leading the church out of spiritual Babylon as he did the Jews, after the seventy years captivity, from the literal Babylon, and rebuilding the temple, (the second temple being typical of the present, or second Christian church) and building up the walls and waste places of Zion. Hence we regard Alexander Campbell with a peculiar feeling of veneration, such as we can look upon no man with, who has lived since the days of the Apostles.

Hence, that he is the subject of prophecy we have no doubt—as much so in reference to the restoration of Primitive Christianity, preparing the church for entering upon the millennium, and the religious influence he is exerting and is destined to exert in doing this, as John the baptizer was by Malachi, the last of the Jewish Prophets, under the figure of Elijah. As the Apocalypse, or Book of Revelation, the great final prophecy of the Christian church, consists of four distinctly parallel visions, we regard Alexander Campbell as occupying a parallel place in the one, and at the point of fulfilment, according to history, that we of this and generation now occupy.

The first place where we find him in the vision of the seals, in the first seal, (Rev. viii. 2, &c.) the East be the original place of the church, the term angel signifying a messenger meaning that such a minister or messenger should arise in the church. The second is in the vision of the trumpet (the trumpet being used anciently in war, and this vision showing the military and civil bearing, and influential events on religion or the church) between the sixth and seventh trumpet (Rev. x. 1, &c.) the term heaven be used here for the church, and the expression, "angel come down from heaven," meaning a messenger arising in the church, and "there shall be no longer," there "shall be no longer delay." The third, in the vision of the church, (Rev. xiv. 6-7) the messenger with "the everlasting Gospel," "in the midst of heaven," or occupying a prominent position in the church. The fourth, in the vision of the vials, (Rev. xviii. 1, &c.) showing influence he is to exert in overthrowing spiritual Babylon, which he is exerting, and which is to be the great means effecting, hastening, and consummating its overthrow. Dr. Adam Clark says in his note here, (in his commentary) reference to this last prediction, that John was alluding to some great reformer that should arise, who should enlighten the world with his knowledge and spread the light of truth and religion over the earth. In conclusion we may say of Alexander Campbell with the poet,

"Take him for all in all,
We ne'er shall look upon his like again."

OUR CHRONOLOGY—THE CHRISTIAN ERA.

IN the above discourse of Bro. Campbell, he made some remarks on our current chronology, or rather on the Christian era, which struck my mind with a good deal of force. He said that the Christian era was wrong in commencing with the birth of Christ, and that it should have begun with the rise or setting up of the Christian institution, which was the first Pentecost after the death and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is undoubtedly correct, as our chronology or time should be reckoned from the commencement of that system of religion which Christ came to establish, instead of his birth. It should undoubtedly date with his kingdom, as to establish that was the great end of his mission into the world. When asked by Pilate if he was the King of the Jews? he answered: "Thou sayest"—that is, you say true. And again, when asked by Pilate: "Art thou a king then?" he replied to him: "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice." The Christian era, then, begins properly with the commencement of the kingdom or church of Christ. But such is the almost omnipotent power of long established custom, that our chronology will probably be continued as it is, to the end of the dispensation.

According to the beginning of the Christian era with that of the church, (on the day of Pentecost) the "year of the Lord would be put back some thirty-three years, as it was that length of time from the birth to the death or re- surrection of Christ; and 1859 would become 1826. What would be the result of this on the fulfilment of prophecy, it is impossible to say—whether the dates of its fulfilment would correspond with the current chronology, or whether with that dating from the beginning of the kingdom. As God, when he speaks to man, generally speaks in accommodation to existing circumstances, or such as may take place, and in conformity to such customs and usages as may obtain and prevail, we may reasonably suppose that the prophecies pertaining to the Christian dispensation, would be made in reference to our commonly used chronology. We are the more confirmed in this, as the prediction of the overthrow of Popery, or the dethronement of the Popes of Rome—dating its rise in the year 606, which is generally agreed in, and adding to that the "times, time and half a time," or 1260 years, and taking off of this 33 years—ought to have met its fulfilment about 1836, which we know has not been the case. According to our chronology, we may look for this important event to take place about 1866, which has long been regarded as a period when Romanism is to meet with its downfall—or rather, as we look upon it, the Popes to cease, but the Roman Catholic Church to continue, under its Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, &c. And truly, according to the "signs of the times," we see things tending that way, both in Europe and America. Nothing, however, short of the actual result, will verify our views of these matters.

THE CHRISTIAN RACE.

"So run that ye may obtain" (1 Cor. ix. 24.)

IN ancient Greece, every four years, certain games were celebrated for the entertainment of kings and their subjects. These games consisted of "throwing the discus, wrestling, boxing, and foot, horse, and chariot races." They were celebrated on the Isthmus, not far from Corinth. Paul, knowing that the brethren at Corinth were well acquainted with them, availed himself of their knowledge in order to illustrate and enforce the duties and privileges of the Christian. I will, in what I may say of these games, speak particularly of the foot race.

1. Those who entered the stadium to contend for the prize held up to view, did so according to a strict law, that could not be violated with impunity. Those only were enrolled as candidates who had complied with the requisitions of the law of invitation. If the analogy instituted by the great Apostle be correct in its leading features, it will be found that he who enters the pathway leading to glory and to God, shall do so in accordance with a fixed law. This is so. He who enters the kingdom of Jesus Christ, does so by an infallible, unalterable law. It is said that the laws of the Medes and Persians were irrevocable. Be that as it may, the law of Jesus Christ, by which the sinner enters the covenant with God, is changeless. Time, with its blighting hand, can never annul or destroy it. The race path to immortality is entered by believing with all the capacities of the mind and of the heart, that Jesus Christ is the Son of the living God and the Saviour of such as love and obey him, by ceasing to do evil and learning to do well—by going down into the water, and being immersed into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Jesus Christ has only one church. He said, "On this rock will I build my church." There is, moreover, only one way into his church. Men have devised many ways, still there is only one Bible way. Jesus said, "I am the way." By him and through him the sinner becomes a living member of his church. Hear Him, is the great command. Hear not Moses and the Prophets, but hear the anointed Son of God. Heed not such fallible guides as Luther, Calvin, and Wesley; but heed the voice of the Man of Sorrows. If the Word of God be man's guide in matters of faith and practice, then is the so-called Christian world in error. Here and there are we pointed to highways leading to the church of Christ, but they are outside of the divine record. All the ingenuity of the shrewdest cavilers and of the most artful theological disputants, past and present, has never been able to find for these highways a divine sanction. They are human, earthly, and lead to the subversion of Christianity.

2. Those contending for the prize in the stadium, submitted to the laws of the race. If they violated these laws they were not rewarded. "They took a solemn oath that they would not, by any sinister or unlawful means, endeavour to stop the fair and just proceedings of the games." They could not lawfully "jostle or strip" their antagonists. They looked forward to the goal, at the end of the race-path, and exerted their powers to obtain the proper reward. So, in some respects, with regard to the Christian race. There is a supreme law governing the Christian in thought, word, and action.

The most interesting and profitable themes ever presented to the human family are found in the Bible. These transcendent themes the highest powers of man dwell, and still they are replete with new lessons of wisdom. Such minds as Locke, Newton, and Addison have employed their best energies in searching the sacred Scriptures—in exploring these fields of celestial light and perennial beauty; and still new attractions and new splendours are ever discovered.—But the purest speech found on earth is contained in the Bible. The Christian's speech is to be regulated thereby—is to be moulded by the words of the Holy Spirit. Paul, in writing to the Corinthians, besought "that they all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among them, but that they be perfectly joined together, in the same mind and in the same judgment." Did this obtain throughout the ranks of Christendom, the language of Ashdod would soon come a dead language. As the canon now stands, it seems to be more closely studied and fluently spoken than the pure dialect of Canaan. How soon would all the lovers of truth be joined together in one mind and in one judgment, if they all spoke the same thing—if they called Bible things by Bible names—if they were not compelled occasionally to make a pilgrimage to Geneva, Westminster, or Philadelphia. Also, the Christian's behaviour—actions are to be governed by the words of the Great Teacher. If all the professed followers of Jesus Christ spoke the same things, and would cease to speculate on the commands of the Master, would they not all do the same things? Would not this be a necessary result? Hence, all speculation in matters pertaining to the faith and practice of the disciple of Christ are to be ignored and condemned. The Bible was never designed to satisfy the tions of the speculatist. It was designed for such as would be saved—for such as are willing to receive the kingdom of God with the meekness of a little child. It is right to investigate—to inquire where the truth may be found. This, all must admit. But this differs very much from speculating.—When a command is understood, apprehended, although not comprehended, is it not the Christian's duty to submit to that command? Although the Christian may not perceive any necessary or absolute connection between the command and the results which follow through obedience; still, when the command is understood, the Christian trusting in God, like Abraham, he must obey his king. The blessing will follow. Secret things belong to God—things revealed to man. Does not the disciple of Jesus believe that “all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to his purpose?” If in truth he be a Christian and not an infidel, this he fully and warmly believes.—Then let him do his duty, and happiness present and everlasting will attend him. Duty and happiness go hand in hand all along the pathway of life. Under clouds, in the deepest afflictions, the faithful in Jesus Christ enjoy a happiness which the world can neither give nor take away. Its gold and its silver, its pleasures and honors pass by uncared-for. It is said that the athlete neither looked to the right nor to the left; but fixing his eye on the prize, never for a moment removed it therefrom until the end of his course. Ought not such to be the conduct of those striving for life everlasting? They should certainly, during their mortal career, ever look to Jesus, remembering his sufferings, his wisdom, his power and his goodness. The athlete, moreover, laid aside before beginning the race whatever might impede his progress. In allusion to which custom, Paul, in writing to the Hebrews, says: “Wherefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us. Looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.” Hence, whatever is calculated to weigh the disciple of Jesus down to earth, should be laid aside. Certainly the bliss of heaven is worth more than the pleasures of this world. The end of existence in this life, is to enjoy freedom from sin—to be prepared to meet God in peace—to be prepared for living through ceaseless ages, with the pure, the holy, and perfect.

It is related of an athlete, that while running for the prize, a golden apple was cast across the stadium, just before him, and that he turned aside to pick it up, and lost the crown. So, alas! of thousands of the professed followers of Messiah in this day. They turn aside to grasp the golden apples before and around them. These are,

“Like Dead Sea fruits that tempt the eye,
But turn to ashes on the lips.”

On every side of the Christian rise up the alluring pleasures of a corrupt world. It may be he falters on his way, asks his conscience what he shall do. Perhaps he is admonished to go straight-forward—and pressing on, triumphs over temptations. But anon, the fascinations of life are presented in full view. Again he falters. The glorious personage, who has hitherto encouraged, animated, and cheered him in his course, is now out of view and forgotten. In pursuit of a phantom, it may be wealth or fame, he is disappointed. His labors close in darkness. This is the sad end of many a pilgrim's journey.

Christian, think of Jesus by day and by night—in the thronged city, or alone in the desert—in prosperity, or in adversity—among friends or enemies—on land or sea—in life or in death—and in the last day he will not forget you. His words are: “Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.”

DUNDEE DISCUSSION ON BAPTISM, JUSTIFICATION, &amp;c.

It was affirmed by T. H. MILNER, and denied by JOHN BOWES, that "Baptism is associated with faith, repentance, confession, and invocation of the name of the Lord Jesus, as a term of forgiveness, remission, justification, adoption, and salvation."

THE readers of the Harbinger will do well to peruse this Discussion, although as is too frequently the case, there is much that is irrelevant, and perhaps nothing new. As the question stands, such passages as those in which baptism is not associated with faith, &c. should not have been cited, unless it had been agreed, that if found so associated in various passages—i.e. as terms or conditions of forgiveness, their production would be to the point: as faith, baptism, and forgiveness, in one text; repentance, baptism, and salvation in another, &c. On this principle Mr. Milner draws his conclusions. But does Mr. Bowes also? Let us see. He says, "Faith, repentance, conversion, and calling on the name of the Lord, ensure the reception of forgiveness," &c. (p. 42.) Now these are not all associated in any one verse or chapter. If, therefore, Mr. M.'s theory is to be rejected by citing passages in which baptism is not named, then the theory of Mr. B. must be rejected by the production of texts in which some one of those which he associates are not mentioned. E.g. Mr. B. p. 43, cites Luke xxiv. 47, which, says he, does not associate remission with baptism. What then? It is not so associated, as a term of forgiveness, says Mr. Bowes. But if so, then faith is not so associated with remission, seeing it is not named in Luke xxiv. 47. True, Mr. M. does not profess to find his five items in any one passage, nor does Mr. B. his four. Whether there are four, five, or more "conditions," the question is—Is baptism one of these? Mr. B. denies this; yet does he not admit it when he says of baptism, "It is possible, under certain circumstances, to be saved without it?" And again, "The great Reformers preached justification by faith without ordinances, if there be no opportunity of observing them," &c. (page 12.) When asked, "Will men be saved under certain circumstances without belief?" he replies, "That I leave with Him who knows all things." Mr. B. says, "There is help and blessing in baptism, but it does not take away sin."

And when asked, "What is the blessing?" he replied by quoting Rev. x. 14, which, if so, may be read, Blessed are they who do His commandments (of which baptism is one) that they may have right to the tree of life, &c. (p. 25-6.) Baptism, says Mr. B. (i.e. immersion of such as profess to believe) is "a simple, most beautiful, and most blessed institution" (p. 26.) But what is the blessing? Mr. B. says, "A right to the tree of life," &c. — Mr. M. says, "Forgiveness, adoption, &c. and faithful unto death—a right to the tree of life, &c. Truly Mr. B. magnifies immersion!" "It is," says he, "a duty and a privilege" (p. 12.) — "There is help and blessing in baptism" (p. 12.) "It is a most blessed institution" (p. 26.) Baptism is required, as Mr. B. says, in order "to be in separation from the world" — i.e. to enter the church. And he speaks of "water birth and spirit birth" (p. 37): for, "Except a man be born of water and spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." (But he says is not the church!—p. 12.) Does not Mr. B. depreciate the Gospel? For, says he, in proportion as you magnify baptism, you depreciate the Gospel. In Mr. B.'s opinion Mr. M. magnifies baptism; and in the opinion of thousands of the unimmersed, Mr. B. does so—most offensively so; in pleading for immersion, which, says he, "all believers in the world should attend to" (p. 26.)

But then, with all its beauty and blessedness, it can have nothing to do with our justification, according to Mr. B. because it is an ordinance! "The great Reformers preached justification by faith without ordinances, where they have not been taught." But did the Apostles do so?

When I am asked, as Mr. B. asks Mr. M.—"Do you baptize believers and unbelievers?" I answer, that I baptize those only who believe, and are ready to confess their belief; but how common it is to denominate such as believers before their baptism, in our day, it is quite clear to me that that de-mination was given to the immersed only eighteen hundred years ago. True, there is a sense in which all who believe are believers — and in which all who begin to learn are disciples ; but these terms are only applicable, scripturally so, to members of the church ; and so also of the term Christian, as Mr. M. says, "Men were not recognized as Christians, until they were baptized, in the apostolic age" (p. 27.)

Mr. B. says that Jesus never preached baptism for remission, &c. (p. 16) and asks how it is that Christ, who often stated, before his crucifixion, the terms of salvation, mentions faith but never baptism ? The answer is, that Jesus directed his Apostles to say, He who shall believe and be baptized, shall be saved ; and they did so.* They said, Believe, confess your faith, repent, and be baptized upon the name of the Lord Jesus, for the remission of sins, &c. If Jesus did not mention baptism as a term of salvation before his death, (i. e. when the kingdom of heaven was at hand) he did so before taking his seat at the right hand of the Majesty on high ; even when he had finished his course of humiliation and servitude, and said, All authority is given to me, &c. Jesus did not teach his disciples to assemble in order to break the loaf on the first of the week, or to make a weekly offering ; yet the practice of the Apostles, in these and other things, is enough for us—and, we believe, for Mr. B. also. That they preached baptism in association with faith, repentance, &c. for the remission of sins, Mr. M. has clearly shewn ; and this they did in the name, or by the authority of the Lord, and under the direct guidance of the Spirit. And here is the response to the cases of the prodigal, the publican, and the malefactor, (Luke xvi., xviii., xxiii.) which were before the veil of the temple was rent — before the "change of the Law and of the Priesthood" (Heb. viii. 12) — before the Mediator of the New Institution had exclaimed, "It is finished" — before the apostolic commission had been given, in which baptism had been associated with faith, repentance, &c. for the remission of sins." (See Mat. xxviii. 18, 20 ; Mark xvi. 15, 16 ; Luke xxiv. 46, 49 ; John xx. 21, 23.)

In 1 Peter iii. 21 our translators have made that a type which Peter calls an antitype. Mr. B. makes it both type and antitype. On page 113 he says, "I proved baptism to be a figure from 1 Peter iii. 21 ;" and yet, on the same page renders it, "Even so the antitype immersion saves us." Baptism, he says, is "only a symbol of salvation ; a figure of salvation." — "The symbol, in Titus iii. 5, is baptism, and the thing signified is the holiness of the Christian character." — "The water is the symbolic medium ; the thing signified is the word." — "The water is the symbol ; the thing signified is the Spirit." — "The water is a symbol of the sanctifying power of the Spirit of God." — "The symbol, in Heb. x. 22, is a body washed with pure water ; the thing signified, a heart sprinkled from an evil conscience" (pp. 23-24-113.) Thus Mr. B. makes three types, or figures ; and six antitypes ! If all our "divines" were as figurative as Mr. B. would they not soon make even "the things signified" "mere symbols ?" If one may make baptism — which Mr. B. calls "the water birth" — a type, another may make "the spirit birth" likewise. If the baptized, why not the baptizer ? I have seen Mr. B. baptize, and I had then no idea that his "body" was a mere symbol. And certainly the bodies he immersed were those of real, living men. The water was truly water, and the immersion a literal act. True, Paul says "we are buried in baptism ;" yet not once in the entire Word of God, is baptism said to be a type, figure, or symbol, but contrariwise, an antitype. (I have read of one who professed to find a spiritual meaning in every text—but when referred to the following, he was at a loss : "And Og, King of Bashan, had an iron bedstead.") But Mr. B. goes so far as to bury the figure entirely, in John iii. 5 ; rendering it, Except a man be born of water, even the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God ! And not the water only, but the bath also, if not regeneration, are dispensed with by the substitution of even for and in Titus iii. 5—"the bath of regeneration, even the renewing of the Holy Spirit"!! Why not a hundred other passages thus ? Why not read, "Repent ye, even believe the gospel?" But no! for, says Mr. B. "Repentance itself brings remission!" (p. 22.) But he does not exclude faith, for "faith includes repentance, knowledge," &c.—"You cannot have faith without repentance, (?) but you can have baptism, (?) therefore it is not essential to our salvation" (p. 44.) But this is palpably erroneous, for thousands and tens of thousands believe who do not repent. The Scriptures do not include repentance in faith, nor faith in repentance. It is written, "Repentance towards God, and (not even) faith towards our Lord Jesus." Certain hearers of our Lord believed, (John xii. 42) but their faith did not "include all else;" for it did not include "the good confession," which is clearly a "term or condition of salvation." It is manifest that many of the hearers of Peter believed, yet they were called upon to repent (Acts ii. 37, 38.) In Acts viii. 13, 22, it is expressly said, that "sinners believed" (although Mr. B. flatly denies this, p. 38) and yet he is called upon to repent. The Apostles called upon the unbelieving to believe, and upon all who believed to repent and to be immersed; or, to "repent and turn." Their mission was to bring their fellow-men to "obedience to the faith"—to obey the gospel—to believe and also to purify their souls by obeying the truth. But, says Mr. B. again, "You can have baptism without repentance; therefore, it is not essential." Surely Mr. B. would not immerse an impenitent man if he knew it; and if some one else did so, neither Mr. B. nor Mr. M. contend that such an one would be benefitted thereby.

The question at issue is not whether "justification is by faith and without ordinances if there be no opportunity of observing them:" or, whether "it is possible, in certain circumstances, to be saved without baptism:" or whether "Jesus can save in the absence of water" (pp. 12-31 :) but, "Is baptism a term or condition of salvation?" (p. 39.) What necessity can there be for assuring us that Jesus can save "in the absence of water"—"if there be no opportunity," &c.: if, as Mr. B. asserts, baptism is not a term or condition of salvation? Mr. B. says that "God has had one way of justifying men from the beginning of the world" (p. 15.) That Abraham was not justified by faith and baptism, &c. But was Abraham justified by calling on the name of the Lord Jesus? And if not, would Mr. B. make this a term of forgiveness, adoption, &c.? (p. 42.) If it is so, men were then to call on the name of the Father, but now on the name of the Son; or, if we are now to ask whether in the name of the Son; then, at least, one new term of justification has been introduced. But Mr. B. frequently produces a weapon which cuts both ways. He asks, "What sin remains after baptism to take away, when Christ has borne it all away?" (p. 17.) He might have asked, "What sin remains after faith to take away, when Christ has borne it all away?" &c. Mr. B. asks, "Is the Saviour's work complete without water?" Mr. M. does not ask, but says, "I might as well ask, is the work complete without faith?" The reader open the discussion at page 17 and read thus: If there is no salvation without repentance, in vain do we believe in the Saviour's blood, repentance is a condition, without which, the blood of Jesus Christ will do no soul. Or page 22, and read repentance, conversion, and calling on the name of the Lord are not in the list of conditions (Acts xiii. 38), because they are not needed for justification. (Here Mr. M. substitutes repentance, &c. for baptism for Mr. B.'s argument as effectual as repentance includes the one as the other.) All objections of this kind might be multiplied. As Mr. M. says, "Paul proceeded on an equally philosophical and scientific principle, that all the parts of the truth are necessary to the whole. * * * The sum is predicated of each part as well as the place conducive to the whole: one here, another there," &c.—Ministry, p. 67.*

We must reserve for the press our further remarks on these subjects, and also, on "the second coming of Christ." The perusal of the pamphlet is recommended to aid us in contending earnestly for the faith, once delivered to the saints.

While writing the above, we received a brief report of the "debate" between the Harbinger for May, which, judging from the perusal of the pamphlet, appears to be a very fair one. W. L.

* Of which Mr. B. says, "The attempt to find fault with one part of it is wrong, I recommend you all to read it." (p. 45.) And then he read from page 6

MR. BOWES ON 1 PETER III. 21.

FOR some time time past we have felt persuaded that Mr. Bowes meddles with critical matters too high for him. With the Report of his Debate with Bro. Milner before us, we are prepared to prove, that as a critic, he is thoroughly incompetent or utterly reckless. Personally, we harbour no unkind feeling towards him. In many respects we could esteem him, but for certain unseemly manifestations of character which mar everything lovely.

That he has been a diligent reader of the Holy Scriptures, we frankly admit. But that he is trustworthy in the critical functions he frequently assumes, we deny. And we are convinced that the sooner either he repents, or his credit as a critic is utterly broken, the better. When a public teacher becomes reckless, the sooner he ceases to be trusted in, the fewer souls will be led astray.

Let us examine Mr. Bowes' treatment of 1 Pet. iii. 21, in the recent Debate.

In his last speech, first night, Mr. Bowes presented the following ungrammatical version of this passage: "Even as the antitype, immersion, now saves us, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but a good conscience longing after God) by the resurrection of Christ (p. 37.)

On the second night, in reviewing the previous night's discussion, Bro. Milner thus truthfully and forcibly charged him "with mistranslation of Scripture." After quoting the passage, he observed—"He puts the word conscience in the nominative instead of the genitive, in order to make out the notion of a good conscience longing after God. He supposes that Peter says baptism is a good conscience; but the Apostle does no such thing. Peter says it is the demand of a good conscience, in the sense of a bankrupt demanding his discharge" (p. 49.)

Now we appeal to all competent judges, whether Mr. Milner's was not a just and scholarly reply, effectively oversetting Mr. Bowes' mistranslation of this passage; and whether the latter was not bound to give it every attention. Did not Mr. B. know, or ought he not to have known, that βαπτισμα, "baptism" is the nominative of the verb σῶζει "saves?" Could he have been ignorant that the only words in the parenthesis in apposition with "baptism," because the only words, like "baptism," in the nominative case, are ἀποθεσις, "putting-away," and ἐπερωτημα, "seeking, inquiry, or demand?" Must he not have been aware, that συνείδησις ἀγαθῆς, "of good conscience," is in the genitive, governed by ἐπερωτημα, just as ρυτίς σαρκος, "of filth of flesh," is in the genitive, governed by ἀποθεσις? In other words, was Mr. Bowes not able to discover that "putting-away" and "seeking" were the only words in the parenthesis capable of directly explaining the nature of baptism? And that the remaining words are just necessary to complete the sense, thus: Baptism (nom. case) is NOT the-putting-away (nom. case)—of what? of-the-filth of-the-flesh (gen. case); but it IS the-seeking (nom. case)—of what? of-a-good conscience (gen. case?)

We know of no escape for Mr. B. from the charge Bro. Milner urged, viz. of mistranslation. But let us see how he rebuts it after a day's reflection. Or will he, perhaps, confess his error?

Hear his reply, in his closing speech on the third night! Here it is entire, so far as translating is concerned. "Mr. Milner has only an 'of' to insert in the passage to make it in the genitive instead of in the nominative—'of a good conscience longing after God, by the resurrection of Christ.'"

If another speech had fallen to Bro. Milner's lot, well might he have renewed his exclamation, "I never heard the like of it." Certainly, we never did. "Mr. Milner has only an 'of' to insert," indeed! Mr. Milner has got an 'of' in the right place; one that does not make him look ridiculous. It's for Mr. Bowes to put in the "of"—and that, not into one half the text, as if to escape detection! We defy him to do this without exposing himself most unmercifully. But first take the half-text, as given by Mr. B. in the above extract—"of a good conscience longing after God, by the resurrection of Christ." Brave, Mr. Bowes, and so you have put good conscience into the genitive at last! Well, now be so kind as to tell us what noun governs "good conscience," so as to put it in the genitive? In plain terms, what is "of a good conscience," &c.?

But, if you please, to be brief, we will have the whole text, as translated by you, with the "of" inserted as you propose. We can take it from page 37.—"Even so the antitype, immersion, now saves us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but [of] a good conscience longing after God) by the resurrection of Christ." So, then, unfortunate critic, to hide your own defeat, you have proposed to make Peter say that "Baptism is the putting away--OF A GOOD CONSCIENCE"!! This is what legitimately comes of inserting "only an 'of'" in a passage, already disarranged and mistranslated. There can be no mistake about this dilemma. Baptism is not the putting away of one thing, but (of) another. "Not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but a good conscience longing after God." Yes, it is even so. According to Bowes' translation (?) baptism is the putting away of a good conscience. At this rate, why does not Mr. Bowes say "baptism altogether, alone, the book that enjoins it?"

We write strongly. Mr. Bowes' translation demands it. But we will not while we expose. We hope Mr. Bowes will sincerely repent of his evil doing, and seek forgiveness from that Lord whose word he has mutilated. We shall not feel the indignity of the insults he offers to dear Bro. Milner; and count it at least the telling him to insert a comma into his own mistranslation. We shall let him manifest godly sorrow, in a plain and frank acknowledgment of mind and frank acknowledgment of error, and no human heart shall forgive him more freely than ours.

APPENDIX BY MR. MILNER.

[The Appendix which follows, Bro. Milner wished to be added to the Report of the Discussion, but Mr. Bowes objecting, it has been forwarded for insertion in the Harbinger. What were Mr. Bowes' reasons for making such an objection we are not sure, but it appears to be a pretty correct comment on the course pursued by him in the whole Debate.]

Respecting Origin of the Discussion. Mr. Bowes, in his "Truth Promoter" for February, charged brethren with whom Mr. Milner corresponds with mutilating the Scriptures, &c.; whereon Mr. M. threw back the charge, and challenged Mr. B. to discussion. Mr. B. first made the charge.

Respecting the First Issue. Mr. B. has not touched Mr. M.'s principal argument, i. e. that the commission, "Go, disciple the nations, baptizing them," &c. is so worded that only such as are baptized into the divine name are disciples according to the command. Nor has he condescended to touch upon the import of the words—"baptizing them into the name," "baptized into Christ," "put on Christ," &c. He has not attempted to shew that this does not mean the formal introduction of the believer into the divine relationship indicated by the words "in Christ." Again, Mr. B. admits the whole case when he translates Acts ii 38, "Change your mind, and be immersed upon the name of Jesus Christ into the taking of sins." He mis-states the case. Mr. M. denies figure in the Birth of water is certainly figure in language. Mr. M. did not deny figure, but argued that though baptism is figure, it is nevertheless a term of condition equally so with seals and figures, which, like baptism, are figures and stipulations. Mr. B. misrepresented Mr. M. in charging with implicating the blood of Christ. It is preposterous to say that the blood of a man's being really and fully made just by the Gospel and the blood of Jesus. As well say John i. 7 be so charged in saying walk in the light, the blood cleanses us from all sin.

Respecting the Second Issue. Mr. B. denies preaching justification by faith alone, yet he certainly must when he objects to justification and the obedience of faith, except as on Rom. iv. 25, v. 1, he counts justification prior to faith. I finds the terms katharismos, expiation or purgation, with epheis, remission, and with dikaiosis, justification. He could not give a single instance. In which any one of the nine members of the family of words of which dikaiosis is one, signifies expiation or remission—he could not disprove Mr. M.'s criticism, that they are invariably terms of character. He misrepresented Mr. M. when he sought to make it appear that the character indicated is "the ungodly." Such is the prior character of the justified.

Respecting the Third Issue, Mr. B. offered no reply to Mr. M.'s argument, that the millennium is a vision of the separate state—that the first resurrection is that of the soul—that spiritual elevation effected through the Gospel, and now being fully enjoyed by the spirits of the just made perfect in the presence of the Heavenly Father. While Mr. M. gave passage after passage to move that when the Lord comes the second time it shall be to judge all nations, raise all in the graves, punish everlastingly all who know not God and obey not the Gospel, reward and glorify all the faithful, burn up the present earth and heavens, create all things anew, prove himself the blessed and only Potentate, finish the mystery of God, and introduce the eternal age—Mr. B. on the other hand gave not one scripture in proof that the Lord shall come to introduce the millennium or convert the world. There is no such passage. Mr. B. relied on the words quoted in Rom. xi. from Isaiah lix. "There shall come out of Zion the deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob;" but he could not prove that this coming is not the first: yet that the first advent is the coming in question, is proved by the immediately added words which declare it to be the covenant in which sin is taken away—i.e. the past advent which introduced the present, the new, the everlasting covenant—that alone in which sin is expiated. Mr. B. quoted Heb. viii. 11, "All shall know me, from the least to the greatest," forgetful that these words specify all in the covenant—not all on the earth.

Respecting the Discussion in Edinburgh, the same ground was traversed with slight variations. Mr. M. in preferring the charges of the second night, prefixed the word "wilful" to the charge of misrepresentation, because after having so expressly repudiated Mr. B.'s mis-statements, he could not give him credit for unwittingly changing his terms. Mr. M. also charged Mr. B. with using impious language, because that he exclaimed, "Will the Omnipotent tie himself down to an ordinance?" as if God were a man that he should lie, or the son of man that he should repent. For these charges Mr. B. demanded an apology from Mr. M. on the last evening of the Debate, and in language of the most denunciatory character. Mr. M. stated that he was prepared to defend himself, but being solemnly persuaded of the truthfulness of the charges, he could offer no apology. Mr. B. refused to allow any defence, and the meeting closed upon him with prolonged and reiterated hisses.

MY OWN WORK.

THERE is work for all of us, and there is special work for each. It is work, not for societies or alliances, but it is work for individual minds and hands. It is work which I cannot do in a crowd, or as one of a mass, but as one man acting singly, according to my own gifts, and under a sense of my personal responsibilities. There is no doubt, associated work for me to do; I must do my work as part of the world's great whole, or as a member of some body. But I have special work to do as one individual, who, by God's plan and appointment, have a separate position, and also a separate work—a work which, if I do not do it, must be left undone. No one of my fellows can do that special work for me which I have come into the world to do. He may do a higher work and a greater work—but he cannot do my work. I cannot hand my work over to him, any more than I can hand over my responsibilities or my gifts. Nor can I delegate my work to any association of men, however well-ordered and powerful. They have their own work to do, and it may be a very noble one; but they cannot do my work for me. I must do it with these hands.

and with these lips, which God has given me. I may do little, or I may do much—that matters not; it must be my own work. And by doing my own work, poor as it may seem to some, I shall better fulfil God's end in making me what I am, and more truly glorify His name, than if I were either going out of my sphere to do the work of another, or calling another into my sphere to do my proper work for me. The low grass tuft is not the branching elm, nor is it the fragrant rose, but it has a position to occupy, and a work to do, in the arrangements of God for this earth of ours, which neither elm nor rose can undertake.

Besides, I have a crown to win; and who can win it for me? I cannot reach it through the toil of another, through the operations of any society or I must win it for myself. No man can wear it for me, and no man can win it for me. I must forward to the mark for the prize of high calling. My right of entrance into the kingdom has, I know, been won for me by the Son of God. That work for Him alone to do. As He has done it! I owe my deliverance to His blood alone—I owe my access to His righteousness alone. But there remains a race for me to run to the prize to secure. And therefore I must work without ceasing, 'with meekness upon the glory to be revealed when the Lord returns; forgetting what is behind, and reaching on to what is before, "if by any means I may attain the resurrection of the dead."

LETTER FROM JERUSALEM.

JERUSALEM, Feb. 1, 1859.

"Faint, yet pursuing," I am again permitted, in the good providence of the Lord, to address you under circumstances of much mercy — though still suffering somewhat from rheumatic pains—as are several others also, beneath our leaky dome, though in a less degree.

Although the indications of success are rather more encouraging than when I last wrote, yet it is not my privilege to record any actual accession to our little fold. Indeed, I have heard of no conversions to Protestant ranks anywhere in Syria for a length of time, though we are occasionally grieved to hear of sad perversions and apostacies. Amongst these is the case of a once promising Jewish proselyte of one of the Protestant missions here, who, the other day went over, body, soul, and spirit, to the Moslem faith—not, however, they say, without a handsome temporal consideration by way of quietus to conscience; and he now sports his Islamism in the lordly dress of Effendi.

The magnificent "patriarchal palace" at Beit Jalah, near Bethlehem, is at last completed; and there is said to have been some rare bidding in the spiritual bazaar between his lordship, the "Grand Guardian and Custodian of Sacred Localities," and certain other "Lords spiritual." By means of this pious traffic in souls, these poor, degraded, sap-sucking Greeks and Latins are to drive a very thrifty business, -serving a turn.

Another Papal structure, the A. Hospice, is also completed in fine, and has been turned over to the management of the Hospitalers or Knights of St. John, who after so long a disuse have thus again a name and habitation in the place of their

It is asserted, on what would be reliable authority, that a corps of missionaries, numbering more than a hundred, inclusive of assistants, will soon be expected to arrive from England. But what they can find to do is a mystery.

There is also expected an early arrival of one hundred more of the "Armenians," as they are generally called, who are only about sixty of this sect of Christians here at present. No less than eight thousand are expected to be making preparations to settle hereabouts. Claiming to be the first of par excellence, they style themselves Aymanites — deriving this designation from the Hebrew word for which is almost identical with the Arabic word ayman. Unlike the low Italians and degraded wretches of various nations, to be found in every nook and corner of Jerusalem, the Germans appear to be quite respectable as far as my observation extends. They certainly entertain some ratio notions in relation to the existing obligations of circumcision, and the Sabbath or seventh day of the week, the non-inspiration of the Epistles of the Apostle Paul, and the advent of the Prophet Elijah, whom they maintain to be no other than a certain rather quixotic personage who has recently disappeared quite mysteriously, but who, they allege, has merely gone to paradise for a while, and will reappear, as he has done several times before, and will soon lead them into the Land of Ammon ! The term "Ammonites" is not, therefore, a misnomer, as might be supposed ; though they usually denominate themselves Aymonites — the faithful ! But notwithstanding their extraordinary pretensions to Christianity, the privilege of interment in the English cemetery was unhesitatingly denied them by the Anglican Bishop on occasion of the death of one of their members a week or two ago, upon the express ground that they are not Christians at all.

It is not a little astonishing, that besides this confident aspirant to the honours of the office of the "Elijah that was for to come," there are two others here, claiming not only the mantle, but personal identity to the prophet, (one of whom greatly annoys the worshippers in the Anglican church, and the residents near his sanctum, by the continual blowing of the prophetic trumpet,) while a fourth has returned to the United States, and it is to be hoped — to his service too.

Time was, when the name of "Merikane" was a passport to favor and consideration in these ends of the earth ; but I am sorry to say, that American character has suffered a good deal of late at the hands of certain visitors and sojourners, amongst whom are not only divers "notables" of great celebrity, but presumptuous paupers and parasites on the foreign residents. But begging, in high quarters, is carried on in a still more objectionable manner, much to the annoyance of travellers—more than 2000 pounds being squeezed out of travellers by one mission alone, in a single season !

If prophecy does not point to such a strange state of things, is not the present condition of Jerusalem a most inexplicable enigma ? I may indite, in relief, however, by way of offset to the foregoing, the consoling fact that a well appointed Scotch mission is about to be established here, in special reference to the educational wants of the rising generation of all castes — Jews, Christians, and Gentiles—a great desideratum certainly.

A fearful storm swept over Syria a few weeks ago, by which, as I learn by letter just received from Beirut, five British vessels, besides other foreign craft, went to pieces in that port, though fortunately only three lives were lost. But besides the wreck of foreign vessels in the harbour, some forty or fifty of the small native coasters called falukas were wrecked in that immediate vicinity. By the bye, observing a Beirut newspaper lying before me, I conclude to send it to you in proof of the improving condition of Turkey. Mayhap you would like to favour your readers with a few extracts — though the fearful dearth of vowels may not be in exact accordance with your views of perspicuity, and may hence prove rather perplexing to you, as it certainly does to me—there being only three, properly speaking, in all the language, and they not expressed more than once or twice in a score or two lines.

The Germans undertook to establish a newspaper in this city a few weeks ago, but unfortunately, the Arabs having taken it into their heads to relieve the editor of all his superfluous goods and chattels, in carrying out their benevolent intentions toward the "Khawager Namsowch," knocked all his type into a most inedible kind of pi ! and had he made the slightest resistance, would have knocked the hated Giaour into eternity, for there were no less than ten of them, all armed to the teeth. And thus untimely ended the Jerusalem Chronicle, before it had fairly entered upon the infancy of its existence.

One of those sudden monetary changes, for which the Pashalic of Jerusalem is so famous, has just occurred, and caught some of us—indeed all, except a few privileged money jobbers who are in the secret—unawares. My loss is only about a thirtieth ; but those who happened to have on hand coins of certain denominations, lose much more. This sudden and arbitrary depreciation of the currency by public decree is said—but with what truth I undertake not to affirm—to be a game very profitably played off by a temporary combination of Bashas and bankers, when the public disbursements are completed and taxes are about to be collected. The present Basha, however, I can scarcely suppose, from what I know of him, capable of such collusion. He is far above the usual order of Bashas, and has twice most kindly laid me under special obligations to his excellency, and every visitor, as well as resident of the Holy City, is indebted to him for his excellent sanitary and general municipal regulations. Among other very wholesome acts, was the imprisonment of forty bakers, for selling bread below the legal weight to-day he has excluded all milk from the city for a late advance charges. Never perhaps since the Frank<sup>9</sup> kingdom, have the streets of Jerusalem been so thoroughly cleansed. O, that the time were come "cleansing of the sanctuary!"

Earnestly invoking a continuance of your intercession at the throne of grace, believe me, dear brethren, sincerely and devotedly yours,
J. T. BARRETT

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICES.

PRESIDENT SHANNON.

THE death of the gifted and loved James Shannon, LL.D. of Christian University, has just been announced to the brethren. The loss of this worthy man to the cause of the Saviour will be lamented by all his friends. You will please allow a grateful, though absent student, who was brought up under his kind care, to present you a few general thoughts concerning this truly Christian nobleman. We propose not, however, an extravagant eulogium on his character, but simply a statement of such facts as will interest his many admirers and acquaintances.

He was born and reared to manhood in Ireland. At an early age he graduated with the highest honors at the University of Belfast, and by the request of a pious father, prepared himself for the Presbyterian ministry. When about nineteen, he emigrated to the United States, and took charge of an intelligent congregation in Augusta, Ga. The principalship of a flourishing seminary was soon tendered to him by that denomination.

His investigating mind, about this time, was called to the ordinance of baptism, administered, as he then thought, so strangely by some on the American shores. After he had examined the subject, however, long and prayerfully, in his own language, he "would have given the world" for one text to quiet his conscience: but when convinced, he nobly acknowledged his error, as he had "from boyhood" resolved always to do. He was immersed by a Baptist minister, but soon after identified himself with the Christian church.

His next literary promotion was to the chair of Ancient Languages in the University of Athens. From this time his name has been intimately connected with the educational interests of the whole country. During his useful life he called to fill the Presidency of the Indiana State University; also that of the College, Kentucky; that of the State University of Missouri; and at the time of his decease he was presiding over the University, Missouri. We need not speak particularly of his connections with these honorable positions. As a private officer he could not be excellent; his actions and writings as a teacher, gave him an extended and enviable reputation among men of letters.

There were many beautiful elements blended in his character. He was affectionate to his family, kind to his friends, tasteful in his dress, and urban in his manners. As a Christian he was as a preacher he was acceptable; as a scholar he was accomplished, as a gentleman he was unexceptionable. The most intricate machinery of government was familiar to him. He loved liberty and its institutions, and ardently desired their preservation. His acquaintance with these subjects was more evident, when his excellent Moral Science is published.

The critically Greek acumen of President Shannon made him an efficient translator for the Bible Revision Association. He gratuitously revised Luke's Gospel, and otherwise contributed greatly to this, the most transcendently important work of the nineteenth century. His views on many questions were in advance of our generation, and prevented them always being appreciated. No scientific notions whatever, which conflicted with the present revealed condition of things, were cherished by him. Railroads, and similar works of general interest, were his sympathy. But his labours were cut short by a severe stroke of paralysis a year ago, caused him to decline rapidly.

voice, once so eloquent, gave way. He meekly bowed and kindly bade us farewell. On Friday, the 25th of February, at his residence in Canton, he died, being in his sixtieth year. A suitable monument will doubtless be erected to his memory. We mourn with his bereaved family, a part of whom are yet on earth, and a part in heaven. J. C. Rusk.

MARY R. WILLIAMS.

DIED, at Jaffa, Palestine, on the 17th December, 1858, Miss Mary R. Williams, aged 78 years.

Miss Williams was an English woman. She came to this country in the year 1835, or the one following, a middle aged maiden lady. She was an Episcopalian lady, with some tendency to Independency, or Congregationalism. She had an enquiring and self-reliant mind, which, much improved by academic and æsthetic culture, ripened into high development by high intercourse with some of the most celebrated philanthropists, scholars, and officials of Europe; an intercourse which her knowledge of French and Italian greatly facilitated. Her masculine mind and decision of character, however, were associated with an undue confidence in those who had secured either her sympathies or her admiration. This misguided deference to overpowering minds led her into misfortunes, both in this country and in Asia. She loved truth with the simplicity of a child and the devotion of a martyr.

The undersigned was thrown into her company the day she arrived in Cincinnati fresh from London, and by degrees the acquaintance, thus begun, ripened into intimacy. At my residence she saw and admired Bro. Campbell, and felt confirmed in her determination to change her ecclesiastical relations. I baptized her in the swollen flood of the Ohio, in the presence of a few select friends. After I removed to Georgetown, Ky. she followed, and taught music, painting, and modern languages in Georgetown, in connection with Thornton F. Johnson. Upon my return to Ohio, she engaged with Bro. P. S. Fall, at Poplar Hill, and thence she moved to Lexington, where she pursued similar avocations for a time.

She spent some years in Philadelphia, and coming under the influence of Mrs. Minor, she left the West for ever, taking England en route; and uniting her fortunes with that lady and the celebrated Christian Jew, John Mashullum, she settled in the Valley of Artos, near Jerusalem. In her estimation Mashullum proved himself to be more Jew than Christian, as she departed his premises minus the money with which she entered them. She complained bitterly of him and the British Consul, Finn, who sheltered her oppressor. However, but little else could have been expected from an enterprise undertaken under the false notion that Providence will aid every well-meant action, be it planned as it may, or be it without plan. These zealous women, professing to trust the support of their mission to God, and starting with a small personal outfit, after the disaster at Artos, fell back upon their friends. This connected Sister Williams for a short time with the missionary efforts of Dr. Barclay, at Bethlehem. Ultimately she settled at Jaffa, and opened an independent school, which she sustained with various fortune for many years, at the expense of the Christian sisters of America. The Missionary Society being unwilling to expend its funds on a private school, Mrs. Burnet made a call upon the sisterhood for aid to her praiseworthy efforts, and several hundred dollars were received and forwarded to Jaffa, in that way. Since we left Cincinnati, Sister Campbell has performed a similar kind office in placing Miss Williams beyond the fear of want.

A great woman has fallen! I would have preferred that she had died among us, and once wrote her several reasons for her return to our country, one of which was, that while her labours must prove comparatively fruitless at Jaffa, she would soon need the supporting presence of friends to sustain the weight of declining years. Probably sharing in the delusion that the personal appearance of the Son of God is near at hand, she chose to remain close to the spot where that notion led her to expect him to plant his feet. She always dared to live her doctrine, and the number is small that do it.

D. S. BURNET.

To the above we may add the graceful tribute of Sister S. H. Campbell:—

On reading the above information, many and various were the thoughts and emotions of my heart. And so, thought I, the pious, the devoted, the energetic, the self-consecrated and suffering missionary, Sister Williams, has thus passed over Jordan, and gone to her rest in the Jerusalem above. Truly her example has been a good one. The unwavering faith she has exhibited in the promises of God, in going to a foreign land, and in enduring so many privations, for what she considered His cause and His glory, should be a stimulus to her Christian sisters in the faith, to labor and to endure trials and difficulties that may lie in their pathway in order to accomplish good.

The Christian worthies of olden times are set forth as our exemplars, and certainly we should rejoice to see the power of Christian faith and love so eminently displayed in the service of our Master at the present day, as was developed by our departed and venerated sister, especially in the closing season of her life. Our beloved Sister Barclay, when in America, narrated to me many interesting incidents concerning the life and labors of our beloved sister, which cannot be adverted to here. It is to say, that we have the fullest and consolation in the confident assurance that she has gone to a land of perfect rest.

"Where the anthems of rapture unceasingly sound,
And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul."

HERE AND THERE.

How rapidly pass the few years of our life !

How swiftly the seasons roll by !

We scarcely have time to look round on the scene,

When, lo ! we are told, we must die.

But why should we grieve at a sentence so just ?

Why cling to a nature so frail,

While madness and folly, oppression and crime,

And all hateful passions prevail ?

And why do we dread,

The dark house of the dead ?

Why shudder at life's parting knell ?

Since our days, although brief,

Are beclouded by grief,

And 'midst evil on all sides we dwell ?

Alas ! 'Tis our sin ! We're unworthy of life !

And guilt all our terror imparts !

'Tis conscience alarms us ! We fear to confront,

The all-seeing Searcher of hearts !

Yet rejoice ! for the mercy of God which endures !

Yea, exult ! in that love which our safety ensures !

For "Christ died for the sins of the world !"

And he lives, that the pity of God might outrun,

The swift steps of each rash disobedient son ;

And that sin from its throne might be hurl'd.

And he reigns, that of all who believe and obey,

Not one should be lost on that terrible day,

When his Ensign of Judgment's unfurl'd.

Pass rapidly then, O, ye grief-laden years !

And swiftly ye seasons speed by !

While there's time to examine our treacherous hearts,

And "number our days" ere we die !

Then we'll no longer dread,

The lone house of the dead ;

But rejoice 'midst our sorrow and tears !

For, though dark clouds to-day,

May o'ershadow our way,

A rainbow of promise o'er-arches our fears.

And the plant that is planted in Jesus' lov'd name,

Shall blossom in glory, though nurtured in shame.

NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS, CRITICISMS, &amp;c.

BIBLE REVISION AND DR. CUMMING.

WHEN Dr. Cumming declared against the Bible Union and Bible Revision, we might have been excused for thinking that he was not often compelled to correct the Authorized Version. We have, however, just heard a lecture in the Temperance-hall, Birmingham, in which the Doctor did not get along over well with the said version. First, we were told that the Lecturer was not about to address himself to the Rev. Chairman and the few clergymen present — that he was about to offer a few remarks upon a Greek word, and should assume that his hearers were (we suppose only so far as knowing the meaning of that word is concerned) as ignorant as Pagans. The Rev. Gentleman's hearers were not from the workshops — it was a mid-day lecture, and therefore the assembly was not composed of persons from the lowest scale of the social pyramid. They had read the verse, or the part of a verse under examination, and yet, in regard to its meaning, the Doctor assumes they are as ignorant as Pagans. Surely the text under consideration must contain some dark saying, hard to be understood. Let us hear it, "And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch." Pages upon pages have been written to prove and disprove the assertion, that these disciples were first so called by their enemies as a name of reproach. Dr. Cumming, however, settles the question at once. "They were called so not by themselves, not by their enemies, but by their God." But why have we not known this long ago, and how does the Doctor know it? He answers, the verb translated called is improperly translated; it should have been rendered "called of God." Now will he have the goodness to say, why this text should not be revised and corrected? Why should the people be unable to learn this from the Bible? Why obliged to keep a Rev. Doctor to correct the errors of the Bible? We can only give one reason — that the "laity" may be kept dependent upon the "clergy." One good reason, out of many, may be added, for making the people as independent of such teachers as possible. That is, because when a man talks learnedly about Greek verbs, we are not always sure that he is competent to do so; or, if competent, that he has taken the requisite care in forming his conclusion. We could rest much more satisfied were the words "of God" added to the word "called" by the consent of a body of revisers of no one sect, but appointed solely on account of their known qualifications, than upon the assertion of Dr. Cumming. We make these remarks without intending to admit that kreematizo in Acts xi. cannot be correctly translated without the words "of God" — without being understood as accepting the Doctor's translation.

But our Rev. Opposer of Bible Revision by a competent Board of Revisers, and Advocate of Revision by himself, did not close his lecture without another attack upon the Common Version. He informed us that the beauty of the Lord's teaching in those precious words (John x.) which refer to the one fold, is lost by mistranslation. "We should have one flock, not one fold." Certainly! Don't we know that the Lord intended to have a Church of England fold, a Presbyterian fold, a Baptist fold, and so on? But how the translators have obscured this glorious truth! How thankful we ought to be for this increased revelation of the Word of God, and that Dr. Cumming is raised up to make it known! Nevertheless our hard and obdurate heart says—Give us a revised and corrected Bible, and we shall do quite well without the Doctor.

THE VOICE OF THE CHURCH ON HOLY BAPTISM.—No. II.

IN our former notice of a Lecture by the Rev. Hugh Stowell, of Manchester, we agreed with him in the following particulars :—"Baptism saves, but never when it is not faithfully received. It is the consummation, rather than the cause of the new birth. Faith always preceded baptism. Faith and repentance are pre-requisites, not consequents, &c." To put the whole into one sentence — baptism translates those subjects into a new relation to Christ and his church, whose hearts have been previously changed by the belief of the truth, and thus it is "into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit."

We further noticed Mr. Stowell's avowal, that the baptismal service of the Church of England is strictly in accordance with the above. Nor have we much fault to find with this avowal, so far as it relates to adult baptism, in regard to which the Lecturer urges, that while "the church" declares that therein the subject is regenerated and made a child of God and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven, it does so only on the ground of faith and repentance previously professed, treats the confessing subjects as sincere and truthful, which it is bound to do, or to refuse the rite on the ground of unfitness, and that the church is therefore only to be considered as declaring the subject regenerate and in the kingdom of heaven, when faith and repentance precede the baptism. So far, then, we have New Testament doctrine, but now onward Canon Stowell has to wade up to his neck in the mire of difficulty. He must defend infant baptism on the same ground, or give up the Prayer Book to the Tractarian. He says :—

"Having so far cleared the way, it remains that we now grapple with what may be looked upon as the point of special difficulty in the controversy which has so long been agitated on this subject. Of course I mean the case of baptized infants. It may be, and it will be asked, how does all that has been argued bear on irresponsible babes? Would not the train of reasoning which has been pursued forbid the little ones to come to Christ through his own appointed door, and of necessity limit baptism to persons of matured age? Such an inference we utterly repudiate. We yield to none in cordial acquiescence in the decision of our church—'that the baptism of young children is in anywise to be retained in the church as most agreeable with the institution of Christ.' As infants, under the dimmer dispensation of the Law, had received the Jewish sacrament of circumcision, in obedience to the solemn injunction of God, it followed as an inevitable consequence that children should receive the Christian sacrament of regeneration, under the brighter dispensation of the Gospel, except they were specifically shut out, and so great a blessing by Divine authority.

Circumcision the Jewish sacrament of regeneration! Pure nonsense!! Jewish infant required not a new birth to constitute him a descendant of Abraham and place him under the Mosaic economy—his birth did that, and circumcision was not a seal of his birth (that it was to Abraham alone) but a sign that his flesh was from Abraham, and so far is it from the truth, that circumcision introduced the infant into a new community, that the church declares, not that the uncircumcised shall not be received, but that he who is not circumcised shall be cut off from the people.

"Still (says Mr. Stowell) the question presses us—What does the church declare the efficacy of baptism in the case of infants to be?" We doubt not Mr. Stowell found the pressure very severe, is, however, an uncompromising man. Let us hear him on what it is not, and on what it is.

"Does she hold, as some contend, that because in them there can be no moral growth or hindrance, they therefore become ritually and inevitably new creatures? Christ? Or does she hold, as others contend, that she can explain her strong and unequivocal language to mean, that they are brought within the fence of the church, and entitled to claim and plead the promises of the Gospel? That that is not her doctrine, we shall soon satisfy you; that the latter is not her doctrine is too obvious to be denied. Nor would it ever have been denied by any man, if the controversy warped his mind. As she does, the same broad and deep language in the baptism of the infant as she does in the baptism of the adult is fair, is it honest, to lower or explain its force in the one case, whilst we necessarily retain it in the other? We therefore—nay, we contend—that she declares, in the fullest sense of the term, the baptized infant to be 'regenerate,' 'born anew of the Spirit,' 'made an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven.' The point to be decided is, on what ground she makes these declarations—on what assumption they are built. We believe they proceed on the very same ground in the of the child that they do in the case of the adult—the charitable assumption of sincerity and consequent faithfulness on the part of the individual baptized."

Is it possible that Mr. Stowell can talk of sincere and faithful infants? Without doubt he does so talk. Bring together the following quotations from the lecture, and then, ye Baptists, hide your diminished heads, as ye think of the wonderful babies of the State Church! Surely great grace must rest upon them.

1. "The ordinance never saves but when it is faithfully received—it is the consummation rather than the cause of the new birth."—"That profession of faith which we find from Holy Scripture always preceded the reception of baptism."—"Repentance and faith are pre-requisites rather than consequents."—"Baptism is the complement, not the commencement of regeneration."—"They that received the word gladly were baptized."

2. "The services of the church are framed for faithful penitents, not for faithless sinners."

Now let us hear Mr. Stowell further:

"That such is the view of the church in the baptism of those who are of riper age, has, we may venture to say, been undeniably proved: and where does she express any different view in relation to those who are baptized in infancy? Not in her articles, for these recognise no distinction between the two cases, but speak of them in general; and since infant baptism is her rule, adult the exception to her rule, it follows that her reference must have been to the former as expressly, at the least, as to the latter. Neither does she indicate any change of ground in her service for the baptism of infants—the sponsions required are virtually the same—the exhortations given are but slightly varied—the prayers offered up are scarcely altered. True, the child acts and answers through the medium of others; yet it is the child himself who is regarded as acting and answering."

"That the positive language used by our church in reference to the baptized infant, as in reference to the baptized adult, is founded on the assumed good faith with which the engagements of the covenant are undertaken, is made specially plain where we should expect the greatest plainness—in her catechism for children. In that wise, though much vilified and misunderstood compendium of instruction, one of the questions put in reference to baptism is, 'What is required of persons to be baptised?' to which the answer returned is, 'Repentance, whereby they forsake sin; and faith, whereby they steadfastly believe the promises of God made to them in that sacrament.' How fully this accords with what we have explained the mind of our church on this sacrament to be, we hardly need stop to remark."

"If the service for infant baptism went not on the principle which we have striven to illustrate, it would be out of harmony with all the other services of the church; for we cannot forbear reminding you again, that they all assume the spirituality and sincerity of those who use them."

Thus we must leave our Anti-Tractarian Lecturer. He is a man of mighty faith, but unfortunately he believes the Prayer Book as he believes the Word of God, and therefore seeks to reconcile two irreconcilable things, (infant baptism and the Scripture doctrine of baptism) and therefore insists upon counting infants believers when he knows they are not.

THOMAS COOPER.

OUR readers no doubt have heard of Mr. Cooper's publicly-declared return to the faith he had abandoned—of his frequent proclamation of the Gospel to large gatherings, and of his announced intention to be immersed in order to become a General Baptist. Some of us know that Mr. Cooper's descent to that region where the truths and divine origin of Christianity are denied, was, if not caused, at least greatly promoted by the false and tyrannical system he had adopted as Christian. His eclipse of faith being over, we felt anxious that Mr. C. should not return to an unauthorised and sectarian system, but embrace that divine order of things presented once for all by the Apostles. This anxiety led us to forward the following note:—

"Dear Sir,—Some years back I communicated to the Committee of the John Street Institution (Tottenham Court Road, London,) a protest against the opponents of Christianity lecturing in their Hall. This I did, on the ground that the said lecturers knew not what Christianity really is. I proposed to discuss in their institution either with Mr. Holyoake or with Mr. Thos. Cooper, the questions—What is the Christian System? What are its Legitimate Effects?—I named these two gentlemen from conviction that they were conscientious in their avowals, and though mistaken, nevertheless honest; which conviction, I am happy to say, so far as yourself is concerned, has increased in strength up to the present time. The committee arranged for the discussion, and in 1850 I spent three evenings in debate with Mr. Holyoake.

Now, my dear Sir, permit me to congratulate you on the revival of your faith in the glorious Gospel of the grace of God, also on your increased knowledge in relation to the "One Baptism" of the Lord's church. At the same time, I wish to observe that that important enquiry, What is the Christian economy? demands still further and immediate attention at your hands. Looking at the causes which were (according to your own statement) active in moving you to the dreary regions of scepticism, I conclude, that the scale was turned to the unfavourable side, by the fact that you had been led to adopt a human economy in place of a divine one. In a word, that you had received some one of the Methodist polities as divine, or else fallen in with the erroneous conclusion that the Lord had left unsettled the polity of his church, that human legislation must step in to arrange and re-arrange, according to prevailing notions. Will you, dear Sir, give the Acts and Letters of the Apostles an examination, with the enquiry before you—Were the faith, ordinances, and government of the church, by the Lord Jesus, given once for all by the Apostles? I submit that they were—that the dire apostacy results from changing the said faith and order, and that the present great work of the Lord's believing people, is to restore the primitive polity and faith of the church, without which, its oneness, as prayed for by the Lord himself, (John xvii.) cannot be realized, for the want of which oneness infidelity abounds.

I am thankful to be able to add, that this truth is now every year finding a firmer lodgment in the hearts of multitudes, and that in thus pleading for one divine economy, perfected by the twelve Apostles of the Lamb. I am in company with at least 300,000 persons in this country, our colonies, and the United States. To save writing, I enclose a printed synopsis, and invite you to enter with me into an investigation of the propositions submitted therein.

The investigation may be upon the platform in London, Birmingham, Manchester, or Nottingham, or by private interview, for which purpose I shall not object to journey some distance (my present abode is Birmingham.) If preferred, it may be by letters for publication, or by private correspondence.

In conclusion, I only add that I moved thus to address you, by the conviction that such investigation would tend to the glory of God; increase your usefulness, and be conducted in a fair and thorough Christian spirit, not for mastery, but truth.—Your's, my dear Sir, in the hope of eternal life,
DAVID KIRK

Unfortunately Mr. C. is full, needing nothing. His friends think he should join some denomination, and as immersion is proper, he'll join the Baptists; not that baptism is anything. As to the oneness of Christ's church, he does not believe in it. If it were otherwise, would have a pope, and become a despotic tyranny. He praises God for his divisions, and thus supports what ought to be ashamed of, and glorifies in his shame. Conscious of his own weakness, he looks upon those who reject his conclusions as very little people. He would have thought that his former treatment might have convinced that sects and divisions are not the antidote for tyranny. Its antidote can only be found in that divine economy which has but one Head and Lord, who is enthroned in heaven, whose subjects are all brethren and priests, and whose legislative work was entirely accomplished through his twelve Apostles. Mr. C. has walked over the bridge of history, and does he not know that spiritual despotism did not exist, because it could not, until the apostolic order was departed from, until human legislation was admitted into the church. Mr. Cooper's lauded divisions and strongholds of his deplored tyrannical

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH

The doctrine of justification by Christ, is a doctrine that is full of comfort to the sin-sick soul. Paul preaches the doctrine of justification by faith without the deeds of the law. But the doctrines of men would make him the doctrine of justification by works without obedience to the gospel.

To show that we are justified by faith before any act of obedience on our part, we are referred to Rom. iii. 20. "Therefore by the deeds of the law there can be no flesh justified in his sight." Is it true that in obedience to the pel, there shall no flesh be justified in his sight? But to make it more emphatic, we are told that in the original, it reads, "Therefore by the deeds of law, there shall no flesh be justified" &c. It is argued that the leaving out the article "the," makes it mean, by the deeds of law, of any kind, there shall no flesh be justified in his sight. I have no objection to the above reading, although it is evident that the law of Moses was in the mind of the Apostle. To say that law, however, has nothing to do with man's justification, is to make Paul inconsistent with himself. For he says, Rom. viii. 2, "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made me free from the law of sin and death," &c. Here we are plainly taught that the spirit of life has a "law," by which Paul was made free from the law of sin and death. This law, Ananias preached to Paul, (Acts xxii. 16) in these words, "Why tarriest thou? Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord." If this language was preached to Paul as an unbeliever, then he was taught justification by works. But if he was addressed as a believer, then he was taught justification by faith, in obedience to Jesus Christ.

That the Lord proposes to justify man by deeds of law; saying, do so much, and you shall enjoy, or receive so much in return, is not the doctrine of Paul. But he says, Gal. iii. 12, "The law is not of faith, but the man that doeth them shall live in them." But the gospel reads, "Without faith it is impossible to please him; for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." The Apostle here clearly distinguishes between believing and coming to God. Again, Acts xi. 21, "A great number believed and turned unto the Lord."

To say that believing is turning, or coming to God, is accusing the Apostles of inconsistency. To say they were justified in believing, before turning to the Lord, comes near saying they were justified by faith only. But to say that they were justified in believing when they turned to the Lord, is what Paul everywhere taught the people.

But I think the Apostle would hardly be called orthodox, should we make him substitute gospel for law, and obedience for works. That the reader may see the point readily, I will place the doctrine of Paul, and the doctrine of men in juxtaposition:

PAUL.

Rom. iii. 28,
"Therefore, we conclude, that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of (the) Law."

DOCTRINE OF MAN.

"Therefore, we conclude, that a man is justified by faith alone, without obedience to the Gospel."

To quote Rom. iv. 4, 5, 6, the same way, or Gal. ii. 16, would seem like ridiculing the opinions of others. This I have not in my heart to do, although I would wish to lead all to see the absurdity of such an interpretation. In all the preaching of the apostles, recorded in the Book of Acts (and that is the only book in which we have a discourse recorded that was preached to the unconverted) there is not a word said about justification before yielding to the claims of Jesus Christ. Peter says, Acts iii. 26, "Unto you first, God having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." The words of Peter, Acts ii. 38, must therefore have their full force, without any misgiving on the part of him who sincerely inquires the way of life. His language we should not blush to quote, "Repent and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins," &c. To say that he addressed them as unbelievers; is equivalent to saying that he taught them salvation by deeds of law. And to say that he addressed them as believers; is to say that Peter did not teach justification by faith alone.

O, that men would fear the Lord, and fear to trifle with his word. Let us labour to keep the leaders and the led from falling into the ditch. May the sword of the Spirit be speedily unsheathed from the traditions of men, and its glittering point be made to pierce the sinner's heart, that he may be led to enquire the way of life from the Book of God! A. B. G.

CEASE YE FROM MAN.

SUCH was the exhortation of the prophet in days of old. "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of (or reckoned upon)?" (Isaiah ii. 22.) This admonition is as appropriate now as in the days when it was first uttered. Men are still just as prone as ever to lean upon an arm of flesh, to adore wealth, to worship talent, to idolize eloquence, to court popular applause—

"O, popular applause! what heart of man is proof against thy sweet seducing charms?"

"O yes," it may be said, "human nature is the same now as it ever has been." Certainly; but so is divine grace; so is the humble, self-denying example of Jesus and his Apostles. And therefore, while we need not be surprised to find man's idolatry of his fellow rampant in secular society, or wonder to hear it pour forth strains of fulsome adulation at hotel dinners and civic anniversaries; we feel that there is cause to ask, How comes it to pass that we find precisely the same thing in the so-called Christian church? Angels might weep hot tears to hear the sickly, sentimental, fulsome flattery offered by professional Christian men to their chosen idols. Yea, ministers and people, alike join in the whole burnt-offering, in which (to say nothing of the Lord's glory) true human dignity itself is sacrificed, and the very manhood of the auditors is laid on the fire of idolatrous worship, leaving nothing but the smouldering ashes of genuine nobility, and the empty, evanescent perfume of exaggerated, and therefore worthless praise. O! ye graceless souls, who run hither and thither to watch the twinkling of the star which happens for the time being to be in the ascendant in your heavens, open your eyes to perceive that your star-gazing is the surest proof that you are benighted; and be admonished to repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, and that times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord: thus shall the Sun of Righteousness arise upon your souls with healing in his wings.

CONFESSIONS OF A FOOLISH MAN.—No. V.

TRY, try again. Nil desperandum. The story of the spider failing many times and succeeding at last. Motives, proverbs, anecdotes, and examples came to friend Joseph's relief, as, sick at heart, he had almost made up his mind to have no more to do with it. "What the good of it?" he was asking himself. "Is't the whole thing bad from top to bottom? Do'n't the parsons seem to be racing against each other, as to who shall win the highest reputation, and get the best salary? And what synecdoche does a plain straight-forward worker get from them when he's in trouble? Must'n't he pay a servile subjection to their ways and wishes, if he keeps on with them?"

These revolutionary inquiries perplexed him sadly. But he slept over it—he read the Bible over it—he prayed over it; and then he thought—"What if it is bad, I must try to mend it; if the fight is hot, I must'n't turn coward and run away."

He soon had another call. This time to a respectable church in a by no means inconsiderable town. A hearty reception was given him; a good deal of talk went the round of the neighborhood about what a capital preacher he was: sometimes, after some fanciful exhibition of genius, he would be likened to a soaring eagle; and sometimes when he discoursed argumentatively, he would be likened to a lion in the way, of which all heterodox and infidel people were beware: in short, he was undoubtedly very popular. Whether he deserved or not, I am not bound to say.

The former minister of the place had not succeeded there, though a good man and gifted. Many loved him much, and now that he was gone, even those who had teased him when present, pressed their great regard and affection for him. Of course they would! That was the way of the world, and often the way of the churches too—to do what they can to make a good man miserable while he's living, and praise him when he's dead. Who does not know that nearly out of every ten of the brave God-fearing ones, whose memories are now commended to our young men as affording examples for their imitation—who does not know, I say, that when they were doing these things they were nicknamed and despised? Like Jerusalem praising the prophets she had killed.

But I was going to say, that under the previous minister the church and congregation had not increased. Not then that Joseph is filling the chapel, and that many are being added to the church, it will surely be what was wanted, and every one will be pleased. The waters are smooth, and letters reach me from my friend, in which the success is described in glowing terms. "Don't expect too much," said I to him one day: "My own experience doesn't justify too great hopes that you'll have a straight and easy path."

And sure enough his troubles soon began. Some of them happened in this wise. Special services were announced in the chapel, and the seats were to be considered free. One of the deacons objects, as he fears the seatholders won't like their cushions and their looks used by other people; and he's afraid they'll give up their sittings if the services are continued. Here is the beginning of sorrows. The said deacon was respectable, and his influence in the church was large. From that time there was a coolness between him and Joseph—a sort of lying in wait for an opportunity to catch him in some other bad and forbidden way.

The next thing against him was the success. "See," said some, "what numbers are coming in." Would'nt the older occupants of the place be in the minority? Would'nt the minister get an undue influence, by being too able to get the votes of those thus added? The catastrophe of success like this would end no one knew how.—Then there was the secret meeting—the looking out for the disaffected—the hawk-eyed glance for some heterodoxy in the sermon—the criticism upon the clerical appearance and demeanor—the whisperings about how something might be the matter with character—the questionings as to what the ministers of the town thought about him—the picking out of this little thing and that, and half a score others, and saying, "It isn't what we've been used to." A considerable under-current of opposition was moving on, to show itself by-and-by. Joseph saw it, felt it, mourned over it, and knew himself to be influenced by none of those low motives which were being attributed unto him.

He came over to see me, and we had a long chat together. "The fact of it is," he said, "if the churches have little success or none, they lay all the blame on him who preaches to them, and even their praises of him are always attended with that ignominious and contemptible

'but.' If they have large success they won't like that; so what's to be done?"

"Advise," said I, "with the ministers of the town who, you told me in a letter, were so friendly with you."

"Alas!" replied he, "there's no hope there. The frequency of our meetings, and the efforts we have put forth, seem to have awakened symptoms of other feelings in them, and now I should get no sympathy in that direction."

Much other conversation passed. The counsel given and agreed upon was this—that inasmuch as the work was prospering, and many loved him much, he must be content to endure misunderstandings and misrepresentations; that as truth would wear longer than error, and God was stronger than all his foes, he must maintain a singleness of eye toward Him, and toil on in hope.

Accompanying him to the railway station, I left him with a countenance more bright and hopeful than was that with which I found him. I went home to pray, that humbly and yet boldly, he might continue to preach the Gospel of God, and that great good might be the result thereof.

PREACHERS, PREACHING, AND PREACHING PLACES.

At the Annual Meeting of the London City Mission, recently held in the metropolis, the Earl of Shaftesbury came fairly out on two points—the folly of confining preaching to consecrated buildings, or to places wholly devoted to that purpose, and the unsatisfactory results derived from committing preaching to a priestly class—that result being a "dry, comfortless style, which will satisfy no man's thirst, and enlighten no man's soul." The Noble Earl said—

"I entirely concur in what fell from the Rev. Mr. Ryle, when he said that he hoped we should go further, and not be content with Exeter Hall and half a dozen other halls we might name, but that we should insist upon having any place that could hold a congregation of mankind open for public preaching. Until we have town-halls, medical halls, and every open space where people can meet, made available for the preaching of the Word of God, we shall never do the good that we desire to do, and have that full extent of evangelical teaching, if all these means are not resorted to. There is but one argument urged against it—and that is no argument at all (a laugh);—that is this: some people have said, but if you do this, you will empty our churches and thin our congregations. I deny that in one sense, while I admit and rejoice at it in the other. I say, that if the ministers of the church would preach straightforward evangelical truth, in plain simple language, words of one syllable, and not dictionary words, as my friend says, (hear, and a laugh) they will revert to the practice of the good old apostolic times, and in good old Saxon language preach the pure Word of God. If they will do that, depend upon it their churches never will be empty. (Hear, hear.) All the halls that may open, all the special services that may be given, will never take one member from their flocks. But if they will not preach the pure and simple Word of God, but will persist in the old, dry, comfortless style of preaching — if they will insist upon holding out that which will satisfy no man's thirst — which will strengthen no man's body — which will enlighten no man's soul, and which will give no man hope, then I pray to God that their churches may be empty. (Renewed applause.) And I should rejoice to see, to use a phrase which my teetotal friends will perhaps find fault with, I should rejoice to see the congregations of all such clergymen decanted from the churches into chapels."

But then, unfortunately, the same style of preaching is found in chapels, and when not, other causes seem to leave the Nonconformist pastor with but little more power than the "dry, comfortless" preachers of the Establishment. On this point Dr. Campbell, of London, says, "Adult conversions are now a rare thing, and some other agency than the public administration of the Word must be brought into operation." On the same topic the Rev. J. A. James has said, "We ought to have conferences of ministers in various parts of the country." But we ask, Why of ministers? Better, far, of Christians. If ministers have so far failed, let the churches take the work into their own hands. But what says J. A. James as to the purport of his proposed conference? "To consult upon the best means of increasing the efficiency of our pulpit and pastoral ministrations." To which he adds, "Something must be done, or popery, infidelity, and general atheism will yet awfully increase."

The Rev. W. Brock, at a recent meeting of the Sunday School Union, said—

"The very first children brought into his school ten years ago were now his church. (Cheers.) He thought principle they had heard enunciated report—that the teacher and the pupils worked on the same principle, and same object — was correct. The school teachers, he thought, had same kind of action. If there was no difference it was on their (the teachers) for they had rather the upper hand better opportunities than they had could get six or eight persons, in 600 or 800 at a time, of whom he heard more, to listen to him, he would prefer it. In having so few a number at a time, they had a great advantage.

Here we have a little light. Mr. Brock preaches generally to some 800 or more; yet, he would expect success to result from close intimacy with small companies. But how is this preaching-to-eight system carried out? Only by making to the truth, that all Christ's people, priests, preachers, ministers—in God's clergy—and that he is ungodly who does not to the extent of his power preach Christ to sinners. The following remarks upon the deceased beloved servant of the Lord, called to his rest, Bro. C. Smith, shew the preaching wanted:—

"Comparatively brief was his day as a Minister of the Gospel, the results of his labors are sufficient for a long life with glory. He traveled and preached Christ in ten States besides his own—and by the blessing of Christ more than 1800 persons were added to the church in connection with his labors. He was not for a great occasion to preach a sermon, but where he had opportunity the way-side, in the family, in the gathering, would he speak of the Gospel and preach Jesus. 'Instant in season,' was his seeming motto for every day. What was the secret of his success? I cannot answer in full, but will be content to give the impressions of my own mind. His great faith in God, and perfect dependence in his word. He lived and died as he believed God; and that was the power of God to save men. He was the power of God to save men from the great truths of the Bible; eternal life, heaven and hell, and awful realities. Christ an Almighty Living Redeemer. He did not undertake to bend or break down man's philosophy or opinion, but he committed under which he acted. 'Preach the word,' and most faithful he abided by it, leaving others to their human philosophy and revel in the subtleties of metaphysical speculation."

ITEMS OF NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM.

During the present month we have been engaged rather in preparing for an increased effort here than otherwise. Circumstances have indicated that we should at least now and then hold meetings upon a larger scale than we have as yet attempted, all former efforts having been made in our small room. The circus being now unoccupied, and offered to us on reasonable terms, Bro. King is advertised to speak there on next Lord's day afternoon; subject, "Christianity as it was, the want of the age." It is expected that a class which could not be moved to visit a place ordinarily devoted to preaching, will attend the circus. No doubt Winter will be a far better season than the present for such an effort; still, one or two such meetings now will, we expect, not prove useless, and will perhaps prepare the way for others some months forward. It is also announced that every day at noon, and every evening, there will be in the Cherry-street room a meeting for attendance or conversation with enquirers. May the Lord guide us in all these steps, and may they result in glory to his name and good to man!

Last season we held in the Bull-ring and other places out-door meetings, and more extensive and orderly gatherings could not be desired. Not only were we not interfered with by the police, but their countenance was freely given. This season we have commenced, but with very different results. On three occasions Bro. King was upon the old spot; on the two first evenings, as he was laboring under the effect of severe cold, all the speaking was done by Bro. Chew: on the third evening he was followed by Bro. King. On each occasion the police demanded that the preaching should cease, which was in each case refused, and the name and address given. On Wednesday last Bro. Chew was summoned to appear and answer the charge of obstructing the public way. We had numerous witnesses to prove that there were eleven or twelve yards of clear road way on either side of our gathering, but they were not wanted, as the police swore that no obstruction was caused. Yet it was ruled that such a gathering was calculated to cause obstruction, and therefore must not be allowed. The case was dismissed without fine, upon declaration that if repeated the penalty will be enforced. The determination to prevent out-door meetings in all streets, squares, and "places" in the borough is avowed. That Birmingham will stand this we do not expect, and therefore we have taken immediate steps—forming a committee, opening a subscription list, calling a public meeting, with the intention of making known our determination still to preach in those places where obstruction will not ensue, and to carry, if requisite, the case to the Court of Queen's Bench.

Some readers of our notice last month will feel anxiety concerning Bond-street, and ask, What is doing? On the 1st of June will appear No. 1 of a series of penny tracts; some six or more may complete the series. They will set forth the changes requisite in order to transform the Baptist order into that of the Apostolic churches. The first will be upon the pastorate. All of them will be by S. J. Chew. Since our last notice the expelled unworthy walkers have (being persons of influence) made a considerable but most unprincipled effort to damage Mr. Chew in the estimation of the churches and the public. They have held a meeting, and printed certain resolutions with about sixty names attached, purporting to be names of members of Bond-street church present at the meeting, and affirming the resolutions. Upon examination, however, it appears that the list contains names of persons who have been expelled from Bond-street church—also of persons never known as members—also names of persons who were not at the meeting—also of those who admit that they know nothing concerning the things affirmed, and names inserted more than once. The resolutions charge Mr. C. with teaching erroneous doctrines—with admitting into the church a large number of boys and girls, for the purpose of having their votes in his favor—and they condemn him for causing some to leave Bond-street and form themselves into a church about eight months since, and on other points proved untrue. The following from a reply printed by Mr. C. will shew the true state of the case:—

"The charge of 'erroneous doctrines;' 'the peculiar views held and taught by Mr. Chew'—'the unscriptural character of the doctrine preached,' &c. — this may lead some to hear with their own ears, as they may deem it fairest to themselves and to me, to do so, ere they come to a conclusion on this point; and if they bring their Bibles with them, they may then test what I say, by God's unerring Word.

"It is said that those who have been added to the church during the fifteen months of my ministry, are 'unsuitable persons, chiefly boys and girls.' Would any one have believed that the mover and seconder of this resolution are of the number added, and of the number of those, who, in the fourth resolution, are insultingly styled 'such creatures?' But what are the facts? During these fifteen months, by baptism and by receiving from other sources, 216 have been entered as members of the church. Out of these, 175 are upwards of 18 years of age, varying from 18 to 80, and only 8 can be found who are under the age of 15. Is it not then very daring, to say that these 216 are 'chiefly boys and girls?' Is there not here a strange recklessness of truth?

"Again, not one of these 216 persons has been admitted, BUT BY THE UNANIMOUS CONSENT OF THE CHURCH. The persons who have visited the church as a deputation, have come back to the church with favorable reports. Upon these reports the church at its meetings has unanimously received them; yet some of these persons, whose names are to these resolutions, have formed the deputations, and now charge it upon me, as though it had been some private arrangement of my own, and that for the purpose 'of neutralizing opinions' and 'out-numbering the votes' of others. I affirm, without fear of contradiction, that not one hand has been held up against the receiving of any one of the whole two hundred and sixteen."

The utter worthlessness of the whole thing may be seen from the fact, that five of the leading men who get up and sign these resolutions condemning Mr. Chew, and casting upon him blame on account of the division referred to, actually were members of a committee for presenting a testimonial to Mr. Chew approving his conduct in that affair, which testimonial is now in his possession, with their names attached. It is given in his reply.

"The taunt concerning a former division may be met by those who taunt me, and whose names are marked with a star on the following page. On the 19th of October last a large public meeting was held in Bond-street chapel, when the following address was read and presented to me.

TO THE REV. SANDERS JOSEPH CHEW.

Reverend Sir, — The members of this church and congregation have, during the short time you have officiated as their pastor, watched the various steps you have taken, with a view to the reclaiming of sinners and to the furtherance of the cause of Christ in this place, always admiring your zeal therein, and they have observed with deep regret that some who have thought it right to differ from you in part of the essentials of your teachings, have so differed, not in a spirit of love, but in one its direct opposite. Notwithstanding this, it has not escaped their notice you have borne the revilings of that portion of your church (which has since withdrawn) in a manner which cannot, and has not failed, to convince them that you desired to be at peace with all men. — A display of sympathy for you, under these trying circumstances, (now happily passed) has prompted the members of this church and congregation to put their mites together, with which they have purchased Bagster's Commentaries, wholly uncalculated, and have also filled this purse, in acceptance of which they now request. They cannot close this short address without expressing their thanks to you for kind, attentive, careful, and considerate manner in which you are always ready to give your advice on spiritual matters to any of your flock, whether they seek it or not, if it appears to you needed. — We trust that you may be long spared to be amongst them, that many may be converted to God by your preaching, and that the work of the Lord may prosper in your hands. — This token of love and esteem must not be looked upon as to its value, but as the spontaneous offering of grateful hearts, bound to you by ties of love; actuated by a spirit of love, desiring to walk together in bonds of love and affection, and in all things being anxious to forward your every effort in your Master's service."

Here follow the names of the committee, fifteen in number, including the five referred to. The reply from which the extracts in this notice are taken, has the following attestation:—

"We, the undersigned, being the members of Bond-street church, have read the resolutions adopted by the meeting held at Hockley-street, Birmingham, May 1859. We declare them to be misrepresentations. We have also carefully read the reply written by Mr. Chew, and it fully corroborates its statements as to the facts."

May 9th, 1859."

JAMES EGGINTON

Since writing the above, Lord's Day, May 22, has passed away, and its proceedings stand for examination at the great day of account. As this note is not yet published, which is contrary to expectation, we must just add, that the circus was occupying the building, which is considered to seat 3000 persons, was well seated with a large number of attentive hearers, the number present being estimated at from 2000 to 2600. More would have entered, but through a mistake on the part of the police, to the over-crowding of the parts near the doors, the police in charge of the door announced the place full and refused admission. This is not the season for keeping open such a building on Sunday afternoons, when the fields and green lanes invite the multitude. While, therefore, we may hope to take a position there in the Winter, we only intend one other Lord's day at present. D. K.

CASTLEWELLAN.

I expect that I shall soon have to leave this place and the good brethren here for some other part of the world. All my desire is, that my lot may be cast among the disciples of Jesus, and that I may enjoy the society of those who love the Lord. But though circumstances make it necessary to remove, I do not regret coming here. I have spent six years in the neighborhood of Castlewellan; during that time 26 persons have been immersed, and a Christian church planted where there was none before. At first I found Bro. Bingham and his wife prepared to act, and subsequently much light has been diffused by means of books and the visits of several brethren. Last Lord's day I had the pleasure of baptizing a young man on the confession of his faith in Jesus and his willingness to obey his commands. He had attended Sister Bingham's Sunday evening school for some time, and the Word of the Lord has had its influence upon his heart and mind. I hope it will continue to shed its influence there, and bring forth much fruit. I think that the brethren everywhere should turn their attention to Sunday schools, so that the hours of that day which are not taken up in public worship might be turned to excellent account in training the minds of the young. JOHN LYND.

CROSSGATES.

Since I last wrote you, we have had two additions by baptism to the church in Crossgates, namely, on the 24th of April last, when a man and his wife were immersed into the name of Jesus. May they continue with courage and perseverance in the narrow path which leads to life eternal.

MANCHESTER.

Since our communication of last month we have had the pleasure of witnessing the good confession of four, and in God's appointed way entering the kingdom.—Bro. Milner has just favored us with a visit, and spent a week in public speaking and meetings of the brethren. On Lord's day, 15th, he spoke twice in our meeting-room, which was comfortably filled in the morning, and overflowing in the evening, the subject of his address being, What is justification? On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings following, he spoke in the Independent Methodist chapel, Oldham, on the Christian economy and the Christian life. Two of the preachers connected with the place presented questions at the close of the second lecture with pleasing propriety. Good must result. We were glad of the opportunity of becoming more intimately acquainted with Bro. Milner. W. PERKINS.

NEWTOWN.—PUBLIC DISCUSSION.

According to previous announcement, a public discussion took place between Bro. Rotherham and Mr. John Bevan, a local preacher in connection with the Baptist church, Newtown, in the public rooms of that place, on Thursday evening, May 28. The room was crowded, and the company listened with the most undivided attention to the debaters. Mr. E. Evans, of Penrallt, Llanidloea, was moderator on the part of Mr. Rotherham, and Mr. E. Stephens on the part of Mr. Bevan. The particular proposition affirmed by Bro. Rotherham was, "That Sectarianism, as such, was essentially evil;" and in support of the affirmation he submitted nine passages of Scripture, from which he specified ten evil results of Sectarianism. His arguments will be found at length in this number, commencing on page 271.—Mr. Bevan, in support of his denial, adduced the following propositions:—1, Sectarianism is a necessity arising out of the constitution of the human mind.—2, Sectarianism is by no means an anomaly.—3, External unity has been tried and signally failed.—4, Sectarianism has done immense good. After enlarging on the above, Mr. Bevan attempted to wrest a few of the passages submitted by Bro. R. from his argument, contending that the union of which the Psalmist spoke was subjective and not objective; and alluding to other passages said that Jewish, and not Christian sects were condemned. Although Mr. B.'s attention in the midst of the discussion was called to a number of passages unnoticed by him, and he had time on his hands, yet he allowed the meeting to close without making the slightest allusion to three passages offered in condemnation of Sectarianism. We need scarcely add, that our brother came off with an easy victory, which the most intelligent part of the audience were not slow to appreciate; they have since admitted, though earnest votaries of Sectarianism, that our brother did not fail to handle those passages in a manner which would convince the most incredulous of the evil tendencies of Sectarianism. The Shrewsbury Chronicle of May 6, in noticing the debate, observes that "Mr. Rotherham's views seemed to be most scriptural and argumentative; Mr. Bevan's the most popular."

On the 19th ult. Bro. Rotherham lectured in the room on the "Removal of Sectarianism by the union of all believers in one body;" and on the 15th again preached in the open air. S. OWEN.

SHREWSBURY.

In April, 1858, we commenced a Lord's day school, for the religious training of the members' children, which has increased in numbers and usefulness, so that we have now other children as well as those of the members. The necessary expenses being paid out of the church fund, the teachers celebrated the first anniversary by a general tea meeting, which brought together a most interesting company from the different denominations. The old hall was tastefully decorated by the females. After tea several pieces of poetry on moral and religious subjects were recited by the children, who also sang various hymns, and repeated passages from the Bible, these being interspersed with musical selections by Brother Hulme's singing class. The children were rewarded with Bibles, Testaments, &c. A dear friend from the Baptists then, in an impressive manner, thanked Bro. Hulme, sen. for his kindness to teachers and scholars during the year as superintendent, requesting his acceptance of their portrait, as a token of gratitude.—Bro. Hulme acknowledged this kindness in affectionate language.—The male teachers then presented Bro. Davies with a large New Testament, as a proof of their approbation.—Thanks were given to Bro. Buller, for presiding, to the choir, and to all friends who assisted. 130 took tea, including 20 members and 30 children. S. HULME.

WIGAN.

Since our last four have been baptized and added to the saved.—The church has been favored with a visit from Brother and Sister Milner, and on Lord's day morning, May 8, our brother addressed the members on the necessity of progress in the Christian life. In the evening there was a large gathering to hear a clear and powerful discourse on the good confession. On Tuesday evening he spoke on the kingdom of God and the second coming of Christ; and on the two following evenings Bro. M. delivered two excellent discourses in the Town-hall, St. Helens. Several questions were put at the close, and answered in a satisfactory manner. We have been highly delighted and edified with this visit.

OBITUARY.

BENJAMIN SKENE died in Louisville, Ky. on the 11th March, 1859, in the 79th year of his age. He died as he had lived, through a long period of his earthly pilgrimage, in the harness of duty to Christianity. The "Christian Union" gives the following sketch of Bro. Skene:—

He was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, the year 1780. In his youth he belonged to that branch of the British army retained at home for the protection of the coast of Great Britain, during the wars and threatened invasion of Napoleon Bonaparte. While stationed at the town of Berwick upon-Tweed, in the year 1805, he became interested in Christianity, and was baptized by Mr. Kirkwood, pastor of the Scotch Baptist church. He and about a dozen of his comrades and 'their wives' (who all were persuaded to follow Christ) obtained permission of their officers to organize themselves into a little church, in which, for years they enjoyed themselves in the fellowship of the Gospel—on every Lord's day breaking bread and exhorting and edifying one another. As their regiment moved from place to place in England and Scotland, they still maintained their church organization. About the year 1815, after the fall of Napoleon, he left the army and embarked in business in the town of Carmarthy, in Scotland, where, with a few believers, he organized a church. From thence he moved to the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, where, for a time, he worshipped with a little church of congenial spirits at a place called Stabhill. He afterwards united with Robert and Jas. Haldane in Edinburgh, in which congregation he was a public exhorter for a number of years; then, with about sixty others, he branched off, and formed a congregation which met in Clyde Street Hall, with Arch. Smith and Andrew Kerr as pastors. In this congregation he remained twelve years, exhorting the brethren from time to time. This congregation, though small, was a rare example of piety and talent, containing a large number of brethren able to teach and admonish one another. In the year 1836, he, with his family, emigrated to the United States, and took up his abode in New York, where he united with the church then meeting on Green-street. In this congregation he remained as elder several years. His children being all grown, sought homes in the West. His son Benjamin and daughter Margaret settled in Cincinnati, his daughter Janet and her husband in St. Louis, and his sons William and Robert in Louisville, Ky. About 1842 or '43 he left New York to spend the balance of his days with his children; and until his death shared the homes alternately, but wherever residing he always connected himself with the congregation of disciples. He lived a life of piety more than half a century, and died in the hope of a blessed immortality.

THE ANXIOUS SEAT AND ALTAR.—No. II.

BY A MINISTER.

ANY additions to the Word of God, or appliances not sanctioned by the Great Teacher, for the conversion of sinners, or the building up of the saints in their most holy faith, should be repudiated, as deserving to be classed with Tradition versus the Bible, and should be held as "old wives' fables," in opposition to the express teaching of the Holy Spirit. We shall call attention to the oracles of God, on the folly and danger of turning aside from the commandments of God to these traditions.

It is said, "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul. The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple." If the law of the Lord is perfect, what need have we for any addition to it? And how can human wisdom add anything to that which already is perfect? If the direct tendency of the word is to convert the soul, will not any foreign ingredient disturb the process, neutralize its energies, and render it ineffectual? If the testimony of the Lord is sure, what need is there for anything to render it more so, in making wise the simple? Does it not throw discredit upon the "law" and the "testimony," to ignore their purpose and design, for the conversion of sinners, by introducing something not found within them?

When the Jews said to Jesus, that if one should come from the dead, filled with the traditions of by-gone ages, they would believe, what was the reply of the infallible Teacher? "They have Moses and the Prophets, let them hear them." Now, if the great abyss of Hades—the fountain head of all buried traditions for ages—would be unsafe and uncertain, and our Saviour bade them look to Moses and the Prophets, as containing all the knowledge that God had furnished them, would he not have reprobated the practice in our day, of employing any foreign and unauthorized agencies to ascertain or to do the will of God?

And still another instance: "There came to Jesus Scribes and Pharisees which were of Jerusalem, saying, Why do thy disciples transgress the traditions of the elders?" The Scriptures at this time had fallen into disuse, and in their stead the traditions of the elders had been adopted as authoritative in all matters pertaining to religion. And now there is started a question concerning tradition—the tradition of the elders. The divine teachings of Moses and the Prophets were set aside and contemned: and the traditions of the elders were held in higher reverence than the precepts and commandments of God. The subject of tradition was now fully presented to the Saviour, and see in what way he disposes of it. He answers, "Why do you also transgress the commandments of God by your traditions?" A serious charge against them truly it was! The effect of these traditions was the violation of the commandments of God. By how much these traditions were observed, by so much was the authority of God despised and neglected. It is this that renders the inventions of men in matters of religion so dangerous and wicked. The whole system of Papal abominations has grown out of this practice. Even the least departure from the teachings of Infinite Wisdom leads to transgression and apostacy.

The same subject in other forms frequently came before the Saviour, and always met with the sternest rebuke. The Pharisees and Scribes asked him, "Why walk not thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwashed hands?" He answered and said unto them, "Well hath Isaiah prophesied of you, hypocrites, as it is written: These people honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. Howbeit, in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men." This testimony shows that tradition, even in the most simple matters—the eating with unwashed hands—involved the "elders" in hypocrisy, was the occasion of lip service instead of the heart, and "vain" worship in substituting "doctrines" for the commandments of God. Surely no juster conclusion could have been reached, and they deserve the serious consideration of all those who substitute any "doctrines," however simple, for the express teachings of God in his word.

One of the great objects to be accomplished by the death of Christ was to redeem men from the bondage and corruption resulting from "the vain traditions of men." These have always kept men away from God's method of pardon under every economy. They prevented the Jews from coming to the altar of sacrifice, for the pardon of their sins, according to the law, and threw insuperable difficulties in the way of enjoying the promises which God annexed to obedience. And equally so have they prevented sinners now from coming "to the blood of sprinkling," and realizing the blessings of redemption in the name of Christ. Surely this is a heavy charge, and deserves our most earnest consideration. Mourning benches, inquirers' seats, and modern altars, unknown in the times of Christ and the Apostles, have been substituted for the gospel and its ordinances; and thousands are invited, urged, encouraged, drawn up, driven, commanded to come to these human inventions, for the express purpose of obtaining pardon. It seems to be the chief effort of the "elders" to induce all to try their efficacy, and to stake the salvation of their souls upon the issues thus made. All the songs sung, and the prayers offered, (many of which are made as if God "was as if God" or on a journey,) also the preaching and exhortation, terminate just here, and the success of a meeting depends altogether upon the numbers of those who can be induced to "seek the Lord" by coming to these fixtures of human device. They destroy the freshness of the gospel order of pardon, and set up a wall of wood, if not of iron, between the sinner and the Saviour. They place conditions in the way of pardon unknown and unauthorized by the Saviour. They substitute expedients for the express commands of God: they render doubtful and uncertain what God has made sure and infallible. Since the world begun, God has never failed to meet the sinner "in the way of commandments." The idea of coming twice or thrice to God's ordinance to obtain his promised blessings, is unknown under any economy. But the sinner tries the benefit of the mourning bench and altar, as an experiment. "Thousands have used it before with success." "Make the effort, it will do you no harm—it may do you good. Peradventure God will meet and bless you!" Cases are referred to as proof of their efficacy: as if the gospel presented a medicine doubtful in its effect, but which ought at least to be tried. If one remedy will not suit the case, perhaps homeopathy will, and the whole system of salvation is left as much in doubt as the system of medicine in the cure of the diseases of the body. Such is not the case. The gospel presents an infallible remedy for the cure of the soul, and that, too, in its first application; no case is so desperate, none so hopeless, but that a cure will be effected by a hearty compliance with the directions of the Physician. And what is that remedy? Is it to come to the anxious seat or altar? If so, where is the direction found in the New Testament?

it, and it will be seen that on coming the "worshipper will be cleansed." This is God's method invariably. Christ said to the paralytic, "Thy sins are forgiven thee," when the men of faith presented him for the first and only time to the Lord. He said to Mary once, and only once, when she stood behind him weeping and wiping his feet with her hair, "Thy sins be forgiven thee." And to the thief on the cross, by the side of the true altar—our Lord Jesus Christ—"To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." All his miracles proceeded upon the same plan. A touch, a look, a word, a single command, were enough. And so when he sent the gospel to the nations and to every creature, he said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Once complying with these conditions, the salvation was certain and sure.

Is it objected that this makes summary work of it, and renders the method of cure too easy? How could it be otherwise? What can the sinner do! He is helpless and condemned already. No work of righteousness will avail him. He has none to bring. And least of all, any observances not required or commanded, are vain and empty; they are broken reeds, empty cisterns that can hold no water—chaff—the dreams of enthusiasts—the expedients of human folly—that set at naught the grace of God, as exhibited in the gospel of Christ. Our Saviour declared that "his yoke was easy, his burden light;" and this he said when he commanded those who were obeying the tradition of the elders to "come to him for rest." Paul tells us that we have not to ascend up to heaven to bring Christ down from above, nor yet to descend into the abyss to bring him up from the dead; but that "the word was nigh us, in our mouth, and in our heart." What folly, then, to call upon Christ "to come down," "to come now," when already he is with us! His name, his authority, the whole virtue of his blood, are found in the gospel; and compliance with its simple and easy conditions not only redeems us from our "vain conversation received by tradition from our fathers," but delivers us from our sins, and presents us to God a justified, sanctified, and saved people.

This whole question is an issue between the Word of God and the traditions of men; as such it needs to be briefly stated, and all must see the folly of persisting in a course which places the latter not merely on a level, but on a higher platform than the former.

"The Holy Scriptures are able to make thee wise unto salvation." If this be so, it stultifies and absolutely condemns the introduction of any alien element to attain this object. As well might we set up a feeble lamp in the street to guide our feet by day, or depend upon the glow-worm to direct us through the marsh and glen, when the moon is shining in the heavens by night, as resort to any such agencies to assist us in the way of our conversion.

SYNOPTICAL EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.—No. I.*

Romans i. 1-15.

DEAR BRO. M.—Since our conversa-

* We find in Bro. Campbell's Harbinger a series of articles under the above title, which we intend to transfer to our pages, feeling assured that they will be appreciated by every student of the Bible.—Ed.

tion on the wants of the current Reformation, I have found many who concur in the views which you then expressed. Indeed, all our most intelligent brethren, East, West, North, and South, seem to be now fully persued, that our first and greatest want, as a people, is the more careful, prayerful, and systematic personal study of the Living Oracles. It is daily becoming more and more evident that every man must study the Bible for himself, with constant reference to its grammatical, logical, and chronological order. The Word of God is the seed from which, under the genial and fostering influence of the Holy Spirit, must spring up in the heart and life of the Christian, "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, fidelity, meekness, and temperance."

Preaching is, of course, still necessary, in its proper place; and many advantages may also result from lecturing on the Sacred Text. But no form of public teaching can supply this want of private and personal study on the part of each and every individual. And hence, the demand is now becoming more and more general, that the Bible shall be more carefully and thoroughly studied in the nursery and in the Sunday School—that Bible-classes shall be formed in all our churches—and that the Holy Scriptures shall be introduced as a text-book into all our schools, academies, colleges, and universities.

But you say that neither you nor your scholars can always fully comprehend the meaning of the inspired writers: that in Paul's writings especially, there "are some things hard to be understood, which they who are unlearned" are always liable to wrest to their own destruction. And hence, you think, that some help should be given to the student of the Bible, not to render investigation, on his part, unnecessary, but to encourage it.

This is an important suggestion. The skilful physician administers medicine, not as a substitute for the "vis medicatrix nature," but merely to strengthen and to support its weakened energies; not to cure disease, but to assist nature. It is so with every skilful and judicious educator. He labors not to render mind passive, but to make it active; not to encourage slothfulness, by taking away all necessity for mental effort, but to excite and to arouse into harmonious activity all the powers and susceptibilities of both head and heart.

How far it is possible to meet this object, and to supply the want of families, schools, and colleges, by a brief logical exposition of the Holy Bible, may, indeed, be a question. Certain it is, that just here, most commentators have been unsuccessful; and have not the vanity to suppose that they can do what others have not done. Nevertheless, I have resolved to illustrate what I mean, by a few articles written with special reference to the wants of which you complain.

I begin with Paul's Epistle to the Romans: not because it stands first in the canon, but because it is the fullest and most complete development of the scheme of salvation. To understand this letter, is to understand the economy of redemption. But to fail in this, is to have partial and incorrect views of the most learned, profound, and argumentative letter—is to render ourselves unable to be carried about with every variety of doctrine, from the extreme point of Calvinism, to the no less absurd dogma of Arminianism. Indeed, almost all the creed-makers of Christendom, have sought to lay the foundation of their systems in this epistle; and hence it is the more necessary, that the student of the Bible should labor to understand it.

The first seven verses, embracing Paul's salutation to the church at Rome, are a very good illustration of his general style of writing. His manner is eminently suggestive. As one wave induces another, so one thought induces another in the mind of this most profound writer, until he finally reaches the boundaries of mental vision; or, until at least, his thoughts are checked by the main object of his discourse.

Unlike most modern writers, he begins with himself. "Paul" is the first word of the epistle. But this is not introduced as the name of one in whom the writer is disposed to glory. On the contrary, he does not regard himself as belonging to himself. He is the property of another. He is the servant of Jesus Christ: an Apostle, called and separated to the Gospel of God.

And that there might be no mistake about this gospel, he farther informs us, that it is no new scheme or device of any man, or of any class of men then living; but that it is the same which God had long before announced and partially developed by his holy prophets in the Old Testament: that it is, moreover, all concerning his Son, who was descended from the royal line of David, with respect to his humanity; and marked out and identified as the Son of God, invested with all authority in heaven and on earth, with respect to the holy spiritual nature, after his resurrection from the dead.

From this glorious personage, the Emanuel, Paul had received his commission, or the grace of apostleship for the obedience of faith among all nations, for his name's sake. The Romans were within the limits of his jurisdiction. They were a part of all the nations embraced within the limits of the commission. Many of them had become obedient to the faith. They were among the "beloved of God," the elect saints. And hence, Paul salutes them as such, and fervently prays, that the favor and peace of God might rest upon them.

What a variety of topics, then, is here introduced for our profit and consideration! How full and how rich the flow of thought and feeling that fills the mind, and the heart, and the soul of the apostle! Cannot the students of your academy, and the classes of other similar institutions, as well as the children of every well instructed family, be made to imbibe the spirit of this salutation? Would it not be a very interesting exercise, especially to the more advanced classes, to trace out, either verbally or in writing, the exact import of the relation expressed by the word "servant?" (δουλος.) Might not an hour be spent very pleasantly and very profitably in examining what God has said by his ancient prophets, concerning the gospel of Jesus Christ? And might not every other item of this salutation, and indeed, of the whole epistle, be made the fruitful theme of a similar exercise?

But I must leave these details to you, and to others, who have undertaken the responsible charge of qualifying the rising generation for usefulness here, and for happiness hereafter. My present object is to give a mere logical outline of certain portions of Scripture, with such practical hints and suggestions as may be of advantage, especially to the family and to the school.

In the second and last section of the introduction, which extends to the close of the fifteenth verse, Paul expresses the deep and abiding interest which he felt for the Roman Christians. This he manifests in various ways — first, by thanking God that their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world — secondly, by continually praying for them — and finally, by expressing the great desire which he had long cherished to visit them.

Logically, this is the scope of the whole passage; but practically, it is the mere preface or introduction. The Apostle very happily introduces several other matters, which, though subordinate, are, nevertheless, of great practical interest to every devoted student of the Bible. The following may serve to illustrate how very suggestive and how full of meaning are the words and phrases of this most interesting letter.

1. We see how very important it is to have a strong, united, and well regulated church in each of the great centres of civilization. This is well illustrated by the example of the primitive church at Rome, whose influence was felt from the centre to the circumference of the civilized world. Would it not be well, then, either to concentrate more our means and our influence in building up model churches in the principal cities of our own country, after the example of the apostles; or otherwise, to wholly abandon these centres of political, social, and commercial influence, and to devote our means and our energies to the conversion of the country, the towns, and the villages where vice is less prevalent, and where the influence of the world, the flesh, and the devil, is more easily overcome? I respectfully propose this as a problem for the consideration of those who have more experience in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, than either you or myself.

2. It appears that Paul was not only a man much given to prayer, but also that he had great confidence in the efficacy of prayer. This is evident, from his making continual mention of the Romans in all his supplications at the throne of grace. Would it not be well if more of us would follow his example?

3. The object of Paul's long contemplated visit to Rome should be to us all an instructive lesson. It was not that he might see the Golden Capitol, the gorgeous palaces, the triumphal arches, and the numerous temples, theatres, columns, porticoes, and obelisks; that he so earnestly desired to make a visit to the city of the Cæsars. It was that he might do good and receive glory; that he might confer upon his humble followers of Jesus Christ in Rome a splendid emporium, some spiritual blessing to the end that they might be established; and that he might himself be comforted through the mutual influence of their faith upon each other. such is the constitution of the moral universe, that no man can confer favor on another without being favored himself, and no man can do an injury to another without being injured.

4. Paul was full of the missionary spirit. He felt himself under continual obligation to preach the gospel to all men. "I am debtor," says he, "to the Greeks and to the barbarians, both to the wise and to the unwise. As much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also." After this rich and appropriate introduction, Paul states his main thesis in the sixteenth and seventeenth verses. These contain the grand theme of the whole epistle, which is discussed with the most profound logical precision, especially in the first four chapters.

But I must leave you and your readers to reflect upon these suggestions for another month. R. MILLIGAN

CAUSES WHY THE WORD OF GOD IS NOT MORE STUDIED

THE Book of God is inappreciably superior to every other book, and so different, that our ardor and perseverance in its study must be characterized by a diligence inexpressibly above that of any other.

Let us ask ourselves, is it thus studied? Alas! but by one or two here and there, and they will confess that their ardor and perseverance are far below what they are conscious should be the case, and that they never can hope to realize, however they may and do, the best endeavour, the notion plan which they have set before them. But do we ever hear it talked of? In every book of a general and powerful interest is talked of? Is it a book which even the indolent and superstitious betake themselves to, because it is so common that ignorance upon it is so graceful? Alas! neither is it so. It is a book the mention of which is almost diabolically shunned in general society.

is a book of which the world will plead ignorance without a blush. Various are the causes of this treatment. It requires much study, and most men will give but little to any book. Its subject is spiritual, and most men are natural. These are plain and obvious causes; but one cause there is not so obvious, but fully as efficacious, and therefore more insiduously besetting us: it is the notion that we are sufficiently acquainted with its contents already.

How little is the absurdity of such a notion realized! But as its effects are grievously important, let us enter into an examination of it more particularly.

Of what nature is the prevailing knowledge of the contents of this book?

It is a loose, traditional information, which floats about in society, obtained orally and not by reading, and known more from being at times unavoidably encountered than by being ever purposely sought. Its highest and purest source is nothing more than the attention which decency demands men to pay to public worship, and this operates but feebly. It mainly comes to men in the great traditional stream of modes and opinions, delivered down by one worldly generation to another, and thus reaches the pupil in the same channel with the law of the land, with the conventional usages of society, and with other accompaniments which entirely strip God's word of its awful and peculiar distinction from man's, degrade its solemn character, and assign it a place scarcely above that of the established canons of society. Such a knowledge must be not only imperfect but erroneous also; yet this is the very sort of knowledge which administers the most certain obstacle to all improvement or correction. This knowledge is adapted to man's corrupt inclinations; it satisfies, therefore, all his inquiries. To alter our notions is to confess ourselves in the wrong, and this our vanity will not allow. At the same time it requires exertion, and this our indolence will not endure. Thus we cling to our ignorance, and in religion mistaking the familiarity of terms (which have been thrust upon our ears, whether we would or not) for the meaning of them, (which we have never taken the trouble to examine) whisper in our careless and overweening spirit, before our teacher, perhaps, has opened his lips, "I know all that is going to be said already." This presumption of knowledge prevents too many from consulting the original at all; and they who carry the prejudices of imperfectly-acquired and therefore corrupt knowledge to the reading of it, are beset with difficulties which it requires great patience and exercise of good sense and judgment to surmount.

The great danger of a superficial reading in this case, is a confirmation rather than dissipation of previous errors. When we look at a building with a passing glance, it will often assume the features [which we expect from some previous but inaccurate information, or are inclined to find. Our senses have not time to contradict our notions or wishes; and the having seen it with our own eyes, convinces us more than ever of the accuracy of our original notion of it. So it is also with the mental eye; everything is as we expect or wish to find it. We turn over the leaves in Scripture, see the same familiar terms, phrases, and facts, and shut the book with the satisfaction of having searched for ourselves; of having found ourselves moreover in the right, and are thus confirmed in our errors. But as when we go up close to that building, and examine it long and intently, the whole appearance alters; magnitudes, places, proportions are changed, windows are found to be doors, chimneys to be towers, pillars to be buttresses, and in fact the very order of architecture different:—so is it when we come to apply our minds closely upon Scripture—all is changed. Those terms so familiar assume different senses, and are beheld in a different connection and bearing. This relation of the terms to each other it is, which we must endeavour to comprehend every day with surer and wider grasp. From this alone can we gain the clear and sure understanding of the word, and be imbued with a deep and due sense of the awful meaning of its terms. Let us, then, having opened the book, carry on our search with all the activity and perseverance which the investigation of truth demands from us erring mortals. Great, indeed, is the folly, and melancholy is the delusion of satisfying ourselves with the mere familiarity to our ear and eye, of even the least important term (as it may seem to us) in the gospel. Every stone in a building, however magnificent the whole may be, is in itself common-place and familiar; but as our eye carefully travels from it to its neighbours, we are led to survey the harmony and grandeur of the whole; and on returning to it, we are surprised to find that stone, hitherto thought so indifferent, filling some important position in the support or beauty of the entire building. Almost every day, on going forth from our doors in a large city, we encounter familiar faces; but unimportant as they may thus appear, did we inquire about such persons, we should find them perhaps filling, in their respective spheres, useful and necessary stations in the structure of the society by which we are surrounded. Such is also the difference in importance and meaning, with which the most familiar terms and passages of Scripture strike the person who had hitherto been content to take them as they were offered to him, but has now determined to ascertain the meaning for himself. And how happy has ever been the result. How many thus seeking have found that they have been familiar with an angel of God, with a prophet of the Most High—yet knew them not any more than those two carnally minded disciples did the Lord, on the road to Emmaus. How many have discovered in those terms which they had carelessly heard, and still more carelessly, perhaps, employed, and discovered with a surprise of wholesome fear or joy—here a messenger to repentance, there a monitor to obedience—here a minister of hope, there a dread—here a of his pride, there an encour his despondency—here a chas the conscience and a prober heart, there a comforter to the and soother of his troubles.

Let us proceed to remove which long familiarity has thro some of these terms, and see real features be indeed so insign so uninspiring, so unappalling.

How familiar are the terms redemption and redemption to the ears of but have they ever called up t into their minds, and placed in their hearts, the facts which cluded under them—man expelled bliss, a world lost in iniquity and to death, the Son of God appear a Redeemer from heaven, cruci its sins, and raised for its justifi themselves in particular subject shame, and liable to the glory in all this cluster of heart stirring Men will speak of grace: but ha learned from the testimony of the closely questioned hearts, gather well applied experience, and draw the instruction of Holy Writ much that is called in to repair? they followed with generous tions its glorious course throu characters exhibited in Scriptur the first day of the Spirit's descent upon the Apostles, trac healing influence on the weakne corruption of human nature? they examined its means, its and sought by earnest prayer its upon themselves? They will sp the atonement; but have they e their hearts, leisurely fronte beings face to face—sinful, weak tal man, with Holy, Almighty, lasting God; and have they the to reach the height of the merc sound the depth of love which draw cords of reconciliation b two such beings? They will u term of future retribution; bu they ever calmly looked in the tremendous aggregate of facts to that term gives unity? Christ with the host of holy angels clouds of heaven, with the tr God, to judge the quick and th of all tongues and of all ages, sep the crowd as Moses did once th on his right hand and on his left coming the one side to bliss, dism the other into everlasting punishment?

They will speak of the Lord's divinity; but have they ever traced him in that glorious attribute through the two covenants, blazing as the angel of the one with fearful signs and wonders, and going about humbly as the minister of the other, doing good with miracles of mercy and of love? Have they reflected how overwhelmingly awful this attribute renders what is already so awful—how it affects his rejection, his agony, his cross, and his grave—and how prominent in responsibility the Christian stands apart from the rest of mankind? For hence, God is in a peculiar manner his Master, and in a peculiar manner his Judge. Such, when unveiled, is the aspect presented by but a few of the general terms of Scripture; and their meaning is such, we see, as must not come and go at man's will and bidding, but abide with him in his heart, being continually kept filled up to their full measure by frequent appeals to Scripture. Thus alone will they have due weight upon our understanding and affections. Otherwise, with advancing years, they will continually drop some of their former fulness, make a slighter and slighter impression, gradually lose all power of affection, and finally sink into the most vague and unmeaning portion of the vocabulary.

Shall, then, anything less than a serious and persevering study of this heavenly volume content us? Can we ever dispense with it? Only let us inspect our own bosoms. What infinite varieties and variations of sense and passion! What changes of shape, of thought, and all their innumerable combinations, are taking place there, within even a short interval, within one glance, I may say, of self-examination. Not for a moment is our frame of mind in one state; yet his word, who knew what was in the heart of man, has ever something wherewith to meet, correct, and turn to the best account every one of these varieties. Can we, then, ever cease to need its application? As well may our body live without the vivifying soul, as our mind dispense with the life-giving spirit of Holy Scripture. Therefore, should we not urge all to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest? Above all, ascertain well their present state of knowledge of the word, nor be afraid to discover their ignorance; for as surely as the fear of God is the beginning of that wisdom which prompts us to obey him, so is the consciousness of our ignorance the beginning of that wisdom which leads us to know him; and having known him, to love him with that perfect love which casteth out fear.

We are called Christians. This term, so familiar as to be tossed about from one to another, bestowed indiscriminately on every one around us—nay, in many mouths even synonymous with man—what does it imply? It implies the sworn soldier and servant of him who is God, Saviour, Priest, King, Prophet, Maker, and Judge of the world. In it is comprehended the extreme of earthly humiliation and of heavenly glory. In it we are reminded of man's fall and recovery, Satan's triumph and defeat, of the conquered powers of darkness, of the conquering powers of light, of the kingdom of God upon earth, and in the world to come everlasting. Keeping in sight this meaning of the title we bear, let us look into our own hearts, see their irresolution, rebelliousness, conflict of duty with passion, of spirit with flesh, of darkness with light, and fly to the remedy which God hath set before us, even his pure word. Let this title coming on our ears be a trumpet call to duty, rousing all our spirit within us, as faithful soldiers of our heavenly Master. And thus, even thus, by knowledge, by goodness, by the armour of God on the right hand and on the left, may we have Christ abiding with us, even by the precious word, through his Holy Spirit, making us wise unto salvation. C. D. H.

We should make the same use of a book that a bee does of a flower: extract the sweets from it, without at the same time injuring it in the slightest degree.

In the affairs of life, activity is to be preferred to dignity; and practical energy and despatch, to what may be denominated as premeditated composure and reserve.

THE PROMISES OF GOD.—No. III.

"Be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit promises" (Heb. vi. 12.)

If the history of nations and people is but philosophy speaking by example, then is it true that religion is exemplified to us in the history of God's tried servants. More than once do the Apostles refer to those loyal characters who lived in the anterior dispensations, as worthy examples of faith, of suffering, affliction, and patience. In all these illustrious examples is discernible the power of promise. We select one example—that of Abraham. This patriarch's lone long journey in Canaan, his abode as a sojourner with an inheritance, his offering of Isaac, and all his deeds of loyalty, had their origin in this—he had received the promises, and "he judged him to be faithful who had promised." For his confident assurance that what "God had promised, he was able to perform," and for its power over his life, he was counted worthy of God to be set forth as a model of devotion, and to be called the "father of the faithful." Canaan, in which he sojourned, had some sort of home attraction for him, though he had no "inheritance in it, not so much as to set his foot on;" because Jehovah had said—"I have given this land to thy seed, and they shall possess it." But there was a promise of deeper import still, and fraught with a closer interest to his loyal heart, which was—"In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Through faith in this promise, he could look along the line of future generations and behold a descendant, that beginning with his own family, should hold in store rich blessings for all nations.

These promises he, with Sarah, Isaac, and Jacob, "heirs with him of the same promise," saw afar off, and were fully persuaded of them; but died in the land of their sojourn, without witnessing their fulfilment.

But again, there were promises made to Abraham, in which he had a personal, present, and eternal interest. It is a theme for pleasing reflection, that God never calls upon his creatures for a sacrifice of anything which they may prize, without granting a rich supply of "good things," better adapted to their happiness. There is no losing in God's vice, even though the track should "in deserts, in mountains, in dens, in caves of the earth." God, at the time called upon Abraham for sacrifice, "Depart," said he, "from your father's house, and all your kindred, into a land which I will show thee." Obedient to the Divine behest, he goes out, knowing whither he went, till he finds himself in Canaan. Now, the promise—"I will bless thee. * * * I will be with thee, thy shield and great reward. * * * Walk thou before me, and thou shalt be perfect." With such blessing, protection, and society, in this land of idolatrous strangers, he was more than compensated for the loss of home and friends. With no friend but God, Sarah, he pitched his tent, reared an altar, and amid the smoke of burnt sacrifice, offered up his devotions, in strong faith, and from a joyful heart "gave glory to God." Abraham was happy, for God did bless him.

But death invades Abraham's home: Sarah is taken from him. Deeper and purer the love, the more bitter the affliction; and most keenly does Abraham realize the bereavement. And now, for the first time, does he seek for one spot of earth which he may call his own; he wished a home for the dead: "Give me," said he to the king of Heth, "a possession of a burying place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight." The purchase is made, and Sarah is buried. Abraham is told that there he, too, shall be buried in good old age. But Jehovah interposed with a precious promise, which illumined even Machpelah, and veiled the vale of death of all its gloom: a promise that was to be enjoyed through the promised seed. Though not expressly mentioned in the Book of Genesis, yet Paul to the Hebrews speaks of that promise: it was of a "heavenly country," where Abraham should have a real, unending inheritance, including "a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." Here is the climax of promise; and faith in this was the pertion of that will of unfaltering obedience characteristic of this patriarch.

Now, may we not turn to this example of denial, patience, obedience, and say with an Apostle, "Be you followers of them (him) who through faith and patience inherit the promises?" True, some of the promises which Abraham had, the Christian had not. But for these he can substitute fact. The law regulating Abraham's fleshly seed, has fulfilled its mission—the seed has come — everlasting righteousness has been brought in — the blessing is extending, and the way into the holiest, or the heavens, has been made manifest through the resurrection and ascension of the Lord Messiah; and an Apostle plainly informs Christians that God has provided better things for them than he did for the ancients.

Now, they who believe the facts, confide in the promises, and walk in the footsteps of the faith of Abraham, are adopted children of promise, and constituted heirs of an eternal, incorruptible inheritance. No temporal possession is given to the Christian saints by gospel sanction. They are awarded an Abrahamic position of pilgrims, strangers, and sojourners, with this incitive, "Rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven." O! for that faith which grasps eternity, and brings down blessings from above to mitigate the ills of this present life! Such full, undoubted confidence in the promises of God can make the joy of hope to sparkle in the tear-dimmed eye, render denial easy, and nerve the soul above all fear of death and corruption. For the gospel containing such unfailing, exalted promises, is the power of God unto salvation to all who sincerely, truly, practically believe it.

THE MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE.

BY PRESIDENT THOMPSON.

WHAT is it to send the Gospel? It is to send a new and strong stimulus into the muscles of men. It is to increase the productiveness of human labor, for it is, sooner or later, followed by the plough, the compass, the lighthouse, the railroad, the telegraph, and the steam-engine. It is to husband the resources of man. It is to increase the necessities, multiply the conveniences, and improve the arts of life; for the Gospel hath the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come. It is to send a new, and powerful, and permanent impulse into the minds of men; for, sooner or later, to send the Gospel is to send the school-master, the alphabet, the map, the black board, the scale which measures the heavens, and the balances which weigh the planets. It is to send Locke, and Newton, and Milton—philosophy, and science, and song, in their noblest forms. But, aside from this, the Gospel is itself the great stimulus of intellect—its doctrines, its promises, its revelations expand, awaken, and engage the soul.

To send the Gospel is to send liberty. It is a great declaration of independence—it is a divine declaration of independence—it is a divine declaration of human independence—it is the Magna Charta of human rights—it proclaims the dignity, the equality, the immortality of man — it stands him up in the image of his Creator, the child of God, the heir of glory. It points him inward to a tribunal more august than any human bar; it points him upward to a higher law, which sweeps the compass of the universe; it points him onward to the fires of the last day, when, independent of all human governments, each man shall stand up to give account of himself. Once let a man understand his religious rights, and he will soon assert his civil rights, for the major includes the minor. The path of civil liberty has always been in the rear of religious liberty, and always will be.

To send the Gospel is to send morality—a perfect rule of right—love to God and love to man—a rule which, though it might not be discovered by reason, commends itself to reason—a perfect motive to obedience, which, because it is infinite, cannot be exceeded—an encouragement to a fallen and guilty man to struggle with temptation, even the promise of infinite aid.

To send the Gospel is to send salvation—to close the mouth of hell and open the gate of heaven.

Does not the world need this Gospel? Let us take a bird's-eye glance at it. Run your eye Northward, toward the Polar Sea. You find a belt of land, whose sterile, frozen soil, symbolizes the moral condition of its inhabitants. On the East, with the exception of a few missionary spots, the Esquimaux sits in his wintry solitude, unwarmed by the beams of grace; on the West, the Aleutian Islander reposes in his subterranean abode, unenlightened by the Sun of Righteousness; while on the broad lakes which lie between, and the streams which bear their waters to the sea, the Pagan red man rears his humble dwelling beneath a cloud that bears no promise on its bosom. Come to that belt on which we stand, and you find Eastward the bright beams of British and American civilization; but Westward, on the slopes of the Rocky Mountains, and the banks of the rivers which bear their melted snows, on the one side to the Gulf, on the other to the Pacific, wandering tribes of red men, without hope and without God in the world. Look Southward, round the Gulf, and down to Cape Horn, and you find mingled with Paganism a Christianity, whose corruptions and imperfections call loudly for your aid. Turn to the world. Here is Europe, so long the radiant centre of science and religion, having thousands of Pagans on one border, and millions of Mohammedans upon another, and scattered from side to side three millions of the children of Abraham; while the Christianity which it presents is, to a great extent, Paganized. Ascend the Ural Mountains, and look down upon Asia, the birth-place of the human race, and the birth-place of its Redeemer; the land on which the floods descended, and on which the ark reposed; where the law came down from heaven, and God's own temple rose from earth; where patriarchs walked with God, and Apostles stood with Christ; the birth-place of science, of poetry, and of art; at whose altar-fires the Grecian and Roman lighted their tapers, and from whose groves there is still wafted to us the strains that left Isaiah's lips of fire, and David's consecrated harp! Do we not owe her something? And is she not worthy of our noblest exertions—the land of broad streams and cloud-capped mountains, of immense empires and thriving populations? Be not alarmed by her magnitude. The Christian will say, as once the Grecian did in view of Persia's hosts, "Show us how many the enemy are, but not how they are!" For the genius of Asia, a driveling dotard, the patron of false superstition, the father of a false prophet, the nurse of the follies of Buddhism, and the absurdist of abominations of the Brahminic religion. Look onward to the Pacific isles, and you witness the same scenes. To Africa, and along its Northern border, and through its interior, you find Mohammedanism, while, with the exception of a few missionary stations, the coast, all else is one black cloud of Pagan darkness.

Throughout this field which we surveyed, humanity is sluggish. You find either savagery, or barbarism, stationary civilizations—no active accumulation, no progress. Soberly, you see either sottish stupidity or gross ignorance, or dreams of anarchy. There is no liberty: everywhere you see either anarchy or despotism in their worst forms. Woman, of the race, is depressed, degraded, enslaved—here locked up in the seraglio, there yoked by the peasant to the plough; here bought and sold as chattel personal, and there denied access to the table of her husband, the temple of the gods. Woman's ingratitude, may complain of the gospel as abridging her liberties; let her go beyond the limits of intemperance, and she will find that she has left her shield. Man also is enslaved. Look at the great Indian peninsula, where caste prevails; and what a caste but that the greater part of the population must be outcasts? The Sudras, the laborers—the most numerous and useful portion of the inhabitants, are denied access to the Vedas, the sacred books. He who teaches them religion is doomed to hell. Almost everywhere in Paganism we find the population divided into masters and slaves, a division which, I am sorry to say, is in some regions of Christendom it will not be so when Christianity is thoroughly Christianized. There is too, no morality worthy of the name, no perfect rule of life, no sufficient motive to obedience, no sufficient regement to guilty and fallen man. Every where we find either infanticide or parricide, man-stealing or man-eating, or human sacrifices practiced, not as wrong, but as right. Long as the Indian pursues his foe, with uplifted tomahawk, crying "Revenge is sweet!"—long as the Mahometan mingles with the eternal truth, there is one God, the eternal falsehood, Mahomet is his prophet—long as he sums up the rule of duty in the four precepts, "Pray five times a day, looking towards Mecca—give alms to the widow and orphan—eat no meat by day time during the fast of the Ramadan — and make the pilgrimage of the Canaba"—precepts which the vilest villain on earth may scrupulously perform—long as to his excited imagination the most beautiful hours stretch their arms for the most bloody warriors, and the goodliest gate of glory opens upon the most sanguinary plain of earth—long as the Berber is an habitual thief, and the Hind and the Soories are malignant robbers, and the Bedouin transmits his hostilities to his children, an unoffending family upon the sand, crying, "There is blood between us!"—long as the Hindoo luxuriates in self-torture as the means of salvation, and the Chinese mother eagerly thrusts her infant to the arms of death, and the Malay lifts his murderous cries, and runs his deadly "a muck"—long as the Galla arrays himself in entrails, and besmears himself in blood, and rushes out to push his incursions in every direction, sparing neither age nor sex—long as the Makooas are cannibals, and the marts of Africa are crowded with human stock, and the altars of Dahomey and Ashantee smoke with human victims—so long will I pray the gospel may have free course through the earth.

There is in this field no knowledge of salvation. Viewed in any light, the condition of the heathen is sufficiently alarming. See them in their lust, and blood, and darkness. If the harvest is determined by the sowing, and if the same law prevail in the next world that we find in this, then so sure as there is a resurrection, it must be for them a resurrection unto shame and everlasting contempt. Close now the volume of nature, and open the volume of revelation, and you read that God's first great law was against idolatry; look upward, and you see over the gate of heaven the inscription, "No idolater can enter;" look downward, and you will see around the mouth of hell these words, "The nations that forget God!" I confess I cannot take those cheerful views of the Heathen that some do. I see no other way whereby men may be saved, than through Jesus: "This is life eternal, to know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." Do you say that they will be judged by the law written on the heart? Granted. But do they not violate this law? Is it possible that obedience to a law written by the finger of the true God, should work out such desolating results as we see in the Pagan world? Does not the Apostle Paul conclude that the Heathen are without excuse, because that when they knew God they glorified him not as God, but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened.

But we are not left to infer our duty. We have but to open the New Testament, and we read the great commission, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature;" a command accompanied by the promise, "Lo! I am with you alway, even to the end of the world;" and illustrated by the closing words of the sacred canon, "And the Spirit and the bride say come, and let him that is athirst come," &c. But the Christian need not open his book: let him but open his heart, and he will find his commission. The first drop of grace let fall upon a human heart makes it a witnessing heart; it cries out, "Draw near, all ye that love God, and I will tell you what he hath done for my soul;" and the next drop makes it a missionary heart, crying out, "I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh;" and the third drop, methinks, makes it a martyr heart, crying out, "I could wish myself accursed from Christ; I could be crucified, as was Jesus, if by dying I could lead my fellow-men to God." But the Christian need not open his heart; let him but open his mouth, and forth will come the proof of his high calling; for he will, if he pray according to the Saviour's model, say, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." He will testify that he is apprehended to emulate the angels, to endeavour to spread around the globe the happiness, the obedience, and the anthems of the skies. The object is desirable, is it practicable? Can we, in our own days, evangelize the world? I answer, yes. Look at the history of missions. Modern missions date in 1534, when Ignatius Loyola put some of his disciples under the vow of poverty and chastity, to consecrate themselves to the conversion of the heathen. The first great movement was in 1541, when Xavier, the great apostle of the Indies, set sail for the scene of his toils and his triumphs. What was the result? So encouraging, that the Pope endorsed the enterprise, and engaged the whole church in it. Soon the Indian peninsula, China, and the islands beyond, received the Gospel, and a cordon of missionary posts was placed in the old world around the Levant, and in the new world from Hudson's Bay to the reductions of Paraguay. In the Indies and China there was a reaction, but it was of the political element which the church had mingled with the religious. True, the ministry was expelled, and I am sorry to say, that it was not the gospel, but the missionary that was introduced. Still, it was difficult even to expel him; it took fifty years of a bloody revolution in Japan, while in China and India the chapel and the monastery still stand. In the new world, there has been no reaction. This missionary energy of Rome has been its salvation. If she, with her corruptions and disadvantages, can do so much, what may not we do? The Protestant missionary enterprise is scarcely fifty years old. True, before that, the Dutch, the Danes, the Swedes, and the English had missions, and Constantinople and London had three missionary societies; but the church had not educated herself up to the great idea of evangelizing the world. No denomination in Christendom, if we except the six hundred Moravian exiles, had opened its eye upon the duty.

Since we have commenced with a proper view, what have we accomplished? Although the church has been slow in reaching a conviction of her obligations to the world; and although, in the last fifty years, she has probably given less than one hundred millions of dollars; although this year, which has probably been the year of her greatest liberality, she gave America seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and in Europe about a million, yet what hath she accomplished? She has planted mission stations in every part of the globe, that the Sun, in his march around earth, looks down upon no half of which the voice of prayer is not ascend, in the name of Christ, the gate of heaven. She has two hundred and fifty thousand communicants in the mission churches, and two hundred and forty thousand children and adults in the mission schools; she presses at work in almost every station—she has translated the Bible into two hundred living languages accessible to six hundred millions of earth's population. She, though a warrior, who meditates the subjugation of the whole world, planted his military posts in the most advantageous positions around the globe. Had he fortified these posts, had he garrisoned them with soldiers, had he furnished them with arms, and ammunition, and skilful officers, and had planned Paixan peacemakers just when the moment the spark was applied, he would rake the fields of the foe. Can we not finish the work? I say we have not the men—we cannot fill up the chasm! Suppose we need six hundred thousand. Christian Russia can spare more than seven hundred thousand soldiers. Christian France five hundred and eighty-one thousand soldiers, or five hundred and thirty thousand and eighty thousand horsemen, and five hundred and forty thousand more. Christian England six hundred and seventy men of war, and seven thousand marines, besides an immense land force, from productive labour do nothing in time of peace but drill and counter-march, and form squares and long columns, and battle lines, and in time of war with the iron of wickedness, can Christendom furnish six hundred thousand men to fight the battles of righteousness? And observe that the world seems to be multiplying population. Christendom with a view to drain, while all heathendom decreases more than about three per centum per annum. Russia doubles her lation every fifty years, and the United States every twenty years. Observe, again, that this number would not be wanted long, for the heathen, when converted, would furnish their own ministers. But there must be ministers, and we have a scarcity at home; where shall we find them? In that great grave-yard of buried talent—the church of God. Bring him who spoke in the dull, cold ear of death to this spiritual sepulchre, and the spiritual Lazaruses will rise and say, “Here are we, send us.” Look around the world. Lo, the harvest of undying souls—for every acre of it, sure as there’s a God in heaven, he has a labourer on earth. “Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth labourers into his harvest.”

But the missionaries must be qualified. True, and we can furnish qualified men by tens of thousands—men better qualified than the Apostles, both absolutely and relatively. God has for years past been taking the golden candlesticks out of the heathen nations and putting them into Christian nations, so that they have become the great centres of the world’s illumination; and a man can no more be trained in Christendom without being enlightened, than an angel could dwell amidst the lamps of heaven without being illuminated. The mere Sabbath school pupil—yea, the individual who is even unacquainted with the alphabet—knows more of God, of man, of human duty, than did Socrates or Plato. The church, like God when he came to chaos, says, let there be light; instantly light is thrown over every moral and intellectual field.

The Apostles went from an obscure province of the Roman dominions, and encountered prejudice wherever they moved. The modern missionary goes from Britain and America, nations whose flags float in every sea, and are respected wherever they wave. God seems to have been taking power from Pagan nations, and giving it to Christians. A few British cannon battered down the Chinese wall of centuries—thirty thousand British soldiers kept in subjection one hundred and twenty million Hindoo Pagans. It is said in the Bible one shall chase a thousand; but here we see one chase four thousand. Four hundred and twenty-eight Americans marched in and out of Japan: for what Britain can do, so can her daughter; and the missionary going from either country, can hold up his head better than ever did Roman in the palmiest days of his empire. The Apostles preached to proud, polished Romans—speculative, scornful, and philosophic Grecians; the modern missionaries preach to such as the besotted African, or the stupid Hindoo.

But where shall we obtain the money? The war expenses of Great Britain alone, during the last fifty years, were £1,237,143,931—a sum which, if lent on interest at six per cent. would furnish a missionary for every thousand inhabitants among the heathen for ever. Now, if one Christian nation can spend such a principal for the destruction of men, cannot all Christian nations together furnish the interest of it for the salvation of men? Say six hundred million dollars—the estimate is extravagant, but set it down—well, fifty million for our share; double it—one hundred million—well, let each inhabitant pay four dollars, and the sum is raised. The last census shows the wealth of the country sufficient to give every citizen three hundred and fifty dollars. Cannot each, then, share four dollars for the conversion of the world? Suppose, however, we rely upon the church alone. We have, say four million communicants; let each pay twenty-five dollars, and the sum is raised; and if the wealth of the whole population average three hundred and fifty-six dollars, the wealth of the church must be one thousand dollars per member. Let it be observed that God is taking wealth out of Pagan nations, and giving it to Christian. The best lands, the most productive mines, the richest commerce, and the most profitable manufactures belong to Christendom. The mines of California and Australia have been just given to Protestant Christendom, for which they seem to have been reserved. The Levant once supplied Europe with cutlery: now Europe supplies the Levant. India once manufactured for the West: now the British manufacture even cotton for India.

Mark, too, that missions are remunerative. Thrust but the plough through Africa and Australia, and what untold resources would come forth. Whither would they flow, but into the bosom of the Christianizing nation? Look at the Sandwich Islands, converted by an outlay of eight hundred and eighty thousand dollars—scarcely enough to build a ship of war, and keep it in action a year; now she is a mart of our commerce, and our half-way house to China, sending out missionaries at her own expense to the regions beyond her.

Mark, too, that this outlay would not long be required, for every year would probably diminish greatly the necessity of missionaries—congregations would become self-supporting.

Observe, too, that Christians would not have to raise their missionary contributions alone; for if the church once resolved to do her duty, infidelity would be silenced, indifference would become alarmed, and men would fly to the gates of Zion as doves to their windows.

Observe the facilities which Providence affords us for the work. The Apostles had to travel on foot, and send out their missionaries in the same way, or, at best, on horseback. We can send missionaries by steam—we can supply their wants by steam. In Paul's day the church had to save their copper and silver, and when the contributions became considerable, despatch a special messenger to travel on foot through difficult roads and over dangerous mountains, often infested by robbers, to convey their beneficence. Now, the wants of a missionary being made known in the metropolis, travel along telegraph wires in no time, to every congregation in the land; and the contributions of the church are sent on slips of paper by the mail (an agency unknown to the apostles) travelling at the rate of thirty or forty miles an hour. We can travel to the ends of the earth in less than the time which Paul required to go from Jerusalem to Rome. The British mail goes regularly from Southampton to Hong Kong, a distance of 11,500 miles, in fifty-five days.

There is no telling what energies reside in a man till he is tried. Who dreamed that there was power in Alexander to achieve the conquest of the world? Yet when he set the object before him, the power came out of him. Who dreamed that there was power in the colonies of the United States to contend successfully with the might of Great Britain? Yet it was; and nothing more was needed to develop it, than to set before them the magnificent object of national independence. Let the church set before her the glorious enterprise of redeeming the earth, and she shall not fail. Any one of this assembly set before himself the glorious object of being the Apostle of the Gentiles, and by the grace of God, he shall go throughout the earth as a flaming Paul.

O that we could breathe into every missionary spirit! Great is the taking, but great is the promise. The ancient king, on the eve of a battle, which the enemy were ten times as strong as his own troops, went forth into the darkness, among his tents to serve the spirit of his men. He was a group murmuring against him, comparing their own number with that of the opposing host, and declaring their inability to meet the foe. Throwing off his robe and displaying the insignia of royalty, he said, "But how many of you counted for me?"

Would you go forth against a vast world? Sit down and estimate how many may be counted for, who have said, "I will be with you always."

In reflections of this kind I have often been alarmed. An infidel may be the other day, there is as much fidelity in the church as out of it. There is good reason for the remark, that if the Son of Man were to come to earth, he would find faith on the earth. He were to come into this assembly, would he find it among us? O! if we were faith as a grain of mustard seed, mountains would be removed and cast into the sea. Lord, we believe in thee, but thou our unbelief.

When I was young, I was sure of everything; in a few years, having been mistaken a thousand times, I was not half so sure of most things as before; at present I am hardly sure of anything but what God has revealed.—Wesley.

Let your piety be winning by its simplicity. We sometimes excuse the temper of a Christian by saying religion may be grafted on a crab; but when a tree is grafted, it is expected to bear fruit according to the gra-

UNION MEETING—A DIALOGUE.

A METHODIST, Baptist, and Presbyterian met after the close of a Union Prayer Meeting. Each expresses himself delighted at the increased zeal, good feeling, and flattering prospects of the union effort being made. A Reformer enters :

R.—Good morning, brethren !

M.—Why, Bro. R. were you not at our meeting this morning ? The Lord is reviving his work among us, and we would be glad to see you there.

P.—The Lord has blessed our efforts with the gracious influences of his Spirit, and a goodly number has been brought to the foot of the cross.

B.—This is a union meeting : we lay aside all our denominational peculiarities, and labor together for the conversion of men. If souls are converted, we are satisfied. It matters not what branch of the church they connect themselves with afterward.

R.—If I were satisfied that you were laboring according to the will of the Lord, and that you possessed the true "unity of the Spirit," I would unite with you with the utmost pleasure.

M.—You speak of the "unity of the Spirit ;" do you believe in the influence of the Spirit ?

R.—I am happy to inform you that it is my undoubted conviction, that no man ever had a just idea of God, of heaven, of religion, of the spiritual universe, of the origin and destiny of man, but by and through the Holy Spirit ; that true religion is begun, carried on, and consummated by the Holy Spirit ; and that all the union and communion enjoyed by the Lord's people are through the Spirit's influence.

B.—If this be your sentiment, you surely ought to unite with us in this great work. We are endeavouring to have the people converted to the Lord, and not to a party. That the Spirit's power is manifest in our midst, is evident from the effect produced. What but the special grace of God could enable us to lay aside our minor differences, and labor together as a band of brothers for the good of souls ?

P.—These union efforts and union prayer meetings are an indication to my mind that the millennium is approaching.

R.—I am not calling in question your sincerity in all this ; but I think that the Spirit, when it influences men, will induce them to labor according to the will of God.

B.—Do we not labor in that way ?

R.—Not if the Bible is to be recognized as his revealed will. Instead of preaching the simple Gospel as the Apostles did, you deal in experiences, tell anecdotes, and frighten people with the horrors of hell. Instead of telling people to "Repent and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins," as did the Apostles, you teach them to come to something called by you an anxious seat and mourner's bench, and there to receive pardon through your prayers and theirs. The Spirit, when it came to the Apostles, and guided them into all truth, never taught such lessons as this ; and I am unable to believe that the Lord has revealed to you what was hidden from the Apostles of the Lamb ; I am unable to believe that the Spirit sanctions such departures from the truth.

M.—We have tried the mourner's bench for a hundred years, and the Lord has owned and blessed it in the conversion of thousands ; and there are myriads of living witnesses to-day, that can testify of God's power to convert souls at the mourner's bench.

R.—The Catholic confessional is more than ten times as old as the mourner's bench ; and there are millions of living witnesses this day, who can testify to God's power to forgive sins through the priest at the confessional.

P.—Do you pretend to find a likeness between the anxious seat and the confessional ?

R.—Only in this respect—they are institutions of man's device—God never appointed either. Show me your practice—your means of conversion in the Bible, and I will show you the confessional in the same chapter.

M.—But persons who come forward for prayer, realize the saving grace of God ; they feel that they have passed from death unto life.

R.—So does the Catholic feel that he is pardoned : and he thinks that he realizes the pardon of his sins at the confessional, and is happy in the conviction. Read Kirwan to Bishop Hughes : he will tell you that he used to leave the confessional without a doubt that his sins were all remitted ; and that his conscience, which was before burdened, was fully relieved. Why not take a Catholic experience ?

B.—But the poor ignorant Romanist is deluded.

R.—How do you know that he is deluded ?

B.—Why, because the Bible condemns his course.

R.—You mean because the confessional is not found in the Bible ?

B.—Certainly !

R.—Well, that is the very reason why I have nothing to do with your anxious seat : it is not in the Bible. I reject both on the same grounds.

M.—Do you pretend to say that we Protestants are deluded, like the Roman Catholics ?

R.—I do say this, that where people depend upon human means, and their feelings for evidence of pardon, they are, thus far, upon a par with the Catholics. People will always feel as they are taught. Catholics feel that they are pardoned at the confessional, because they are taught so ; and people feel that they are pardoned at the anxious seat, because they are taught so. In both cases the evidence of pardon comes from human testimony and human feeling, and is, consequently, worthless.

P.—Then you reject Christian experience ?

R.—No ! I reject human experiences : but believe most fervently in the experience of the Bible ; which is, that sinners should comply with the terms that God has appointed through the apostles ; and then feel that they are pardoned, because the Lord has taught it. Now, when you can unite in preaching to sinners what the apostles did, I can unite with you in your labors ; and not till then. But before I leave, I will just add, that the presence of the Holy Spirit is manifested by its fruits, which are "love, joy, peace," &c. See that ye exhibit these fruits as an evidence of your spiritual union. (Exit R.)

P.—It is strange how these Campbellites always stand up against the visible manifestations of God's power and experience. He has no desire to participate in the works of grace. Well did an apostle say, that some would separate themselves, having not the Spirit !

M.—I guess he will not be much and we shall be able to get a well, if not better, without him.

B.—Brethren, we are united in conversion of sinners, and we must neglect to oppose such pernicious. If we do not preach out-right to them, we may make an impression more solemn allusion to it in our

The parties mutually separated the afternoon B. visits one of the converts.

B.—Well, brother, how does your soul prosper to-day ?

Y. C.—I feel that the Lord has been gracious to me, in pardoning my sins.

B.—Thank the Lord for that. You determined what church you would unite with ?

Y. C.—I had not thought much of it : for you all said it mattered not what branch of the church we united ourselves with ; that if we were converted, and had the one thing needful, all else were mere minor matters.

B.—Brother, I don't wish you to say anything about it now, so that it will not interrupt the business of these good meetings ; but the Methodists and Presbyterians are members of the church of Christ for the only method of getting true church is by immersion : we only sprinkle a little water upon converts—a custom which they learned from the Pope or John Calvin.

Y. C. (astonished).—And do you regard them as members of the church ?

B.—Not at all ! We never to commune with them—it is against our rules — we only invite our faith and order to our common table.

Y. C. — How, then, can you unite with them and pray with them at their meetings ?

B.—We do that in places where there are few in number. We find the most successful method to get converts, but afterward we use our own discretion about these things. One of our elders, not long since, refused to let a Presbyterian minister sit with him at the Presbyterian's own pulpit, (as he did in Nashville, Ten.) and he assigned the same reason for it that we do now—communing with them ; and I think that this will be the final result.

if we can accomplish a good end by uniting with them for a time, we are justified in being "wise as serpents." Here is a book I wish you to read, to convince you that immersion only is baptism, and that the Pædo-baptist churches are only off-shoots from Catholicism. It is called "Theodosia, or the Heroine of Faith." I will call again.

The young convert turns to the book and begins to read—which, by the way, turns out to be a well written novel, compounded of courtship, love, and Baptist theology. And inasmuch as he had formerly been addicted to light reading, it goes down with a gusto; he wishes to see the end. While intently engaged in reading it, Presbyterian enters. Young convert lays aside the book, as he understands P. to be opposed to novels.

P. — I come to speak to you of the state of your soul.

Y. C. — I feel a great relief, and I trust that my sins are all forgiven me.

P. — Well, brother, the next step with you is to connect yourself with the church, that you may partake of its ordinances. Have you made choice of your church relations yet?

Y. C. — I have not! I had been told by each of you, in your ministrations, that you were all evangelical Christians, and I thought it was a matter of but little consequence which branch of the church I connected myself with.

P. — I would be sorry to hear that you had joined the Baptists, not that I think there are no Christians among them; but on account of their uncharitableness and low origin — I mean their views in reference to immersion being the only mode of baptism, and their close communion. I should much dislike to see you placed, my brother, in a position where I, with two-thirds of those who are engaged in this revival, could not commune with you.

Y. C. — This is a solemn thought, I confess.

P. — And then their origin as a sect! They descended from the Anabaptists of Munster: and a more low, ignorant, and degraded class of people has seldom been known. It is true, they show off to better advantage in these days, but the spirit of the sect is the same. I think if you will carefully read this work on baptism, (handing him a book) you will be convinced that there is no authority for immersion in the Bible. Here is another work I wish you to read: it is Dr. Miller on the Presbyterian form of church government.

P. leaves, and young convert proceeds with Theodosia. The next day he was fully absorbed in the interesting narrative, and as he reached the point where Theodosia had informed her beloved (the accomplished young Presbyterian lawyer, to whom she was espoused) that she chose to renounce him, the idol of her affections, as also the good will of many of her most valued friends, to unite with the persecuted Baptists; and where was portrayed the distresses of poor Percy — his heart-groans, his sickness, his drougement, &c. — his feelings were wrought up to the highest pitch, and tears flowed in profusion. M. enters.

M. — Thank God for the power of religion! Truly the Lord can take away the stony heart, and give a heart of flesh! Praise the Lord, brother, for his goodness.

Y. C. — I feel that I have passed from death unto life.

M. — What portion of the good Word of the Lord were you reading, brother?

Y. C. — It is not the Bible I am reading: it is a book which Bro. B. lent me yesterday.

M. — A religious book, I suppose?

Y. C. — Yes: I suppose so!

M. — What is the title?

Young Convert reads the title, and proceeds to give the outlines of the work; and concludes by telling M. that the book had made a great impression on his mind, and that he was convinced of his duty to be immersed and become a Baptist.

M. — And you have come to this determination from reading that novel! I fear that a heart that can be influenced by a work of fiction is not right before God, and that you have not been soundly converted. You had better pray for religion, than to be led about by such trash.

Y. C. — But I now feel it my duty to be a Baptist, as much as I felt that my sins were pardoned, and you said I had to determine that by my feelings.

As Young Convert seemed very determined as to his course, and withal much affected, M. leaves him alone, and soon after meets P.

M. — I have been to see our young friend, who we thought was hopefully converted the other day, and found him reading and crying over a novel, which B. had left with him, to make a Baptist of him ; and it has made such an impression on his mind, that he is going to join them.

P. — If ever there was a hypocrite on earth, that man is one. He has been all around among the recent converts, and even to some of my members, instilling into them his Baptist notions, and trying to disaffect them against our churches ; and at the same time he professed at the beginning, and all the time in public, that he did not care what church the converts joined. And now it appears, from what you say, that he has his Baptist theology all mixed up with a love-tale, to make an impression on the weak-minded.

M. — This is true.

P. — The Campbellites are great errorists, but they are manly and Christian compared with him. They will tell you out-right where they stand, and oppose you by open argument. They do nothing on the sly ; and I never heard of their descending to circulate love-tales along with their peculiarities, to make them acceptable to the people. Alas ! for our union meetings !

(R. approaches.)

R. — Brethren, the millennium — peace and good will — jars and discords have ceased — denominational peculiarities are laid aside, and we have the demonstration of our eyes, that men, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, can do the good work of the Lord without a jar or a schism to afflict their brethren — these must be happy days for brethren — these days of union !

P. — I am sorry to say that many of our meetings is entirely broken, and that there is now more denominational strife and hard feeling before we had these meetings.

R. — This is no news to me at all. I did not participate in your meeting, 1st, Because you did not enforce obedience of the Gospel : but rested upon a human appliance to effect conversion of sinners ; and 2d, Because, that where persons hold adverse systems, make a compromise for the time being, there is no union — there is ever an undercurrent of denominational pride, dissent, and private electioneering, which will argue that the flesh, more than the Spirit, has to do with such matters. And when this becomes manifest to the community — as it ever will — it does dishonor the Christian union, than a thousand such unions can do to honor it. J.

PEACE.

(EXTRACT FROM AN ADDRESS DELIVERED IN THE CAMDEN HALL.)

THE war has commenced — the booming cannon is heard — the swords and the spears glitter in the light of the Sun — the cold steel pierces the heart of the youthful soldier — men meet each other in deadly conflict, and thousands lie scattered in all the helplessness of death. The God of peace have they not known ; they have put their trust in the sword, and they have perished with it. We have received heart-rending news from the field of slaughter — our spirits are bowed down within us, and we can find no comfort, no hope, only in Him who is the God of peace. We are living in perilous and troublesome times ; men's hearts are failing them through fear, and those who are great and mighty on the earth are unable to divine what issues will be. The minds of nations are perturbed, the thrones are held by an uncertain tenure, crowns which now glitter upon the brows of tyrants may soon be scattered into the dust. The dependent states await with intense anxiety to know from which side the storm of victory shall come, merchants are perplexed, commerce is in doubt, capitalists are in doubt, thousands are being killed, and millions are suffering. But our God is a God of peace, and our friend of war, at the bidding of our God, has again, amidst the blasphemous earth and the plaudits of hell, mounted his chariot of fire ; and he rides forth, cheered by the smiles of the reckless and desperate, to scatter anarchy and desolation amidst the nations of the world. And though he is heralded by the trumpet's blast, and his ears are filled with martial strains, and the banners of the deluded ones float over his head, he is a tyrant from the bottomless pit, and the way of mercy he hath not known. On his dark brow is written rebellion against the God of peace ; and from his right hand is flung the thunderbolt of destruction, which is accompanied by the scattering burning lightning of his own implacable wrath. Flashes of fire, clouds of smoke, yells of madness, shrieks of death, mangled limbs and streams of blood are always in his pathway. The cloud of darkness encompasses his head, and enslaved nations lie at his feet. He marches, gazes, haunts ; a dead calm pervades, and all minds are in suspense. At length the first shot is fired ; then what a fearful raging there is of the tempest and the storm. Violence and hatred have met together, and blood and death have embraced each other. All the artillery of the bottomless arsenal is employed in this fearful engagement, for the purpose of murdering the children of men. Oh, my friends, what a consolation it is, that amidst the din and sufferings of war, we can meet together and hopefully trust in the God of peace. The world lieth in the hands of the wicked one. The church is encompassed in the arms of God. The world cannot give peace. It is the Gospel, and the Gospel alone, which can bestow this precious boon. After a deadly conflict the opposing powers, when worn and exhausted, with their foul and desperate hands deeply baptized in the blood of humanity, take their rest for a time, and the world calls it peace. But what a poor peace it is. The spirit of war has for a time glutted itself, and the nations repose. Yet during that time of rest they enjoy not in the best sense the blessings of peace. They have but halted to sharpen their swords, to point their spears, to make the cannons, to clean the guns, to build the men of war, to sing the songs of self-exaltation, and foolishly depreciate others. During the world's peace the mind which now knows good and evil, will exercise the latter quality in ingeniously manufacturing the most deadly implements of war. Raw recruits are enlisted, the war-fiend again casts his lurid eye upon some desired spot, at once a defiant position is assumed, and the language of imperious dictation speaks only of impending war. During the time of peace, by the genius and industry of the people, the exchequer is improved, prosperity gilds the pathway of the sons of toil, schools multiply, education increases, and social blessings abound. The honest laborer gladly returns to his home, and though humble be his fare, his wife smiles, his children prattle, his heart is glad, and he still hopes for a brighter and a better day. But the expectations are cut off. The greedy and devouring spirit of war has had but a resting-time in order that he might gather strength, and clutching the nation's purse which the people have filled, he spends it in the spilling of their blood. Their confidence and hope have fled, and their songs of peace and gladness are drowned in the shrieks and death-groans of war. What a poor, shallow, empty peace is that which the world supplies ! How lasting and enduring is that which the Gospel bestows ! The God of the church is the God of peace. The god of the world is the god of war. The Saviour of the church is the Prince of peace, at whose incarnation the angels sang the song of peace. In his memorable sermon on the mount he said, "Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God." To his disciples he spoke of righteousness and peace, and before he left them he said, "My peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you." Jesus is the Captain of our salvation, and for us he hath conquered principalities and powers. The songs of the church are the melodies of peace, which flow from happy and generous hearts. The songs of the world are all out of tune and discordant, and they only tell us of destruction and woe. The songs of the church are full of life, hope, and immortality ; while the songs of war tell only of pain, misery, defeat, physical conquest, and death. The prayers of the church are the prayers of peace, and they are burdened with good wishes for the children of men. They lovingly connect us with God and humanity ; they give us a hope of heaven, and cause us to be the most useful and happy inhabitants of the earth. The church prays for the peace of Jerusalem, for the glory of Zion, and for the enlightenment of the world. We shudder when we think of the prayers of those who are engaged in war. The conflicting powers which are in a state of deadly enmity against each other, do impiously dare to pray to the same God. The Emperor of Austria bids his ignorant and desperate soldiers to go forth in the name of God, while the Emperor of the French adopts the same course, and the King of Sardinia, with his priests and people, say Amen. Is this how they love as true Catholics? The prayers of conflicting armies are a mockery. The formal and forced petitions of despots cannot prevail with Him who is a God of mercy and justice, except it be that the insulted Majesty may pour down upon the heads of each the vials of His wrath, and scatter them with the breath of His displeasure. If the Gospel be true, war is practical infidelity; and those who engage in it cannot be followers of the Prince of Peace. The evangelists of the church are messengers of peace. "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of those who bringeth glad-tidings of peace and salvation!" Of the emissaries of war it may be said, How terrible upon the mountains are the feet of those who bringeth the tidings of desolation and death! The hope of the church is eternal peace. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." In war men are killed — in the church they are saved. In war some lose their feet, and others their hands; some are blinded, and others are made deaf, while thousands upon thousands welter in their blood. In the church the feet are shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace — the hands are employed in doing good — the eye is made glad with the sights which are beautiful, and it feasts upon the glories of the promised land; while the ears are charmed with the songs of salvation and praise. Christ is our object, our hope, our all. The King of Salem is the King of Peace, and it is our glory to be peaceful subjects in the kingdom of our Lord. Sinner, you are not at peace with yourself. There is a war raging within you — good and evil are striving, and unless you are careful the evil will obtain the mastery, and involve your spirit in eternal gloom. Have you not heard? Will you not obey the voice and invitation of the Saviour, and come unto him, that you may have eternal life? When the world desires peace, treaties are made and signed, but how quickly some of them are broken. Perhaps they were deemed at the point of the bayonet, and as the menacing instrument was drawn, the parties considered that moral obligation had ceased. When peace is declared between soul and God. Though the threatenings of the Law may fill the spirit with alarm, there stands the merciful, loving Saviour, full of boundless passion, and he invites us to come to him, in order that by his precious blood, all our sins may be washed away. The sinner finds peace with God through the water, the word, and the blood; and the pen of God's love, blots out our transgressions and our pardon in the book of life. He has been dipped in the blood of the Lamb, by which our eternal redemption is made sure. Poor soldier of the cross, what have you in possession as a memorial of your labors, dangers, and toils? Perhaps a small medal, amongst the disabled or wounded, a trifling pension; and for once, perhaps, that your earthly sovereign, at a considerable distance, has deigned to bestow a smile. It is not so with the soldier of the cross; he has no medal, but he has the word of the Lord, which liveth and abideth for ever. There is laid up for him not a pension which will cease, but riches in heaven, where neither moth nor rust can corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal. He has the promise of the Kingdom, which now is, and of that which is to come, and he feels with the great apostle, that henceforth there is laid up for him a crown which shall be given him in that day. He has the approving smile of the King of kings and lords, and he waits with patience until the time when his Great Deliverer shall come to liberate his spirit from its house of clay, that it may become a glorified inhabitant in the house which is made with hands, which is eternal. Unhappy denizens of this world, where is your hope? And amidst such conflicting elements, how can you flee for safety? What has the nins of war done for you? And what does this spirit of evil send to you? From the dread portals of war the cannon ball may be hurled to desolate your homes, and to destroy yourselves and others. War sends you the recruiting serjeant, who cajoles and leads away your children. The church sends you the home missionary, whose aim is to make you children of God and heirs of the kingdom. War unfolds to you a fearful list of the killed and wounded. The church refers you to those who through much tribulation have entered the kingdom, and are now singing the praises of God and the Lamb. War allures you from your home, and you die in the battle-field. The church is the home of the Christian; there he spends his days in faith and love, and dies amidst the blessings and benedictions of his friends, with a sure and certain hope of a resurrection unto eternal life. Italy, how fair and beautiful thou art! Thy hills, how verdant—thy valleys, how rich and fertile. With thee the spirit is enchanted. Thy nooks and dells are classical—thy poets, sculptors, painters, and philosophers, have filled the world with their fame, and the sweet music of thy ardent sons and beautiful daughters hath echoed and re-echoed from hill to hill, until the trees of the forest, the flowers of the glen, the beasts of the field, and the birds of the air seemed animate with the songs of peace, happiness, and praise. Many of thy sons of science and philosophy have passed away, but they have left behind them imperishable memorials of their fame. Thou canst vie with the world in beauty, and while we speak the glorious sun of heaven is pouring its light upon thee, and all thy gorgeous scenery is eloquent with the utterances of poetry and truth. The most graphic and truthful painters are inadequate to do thee justice, and no bard is sufficiently gifted to award thee aneulogium commensurate with thy elegance, fertility, and beauty. No lover of Nature can speak too highly of thy splendid perspective, where all that is beautiful and magnificent combine to awaken in the soul feelings of the highest admiration and deepest love. Thy glorious sky and gorgeous sun-settings—thy beautiful flowers, plants, fruits, birds of flight, and beasts of toil, all contribute to fill our hearts with love towards thee —and thy fair sons and graceful daughters alike inspire us with a hope, that the time will come when thou shalt be free from the bondage of political and religious despotism by which thou hast so long been enslaved. The dark shadows of Roman Catholicism have fallen upon thee, whereby thy morals have been blighted, and thy once enterprising spirit hath been fettered by priestly dogmas, and degraded by a bigotry which is both cruel and licentious; and at this moment the bloodhounds of war are desolating thy plains, and some of the strongest of the youths of Austria and France, amidst thy fruits and flowers, are falling by the edge of the sword, wetting thy soil with their blood. The dark cloud of war portends for thee a day of sorrow and a night of woe. Two despots are shedding blood. Farms are desolated, fruit is destroyed, laborers are distressed, and want and horror abound. Ye sons and daughters of a beautiful soil, what a pity it is that thy spirits have not been awakened to a sense of duty and love by the soul-melting strains of the Gospel of Christ! Why should not thy ancient valleys be glad, and thy hills rejoice on either side, in the presence of those messengers of peace who proclaim salvation through the blood of the Lamb? Why should not thy spirits be freed from the incubus which a false religion hath imposed upon them, that they may live in the light of liberty and truth? Let it be so, and thou shalt greatly surpass in moral glory thy ancient liberty and intellectual renown. The cure for thy evils is the Word of Truth and the Gospel of Christ. Belief and obedience will humble thee in the sight of God, and exalt thee amongst the nations of the world. In the presence of the glorious Gospel the sword is beaten into the ploughshare, and the spear turned into the pruning-hook; the cannon is useless, the battlements fall, the war banner waves no more, all martial music is hushed, enmity dies, nations love each other, and Christ is all in all. The millennial rejoicings are the death-knell of war, and the saints of earth and the angels of heaven, with united thanksgivings to God and the Lamb, usher in the dawn of pure and eternal peace.

REBEKAH AND JACOB.

THE sins and failings of God's elect, as recorded in the Scriptures, have sometimes occasioned perplexity to the simple-minded Christian, whose standpoint of view is from the platforms of a higher dispensation of divine grace, and a modern state of society materially influenced by the morality of a clearer revelation than that which existed before the appearance of the Great Teacher, who spoke as never man did. On the other hand, the same recorded facts have often afforded subjects of profane merriment on which scoffers have largely descanted, in order to depreciate the book which narrates them, and discard the Divine message which it contains—as if the Bible did not tell us that its saints were men of like passions as ourselves, and every-day experience did not teach us that the blackest crimes of the rudest ages mentioned in the Bible, occasionally find their counterparts in the civilization of the nineteenth century. Yet the Bible, as it is, is better adapted to give us correct views of God and of man, than it would be were it divested of those narratives which sometimes grieve the heart of the Christian to contemplate, and harden the heart of the sceptic against its divine authority: to the one, indeed, it is the savour of life, ending in life; but to the other, the savour of death, ending in death. In the ninth chapter of Genesis we learn, that after Noah and his family were settled on the new-born earth, he planted a vineyard, and when using the fruits of it, in the gladness of his heart, he forgot the temperance which ought to be observed, and became drunk. The younger son, Ham, looked on "his father's nakedness," and so violated the principle contained in the fifth commandment; but "Shem and Japheth took a garment, and laid it upon both their shoulders, and went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father; and their faces were backward, and they saw not their father's nakedness." The consequences resulting from these actions were very important, and the conduct of Shem and Japheth may suggest a rule for our guidance, in forming an estimate of the characters of the persons mentioned in the subsequent pages of the Bible.

These remarks have been occasioned by the perusal of an article, coming on page 222 of the current volume of the Harbinger, which, to say the least of it, contains a great deal of "aggration" respecting the conduct and character of Rebekah and Jacob. We have no objections to the writer of the article declaring at length against duplicity, falsehood, and misrepresentation; but I object to his adducing Rebekah and Jacob as the embodiment of these noxious principles, while administering rebuke to some unnumbered transgressors, or inculcating imperious virtues on the observance of the otherhood. That they deceived Isaac to the identity of Esau, there can be no more doubt than that Shem and Japheth believed that their father was drunk, but Rebekah was not "a treacherous wife," nor Noah a drunkard, to each of them fell into a sin characteristic of such persons. Some of the faults of the said article appear to consist in applying to Rebekah and Jacob epithets descriptive of unchristian characters, and from the exaggerated view given of her sin, insinuating that Rebekah "died with the guilt upon her soul;" while the writer's sympathy for "poor Esau, the injured child," might not unwarrantably incline the reader to suspect that he is either an Edomite or an Ishmaelite, or at least that he has but very partially learned the language of Canaan, or studied the tokens of Divine approbation and special promises made to Jacob and his seed.

In treating of the characters of Rebekah and Jacob, it is proper to review the whole recorded facts of their history, and not take one or two questionable actions of their lives as exponents of the habitual state of their minds. Rebekah is introduced to our notice as a damsel who was sent by her father to meet the servant of Abraham, that she might become the wife of Isaac. She readily entered into the Divine arrangement, received a hearty blessing from her parents, went home with Isaac, and was married to Isaac, who loved her greatly. Their happy union was attended with the Divine approbation and great prosperity. One thing only was wanting to perfect their city—twenty years had elapsed and had no child. Isaac entreated the Lord for his wife, and the Lord granted his request. Rebekah conceived twins. Like the holy women of ancient time, she was no stranger to divine communion, and she inquired of the Lord respecting their offspring: "And the Lord said unto her, two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels; and the one people shall be stronger than the other people, and the elder shall serve the younger." This heavenly communication she no doubt treasured up in her heart, and Isaac would not be kept in ignorance of its import. The characters of her sons developed themselves in accordance with the prediction: Esau, like Nimrod of old, was a skilful hunter, and early imbibed the spirit of violence and murder, and disregard for Divine institutions; but Jacob, like Abraham and Isaac, tended his flocks, and cultivated an acquaintance with Him who "maketh the hinds to calve."

Space cannot be afforded here to dwell upon this interesting history. In course of time, Isaac becomes old, and begins to "set his house in order" by taking his favourite son to prepare for the paternal blessing. His mistaken partiality for the profane Esau, "because he did eat of his venison," arrests Rebekah's attention, who knew Isaac's failings as well as his virtues. She could recollect, that at a time when his faith was weak and the fear of losing his life was strong, he taught her to say of himself, "He is my brother;" and now she considered her husband about to do something that would run counter to the purpose of God, as made known to her by the Lord respecting her two sons, and therefore, without waiting for Divine direction under these perplexing circumstances, she repeated to some extent the act of deception, which she had previously been taught to practice to save her husband's life, in order to secure to her elect son the blessing which belonged to him by the promise of God, and to prevent the children of the hated Hittites, whom Esau had married, from coming into the possession of the inheritance of Abraham. Rebekah succeeded in her purpose. The means she took to effect her laudable object we cannot justify, either by the principles of New Testament precept, or the light of natural reason; but may we not say that the issue of this matter was of the Lord, who said, "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated?" For this election, and its consequent privileges, did not depend on Isaac, who willed to bless Esau, who ran for venison that his father might eat and bless him; but it depended on God, who may bestow his favours as he pleases.

With respect to the state of mind of Rebekah and Jacob at this time, and immediately afterwards, as regards Divine acceptance and holy communion with one another and with Isaac, we can say but little. Let us not seek to be wise above what is written. Particular mention of the repentance of God's ancient people for the sins into which they occasionally fell, seldom occurs in the Scriptures; but from the subsequent history of Rebekah and Jacob, it is evident that they lived in harmony with Isaac — rejoicing in the promises made to Abraham and his seed through Jacob, and consequently, they will inherit the kingdom which God hath prepared for them that love him; while the profane Esau continued his ungodly practices, and was a grief of heart both unto Isaac and Rebekah—a stranger to the institutions of promise, and left to the uncovenanted mercies of God and the retributions of a future state. There appears to me no ground for the assertions of J. I. of London, that Rebekah and Jacob "were both degraded in their own and each other's estimation;" that "both had offended God;" that Rebekah "was guilty of the mean and contemptible practice of listening" to what was not intended for her to hear; that she was "a foolish and designing mother, a treacherous wife," and that "for her conduct all ages will rebuke her," &c. Such phrases might be expected to be met with in the columns of the Infidel Reasoner, but their appearance on the pages of the Harbinger can only be regarded with painful regret. It is well that the Editor constantly announces that he is "not responsible for every opinion put forth by the contributors," and we know enough of his manifold duties and feeble health to account for the appearance of an article occasionally, which has not had the advantage of being subjected to his judicious pruning knife.

Paul mentions Rebekah in his writings, but no rebuke is administered by him; and we should take care that we do not rashly vilify this "daughter of Abraham." She died, and was buried in the same grave with Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Jacob, and Leah; and if David could say of Saul and Jonathan, "They were lovely and pleasant in their lives," we surely cannot say less of Rebekah and Jacob, though they failed in some instances to exemplify the high morality which, in the Scriptures, we are commanded always to practice.

[We feel obliged to Bro. J. S. for observations on the lives and character of Rebekah and Jacob; and had they extended at greater length upon the worldly and unbelieving state of Isaac's mind at the time they would have proved still more interesting to our readers. At the period referred to, Isaac was about 130 years of age; Esau and Jacob about 70; and as Isaac survived fifty years, suffering from deprivation of sight, he had ample time afforded him for reflection on his own conduct, and his dealings of God with him, his predecessors, and the children of men in general.—

BIBLE EDUCATION.

WE wish kindly, in this article, to recommend the Bible as a text-book to those who are actually engaged in the profession of teaching. The system, which we propose on this subject, is not peculiar to us, but one which has been tested successfully by many eminent educators.

The Old and New Testament Scriptures ought, in our opinion, to be introduced into every college, and a thorough course through them be made necessary to graduation. They should also be daily taught in our schools, and studied upon the same principle as the sciences. For why should the student spend years in Horace and Xenophon, and not a day in Moses? If it is proper for him to cultivate a taste for the beautiful thoughts of Socrates, why not also for the much more beautiful maxims of Solomon?

It is commonly admitted that no education is complete without much knowledge of the Bible. This desirable information is obtained by the young, in most communities, either from the pulpit or in the Sunday School. Children, however, are not usually capable of appreciating the former; and the latter is inadequate to their wants. Verse reading and familiar lectures have been adopted by some, with very great success. Although these methods of instruction are excellent, yet I am persuaded that none of them are equal to daily, prescribed recitations in this, the noblest and holiest of all studies. There can, indeed, be no valid objection to the incorporation, into the college curriculum, of that book, which is so well calculated to embody more wisdom than any other. How praiseworthy is to see the amiable student apply his mind alternately to the Gospel and to the classics. He, by so doing, reveres the Sacred Oracles the more because, by the contrast, he perceives their superiority.

Partyism would not be fostered by our plan, as some might suppose, by informing the people, if we were destroyed. This question, however, may be proposed, Can the Bible be taught as a class-book in our primary schools? Certainly it can—and with the happiest results. Portions of it are admirably adapted to juvenile pupils. What could be more simple and suited to their capacity than the story of Joseph, or the still more simple and beautiful biography of Jesus? The little boy and girl carry the Bible to school, if they prefer, upon their arm that they do their arithmetic, geography, and study it as they go. It will not interfere with any good author or branch of learning, but will sanctify the whole education. The promiscuous and universal use of it in every institution, could scarcely be objectionable. For as the warrior does but little fighting with the sword, so the wicked could do but little harm with the life-giving word. It would meet the approbation of the Father of the faithful. He says, "Search the Scriptures," and again, "Let us reason together." Isaiah beautifully adumbrates the happy period, when "the earth shall full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." We meekly urge the fulfilment of this prophecy, by commending a thorough Christian education. In conclusion, we say—Imbue the mother and the teacher with the Holy Spirit, and they will reform the world. The presentation of themes like this, by many scribes, will at least persuade those who glory in the Bible "alone," to admit it into the modest Academy, as well as the highest University. J. C. R.

EXEGESIS (LUKE V. 24.)

JESUS said to the paralytic, "Rise, take up thy couch, and go into thy house." Why did he say this? Could he not have imparted strength to the paralytic by simply willing it? Certainly he could. Why then say it? A leprous person once said, "If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean;" and he said the truth. Jesus said it in order to prove the truth of an important claim which he made. He claimed to have authority on the earth to forgive sins. "But that you may know that the Son of Man has authority on the earth to forgive sins," he said to the paralytic, "Rise, take up thy couch, and go into thy house."

The paralytic had been brought to the place where Jesus was, and where such a concourse had assembled, that it was impossible to pass him into the house through the door, and they let him down through the roof. When Jesus saw this faith, or confidence, he said to the afflicted man, "Child (teknon) thy sins are forgiven thee."

But "some of the Scribes, who were sitting there, said in their hearts (or reasoned in their hearts) why does this man thus utter revilings? Who can forgive sins except one, God?" Jesus, from whom their thoughts were not concealed, said, "Why do you reason these things in your hearts? Which is easier; to say to the paralytic, Thy sins are forgiven thee—or to say, Rise, take up thy couch and walk?" This question was put to them before he commanded the paralytic to take up his couch. Just as they were making up their answer, which was, that one was as easy as the other, he told the paralytic to rise, take up his couch, and go home. When they saw the man do as he was commanded, they saw the proof that the Son of Man had authority on earth to forgive sins.

We have rendered the Greek word (eksousia) authority, as that is the exact sense of the word. Dunamis is more properly rendered power, or strength. S. E. S.

CHRIST'S CHURCH IDENTIFIED.—No. VI.

"Upon this rock will I build my church."

If we would identify a person, we ascertain or prove his sameness. His features, his complexion, the colour of his hair and eyes, his height, his nativity and residence, his name, and other characteristics and circumstances may be brought into requisition for this purpose. If any given person under examination differs from the person sought, in features and complexion, in the colour of his hair and eyes, in height, and especially, if it can be fully and fairly proved that he has, and always has had another name, he cannot be identified as the person sought. The very reverse is proved from that which was intended. So if the churches of the sects differ from the apostolic church, in their foundation, in their materials, in their terms of admission, in their constitution, in their creed, in their rules of government, in their name, and in their banner, how, by any rational possibility, can they be identified as Christ's church? The different sects of Baptists are not identical with one another, nor with Methodists and Presbyterians! Each differs from all, and all from each—and in many instances, differ more from the apostolic church than from one another! The corollary, therefore, is, that as each of these sects is a different entity from all other sects, so, each and all them, taken together, are different entities—different organizations from the apostolic church.

In order further to illustrate this question, I will present the reader with a review of a sermon preached by Professor D. a Baptist, some years ago, before an Association, and published, I believe, by request.

The grand object of this sermon is given by the author in the first paragraph :

"Our object is not to trace the history of a name, but of principles and practice. We shall not attempt to prove that the apostolic churches were called Baptist churches; but we shall endeavour to show that the principles and practice of the latter bear a most striking resemblance to the former; and shall inquire whether history, in her downward march through sixteen hundred years, takes notice of such a people."

On the 27th page, the author tells us how much he thinks he has proved.

"We think," says he, "that we have proved conclusively, that God has had a people in the world, according to the election of grace, who have kept the ordinances as they were delivered; that they were called by different names, in different ages. Novatians, Donatists, Puritans, Paterines, Publicans, Paulicians, Leonists, Albigenes, Waldenses, or Waldenses, Anabaptists, &c.; that in many of their doctrines, and in the observance of the ordinances, these bodies of Christians and the Baptists of the 19th century are identical with each other, and with the model church at Jerusalem," &c.

Having now shown how much Mr. D. thinks he has proved, it remains that we inquire whether or not he is correct in his thinking. We grant that he has proved that in every age there have been multitudes who have stood up and protested against prevalent corruptions—that there have been Christians from the days of the apostles to the present time—that there have been reformers in all ages of the church, as there are reformers now, calling upon their fellow professors to repudiate humanisms in religion, and popular delusions; but we deny that he has proved either that the apostolic churches were Baptist churches, or that any of the sects which he names were Baptist churches. And he has failed to tell us when the Baptist church began to be called Baptist. He no doubt feels last question to be a ticklish point, hence he demonstrates his dexterity in passing over it.

He tells us that his "object was to trace the history of a name, but of principles and practice." Now, suppose it had been his object to trace the history of the Baptist name, how far the stream of time do you suppose would have ascended. Comparatively the distance of but a very few years. But suppose he could have traced the name Baptist up to the model church at Jerusalem: do you not suppose he could have done it? Then we should have had the Baptist church at Jerusalem. We should have had the bride of the Lamb's wife, instead of wearing the name of her husband, calling him her father after an ordinance, or after the name of a servant of her husband. The primitive church, was, in this respect, far from being guilty of any flagrant impropriety.

It is known that the Baptists, as well as other sects, charged us incessantly with attaching too much importance to baptism. Now, how much importance do they attach to it? Why they catechize out of it a name! Passing by the Lord's supper, and all the good works of the Christian institution, and the name of Peter, and even Christ, they fasten upon the baptismal institution for a name. In this respect they exalt baptism to the superlative degree. What would be said of us, if we, because we believe in partaking of the Lord's supper every Lord's day, should call ourselves Supperists? Would not this be exalting the supper above the whole Christian institution? This is precisely what the Baptists have done in regard to baptism: and then they turn upon us and say, "O, you attach too much importance to baptism!"

Perhaps this is the proper place to mark, that immersion is the chief mark, or way-mark, used by Mr. D. in this sermon, by which to identify the Baptist church, up through past ages to the time of the model church at Jerusalem. He uses it as the dividing line between the true and false church. Is not this attaching great importance to immersion? But here a difficulty presents itself. The Baptists, of all years, tell us frequently, that the v baptize is Greek, and ought to have been translated immerse. The Baptists, then, have got the name in Greek from old King James : and therefore, should be called immersionists—the immersionist church.

It is worthy of note, that Mr. D. does not undertake to prove the exact identity of the Baptist and apostolic churches. "A most striking resemblance," is all for which he contends. Nor does he contend that the Baptist churches of the nineteenth century are strictly identical with those ancient sects through which he would trace the Baptist pedigree up to the model church. These are his words, "That, in many of their doctrines, and in the observance of the ordinances, these bodies of Christians, and the Baptists of the nineteenth century, are identical with each other, and with the model church at Jerusalem." Thus it will appear that Mr. D. makes out but a partial identity after all ; an identity "in many doctrines," and "in the ordinances." But the same kind of identity in regard to "many doctrines," exists between the Baptists and all the reputed orthodox denominations ; and between us and the Baptists, not excepting "the ordinances." Will this doctrinal identity prove that all our churches are one and the same church ? If not, then Mr. D. has absolutely proved nothing, after all his labour, but "a most striking resemblance." And what is the amount of this resemblance ? A well executed counterfeit very strikingly resembles the genuine coin. But is it therefore the genuine coin ? Try it once ! It is true, you may impose on the superficial with "striking resemblances," but they are not identity.

Suppose that Mr. D. by the aid of his historic lights and "most striking resemblances," had attempted to trace the churches of our reformation up to the model church at Jerusalem, might he not have succeeded better than he has done ? Certainly he might. He would have found between many of our doctrines—to speak in the language of Ashdod—and the doctrines of those sects which he has named, and in the observance of the ordinances, "a most striking resemblance," and on his arrival at the model church at Jerusalem, a perfect identity. He would have found no Baptist name upon that church, nor within it a Baptist human creed or mourner's bench. He would have found the ministers of the word in that church preaching to sinners, "Christ and him crucified ;" and that when any of them was pierced to the heart, by the Word of the Spirit, the Word of God, instead of being asked, "Do you FEEL that you are pardoned," they were commanded to "repent and be baptized in the name of Jesus, for the remission of their sins," to continue afterwards "in the Apostle's doctrine and fellowship, and in the breaking of bread and prayers."

To give the reader additional light on this "most striking resemblance" that exists between the Baptist church and the model church at Jerusalem, and between Professor D. and the Apostle Peter, we shall present him with a precious morsel from the second page of this sermon :—"You may sprinkle, pour, or even immerse unconscious babes to bring them within the 'covenant mercies of God,' or adults 'for the remission of sins,' and we regard it as trifling with an ordinance of Christ, and not baptism."

Hark ! "baptism for the remission of sins," says Mr. D. "is not baptism !" What concord of sweet sounds would the voice of Peter and that of Mr. D. have made on the day of Pentecost, had they preached in concert ? Peter would have said, "be baptized FOR remission." Mr. D. would have said, had he dared, "be baptized NOT for remission—Peter, you are trifling with an ordinance !" Reader, had you been there, which would you have obeyed ? Had you have obeyed Peter, you would have become a Christian—had you obeyed Mr. D. you would have become a Baptist ! How striking the resemblance ! How obvious the identity !

I am not to be charged with uncharitableness, for setting aside all the churches of the sects as human organizations, and not the churches of Christ. It is but what they have done for us—even worse—not only repudiated us, but assailed us with ten thousand vile misrepresentations ! It is but what they have done, and are doing for one another. I have in my possession a first-rate Baptist book, entitled, "Ten days travel in search of the church ;" which holds all Pædobaptist sects as belonging to the apostacy. And the Westminster confession virtually teaches the same in regard to all the Baptist sects. The following is its language :—"The visible church, which is also Catholic or universal under the gospel, (not confined to one nation as before under the law) consists of all those throughout the world, that profess the true religion, together with their children ; and is the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, the house and family of God, out of which there is no ordinary possibility of salvation" (Con. p. 111.)

Now note : "The visible church consists of all those who profess the true religion, together with their children."

1, The Baptist church, then, cannot be the true church, nor any part of it : for in the Baptist church there are no infants. 2, The Baptists, according to this article, do not profess the true religion, because those who profess the true religion, do, in virtue of their faith, introduce their children into the visible church. All churches, therefore, not having infants in them, and consequently, the Baptist churches, are, according to Presbyterianism, untrue, anti-christian, apostate ! I am, then, as charitable towards the sects as they are towards one another ; and if I have truth on my side, a little more so. For would it not be sadly uncharitable, having the truth fitted to heal all the partizan and shameful discords of the bickering discordant sects of Christendom, and not to tell it ?

I will conclude this number by a few extracts from authors of celebrity. These will corroborate the views that I have given ; and to many, it may be, their sayings will be more acceptable than mine.

The great Cumming, the head of the Scotch church in London, uses the following language : "All churches are about to be equally dissolved. Methodism is fast breaking up—Independency is to be shattered ; and the Baptists will not be spared. This great organization of existing institutions is the disintegration of the component elements, in order to form a new and glorious combination—a church where there shall be no more division, where there shall be neither churchmen nor dissenters, but Christ and Christians shall be all in all."

Dr. Adam Clarke, as follows : "The religion of Christ stands in no need either of human cunning or power—is the religion of God, and it is propagated by his power—this the Acts fully shows—and in it we find the true model after which the church should be built. As far as the church can show that it has followed after this model, so far it is holy and apostolic. And when all churches and congregations of people profess Christianity, shall be founded and regulated according to the doctrine and discipline laid down in the Book of Acts of the Apostles, then the church body may be justly called, the Apostolic and Catholic church."

A word from Wesley, the father and founder of Methodism. "We glorify in God that all the party names, and scriptural phrases and forms which divided the Christian world, were forgotten ; and that we all might agree and sit down together, as humble loving disciples, at the feet of our common Master, to hear his word, to imbibe his spirit, and to transcribe his life in our conduct."

We shall next hear Barnes, a Presbyterian. The existence of sects, denominations, and contentions, is traced to the following causes : 1st, The love of power : and they who seek the control of the consciences of men, of their religious feelings and opinions, can control them altogether. 2nd, The neglect of more respect to religious tenets than to Christ. 3rd, The multiplication of tests, and the enlargement of creeds and confessions of faith. The consequence is, that every new doctrine that is incorporated into a creed, is a cause for those to separate who do not accord with it. 4th, The passions of men—the pride, and ambition, and bigotry, and unenlightened zeal. It is evidently meant that this church should be one—and that all who were his followers, should be admitted to communion, and acknowledged as his true friends. Another time may yet come when the church shall be restored to his long distance, and that while there may be an honest difference of opinion manifested, and allowed, still the bonds of Christian love will secure union of heart. All that love the Lord Jesus, and make an effort in the grand enterprise which ALL can unite—that of making war upon sin, and securing the conversion of the whole world to God."

Our Saviour prayed that all who should believe through the teaching of the Apostles, might be one. And all good men pray for the union of Christians, for the present and ultimate triumphs of Christianity; and many of them seem to possess joyous premonitions of this good time to come—the golden age of Christianity, when there shall be but one fold and one shepherd. Let us not only pray, but work manfully for it. Our Divine Master has given us a perfect model; are we tasking all our powers to imitate it, or are we idolizing the workmanship of our own hands—glorying in mere voluntary associations, called churches? In building a literal house, if any part of the work is not according to the contract, we require that it shall be taken down, and rebuilt according to the design or model. And the lady rips the garment, or ravel the stocking, in order that she may remake, or reknit it, in an approved style of workmanship. So must the church builder do, wherein he has built contrary to the model church at Jerusalem. Pride, bigotry, and denominational selfishness are crying sins against heaven—are peopling hell daily with hundreds for whom Christ died! Beware! O, beware! A. RAINES.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

ONE hundred years ago there was not a single white man in Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois territories. Then, what is now the most flourishing part of America, was as little known as the mountains of the Moon. It was not till 1760 that the "hunter of Kentucky," the gallant Boone, left his home in North Carolina, to become the first settler of Kentucky. The first settlement of Ohio did not take place until twenty years after this time. A hundred years ago, Canada belonged to France, and the whole population of the United States did not exceed a million and a half of people. A hundred years ago, the great Frederick of Prussia was performing those exploits which have made him immortal in military annals, and with his little monarchy was sustaining a single-handed contest with Russia, Austria, and France—the three greatest powers of the European Continent combined. A hundred years ago Napoleon was not born, and Washington was a young and modest Virginia Colonel; and the great events in the history of two worlds, in which these great but dissimilar men took leading parts, were then scarcely foreshadowed. A hundred years ago the United States were the most loyal part of the British empire, and on the political horizon no speck indicated the struggle which, within a score of years thereafter, established the greatest republic of the world. A hundred years ago there were but four newspapers in America; steam engines had not been imagined, and railroads and telegraphs had not entered into the remotest conceptions of man. When we come to look back at it through the vista of history, we find that to the century which has passed was allotted more important events in their bearing upon the happiness of the world, than almost any other which has elapsed since the creation.

TO YOUNG PREACHERS.

SELECTED FROM THE WRITINGS OF ELDER B. W. STONE.

MY SONS, — Hear the advice of an old father, just about to leave you—just about to be discharged from his services in the ministry for nearly half a century. I have been among the early pioneers of the West, in laboring through difficulties unknown to you, to preach the Gospel.

I.—It is a common saying among the preachers of this day, "Old men for counsel, young men for war." This is often advanced in justification of public debates with opposers, or the clashing doctrines and opinions which now distract and divide the world. "Old men for counsel." Do they counsel you to engage in such debates? Do they laud you for victories won? I will fearlessly answer that no old man of piety and intelligence will give such advice, unless in an extraordinary case; for they know from long experience that such debates tend to strife, deaden piety, destroy the spirit of prayer, puff up the vain mind, annihilate the taste for the fatness and marrow of the Living Word, and destroy the comforts of true, heavenly religion. Seldom do we see in the same person a warrior and an humble devoted Christian. Rara avis in terra. Such acquire a controversial habit and temper. They may proselyte many to their opinions, and greatly increase their numbers; but the children are like the parents, lean and pigmy things. I have known, in the course of my days, great and good religious excitements in certain places, quashed by such debates from the pulpit. I have really thought that the most effectual and shortest way to put a stop to such excitements, is for two debaters to propose a public debating match, or an ecclesiastical duel, on a certain day, and at a certain place. Generally at the close of the debate ends the good excitement. I know it is said in justification of such debates, that Paul disputed in the synagogue at Athens, and in the school of Tyrannus, with the Jews and others. Read the verse correctly, and the force of the objection is removed. He reasoned, or dialogued with them. This should be the constant practice of every faithful minister of Christ. Would to God it were the practice of all our young preachers to reason out of the Scriptures on the important things of the Gospel. But "young men, for war." What war? Not against flesh and blood, for nothing but carnal weapons can affect them; but against the powers of sin and hell, with spiritual weapons afforded us from above — not against men, but against their sins, as did our Lord and his holy apostles, in order to save them from ruin. But are we not to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints? Certainly. But cannot this be done without set debates, challenges, judges, rules, &c.? Did our great head — did his apostles ever act thus? And who will say they did not earnestly contend for the faith? There must be something wrong in this matter, because these zealous duelists do not like to be called the challengers. Now if this be the proper way to contend for the faith, why not fearlessly challenge every opposer, and thus show your holy zeal? In these public debates, but few persons attend there have not their minds prepossessed in favor of one side or the other. Unsophisticated persons may be misled to your opinions, but one real soul is of more value than a score of such proselytes; and such real souls are made by the truth uttered in the spirit, and heartily received and obeyed.

II.—I advise you, my sons, to the Word, the Gospel of the Lord, with all boldness and honesty. If any error or stumbling-block be across the path of truth, which will neutralise its effect on your audience, labor with cogent arguments to get it out of the way, without pity for the error, though sanctified by many centuries and supported by the great and good for many ages. But be careful, ascertain that it is an error, before you point it with your little finger. Truth, like a ploughshare, will tear up the roots of weeds and plants sown and planted by an erring man. Be careful not to condemn any person or people by whom noxious weeds were sown. Tell them you name a Presbyterian, a Methodist, a Baptist, or a Baptist, a Unitarian, or a Baptist as having done that moment he buckles on the armor of mail, and shields himself against your arguments, however powerful. He cannot profit him by all you say. Be wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

III.—I not only advise you to the word, but also to preach it in the spirit. In vain we attempt to deliver to others. A man may deliver the truth in the letter without the power in the spirit, unless we have the experience the force of that truth in our own hearts. Such preaching is vain—useless to the hearer and sinner. Apathetic and morose lectures on religion have almost everywhere the world, and swelled the number of sceptics. For they thus argue: these people believe what they say, or read, would they be so cold and feeling in their addresses? Would they not cry aloud and spare not? Do we ever know one such preacher convert a sinner from the error of his ways? A person may also preach with a vociferous zeal and manner. The more he is, and often is, nothing more than mere animal nature, without the power of the Holy Spirit. Live and walk in the spirit, and and preach in the spirit ; then will the attention of your hearers be arrested, and good effects will follow. When we see our neighbour's house in flames, and the unconscious family within exposed to instant death, we do not take time to study and write an elegant speech in order to read it to them, that they may fly from impending ruin — nor do we write a speech to read to persons whom we see ready to rush down a deathly precipice, unconscious of their danger. No ! were we to do so, those people would be apt to disregard our admonitions and perish.

IV.—Be as holy out of the pulpit as in it. Be always sober (not morose) ; indulge at no time in jesting, mirth, nor light conversation ; these grow by indulgence. I advise you to beware of what is termed gallantry. It will ultimately sink your influence in the public mind. Be plain, but neat in your dress. Wear not costly apparel, nor tinselled ornaments of any kind. It savours of vanity, and will detract from your usefulness. Be often on your knees, always endeavour to keep God before your mind, and labour to please him rather than man ; for if you seek to please men, you will certainly displease God. The friendship of the world is enmity to God. Some are tempted to please man by ostentatious show of learning and talents. This is to preach self, not the Lord Jesus—it is to advance self, and not the cause of Christ—it is to gain the applause of the world, not to save souls from ruin—it is to be popular, not useful. Vain, presumptuous mortal ! How despicable in the view of heaven !

V.—In your public addresses, like the householder, bring forth out of your treasure things new and old. The Word of God is your treasure, not the wisdom of men. With this you must store your mind so as to be able to exhibit to your audience, things new as well as old. Do not for ever harp on one string—on one doctrine, however true. The mind needs variety, and that variety is afforded to the Bible student in the Scriptures. “Warn the unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak.” You should not preach that to another, of which you do not experience the truth yourself. It will be a dry morsel, unseasoned with grace, both to yourself and those that hear. Avoid everything, every expression, every smart word that may excite levity or laughter in your hearers. Your object is to save souls ; an object truly serious and important, and should be managed always in the spirit of seriousness and solemnity. What ! to excite levity in those on the brink of everlasting woe ! God forbid !

VI.—Beware of an avaricious or covetous spirit. Read Paul to Timothy, 1 Epistle, vi. 6-11. Having food and raiment, let us therewith be content. “But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil ; which, while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God ! flee these things, and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness. Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life.” Avoid everything like boasting of yourself, or of your success in the Gospel.

VII.—My dear sons, if this advice be good, receive it, and conform to it. I have known it to be good for half a century. Be diligent and faithful, and soon you shall receive your reward. Oh, that we may hear the plaudit of our Lord—Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of your Lord !

THE MANIFESTATIONS OF GOD.—No. I.

God was manifest in flesh. This all-embracing fact of the Glad-tidings, may correctly be regarded as the climax to all preceding manifestations of God to this world. All previous manifestations, on comparison, fall into the shade as merely anticipative and preparative to this. Yet the question may wisely be entertained, whether the Incarnation itself does not stand forth, radiant with a more striking and finished lustre, when viewed in immediate connection with those Divine appearances with which the world had been previously favored. Satisfied that this question must be responded to in the affirmative, we propose an investigation into the leading Divine manifestations recorded in the Scriptures of the Old Covenant.

1.—The first instance of divine manifestation to man, of which we have anything like direct intimation, is, singularly enough, that mentioned (Gen. iii.) in the account of man's primal sin. The serpent had tempted, Eve had yielded, Adam had been ensnared. Guilt perturbed the minds, and shame mantled the persons of the fallen pair. Thence proceeds the sacred narrative, "And they heard the voice of Yahveh Elohim walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence (face) of Yahveh Elohim, amongst the trees of the garden." That this was the first manifestation of the Creator to his creature, is, of course, not to be supposed. Still, it is the first time in human history that such manifestation is recorded. Not, indeed, that even here divine appearing is formally asserted; yet it seems obvious on the face of the account. First, Yahveh's voice is heard. Next, walking is ascribed to the Divine Investigator. Indeed, the reflective conjugation employed by the historian, would seem to indicate something peculiar and express in the act described as "walking." Gesenius attributes to it the force of going up and down. Stately procession is perhaps the most comely and expressive phrase to represent it. This, surely, implies visible manifestation. Finally, Adam and his wife hid themselves from the face of Yahveh amongst the trees of the garden. Assuming that they had not as yet, since their trespass, confronted the face of their wronged Creator, does not their hiding themselves from his face indicate previous familiarity with the face of their gracious Benefactor? In innocence, they had gazed on Yahveh's face in reverential, confiding love: in transgression, they avoid with dismay its reproaching glances! All this assures us of visible appearing at the time in question, and probably points to the condescending habitude of Yahveh Elohim.

What was the precise external form of this manifestation is not stated—whether human, angelic, or something quite unique. Yahveh's voice and language were certainly adapted to the human ear—his form also might man; it was so on many subsequent occasions. But we shall act most wisely to advance no opinion, lest we should incur singleness of aim, which is to accurately what is the precise and unambiguous information conveyed in these singularly brief narratives.

2.—The next intimation respecting the divine appearances, though exceedingly brief and quite indirect, is well worthy passing notice. It is in the account of Cain's punishment (Gen. iv.) Cain has wickedly slain his younger and more righteous brother, Abel. Yahveh at once makes intimation for blood, saying to the murderer, "What hast thou done? The voice of thy brother's blood crieth to me from the ground (adhamah.) And thou art cursed from the ground (adhamah) which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand. When thou tillest the ground (adhamah) it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be upon the earth (erets.)" Let Cain's reprobation be well considered, "And Cain said unto Yahveh, My punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the ground (adhamah) AND FROM THE FACE SHALL I BE HID; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth (erets); and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me." Here it is noticeable that Yahveh connected the presence of Yahveh with the cultivated soil. In being banished from the home of the infant farmer, he recognized that he should be hid from the divine face. This intimates that God had condescended to manifest himself in a local manner. Whether in the form of a luminous cloud, hovering over, and guarding around the Adamic encampment, or whether in the form of fire, regularizing upon the altar in token of acceptance of the worship offered there, whether in the form of man or of some less frequency and regularity—these things are unable to decide. Some of the divine appearing there must have been the cause of Cain's banishment from the home of his youth would not have comforted himself, in his deprecations, with a mere hiding from the presence of Yahveh.

Moreover, does not the plaintiveness of Cain's lamentation suggest that Yahveh's appearances to the human family had been characteristically merciful, consoling, assuring? We might have anticipated that the murderous son would have been glad to escape the presence of his father's God, and possibly such a feeling did alternate in his bosom with the opposite sentiment. But even guilty aversion and dread, it would seem, could not stifle in a moment, the holier reminiscences of his soul. The fields his hands have tilled, the home with which his youth has been entwined, the parents who have nursed him up to man, possess an attraction which even the murderer's soul is not too utterly seared to feel. And with these associations he instinctively blends the merciful regard or beaming pity of YAHVEH'S FACE! The fear of Cain was well-grounded. His exile removed him from the manifestation of Yahveh's presence: "And Cain went out from the presence of Yahveh, and dwelt in the land of Nod (exile), on the East of Eden."

In pausing for the present, we remark, How paternal the regard displayed by God to his creature man! Adam and Eve are, humanly speaking, placed on the earth in a fatherless and motherless condition. The benign Creator cares for them with a truly tender, parental solicitude (compare Luke iii.

38.) He visits them, converses with them, directs them. Till sin interposed, no slavish fear of his presence ever sprang up in their breasts. How deformed sin appears in crushing this filial joy!

Again: Can we err in concluding, that, notwithstanding the transgression of our first parents, most expressive tokens of merciful love were granted them? A solemn silence does, indeed, rest on the history of Adam and Eve, respecting their immediate relationship to God posterior to their fall. We crave information about them. They are our parents. Their blood circulates in our veins. Were they ever happy again?—What amount of displeasure did the holy Yahveh Elohim manifest?—Did he ever proffer pardon to the fallen?—With a soft, touching eloquence, that causes the bosom to expand and the grateful tear of sympathy to start to the eye, we learn, at least, the one fact, speaking a volume, that such were the forthbeamings of Yahveh's merciful countenance on the Adam family, that even the jealous, cruel Cain, when he had fallen to the debased position of a murderer—even he felt it to be a bitter ingredient in his penal cup to have reason to exclaim—"Leaving the parental home—O! Yahveh, from thy face shall I be hid!" J. B. R.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, OR CAMPBELLITES.*

SEVERAL important movements of a reformatory nature have occurred in the American church during its past history; one of the most influential and extensive of which was that effected by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, and which is now embodied in the denomination known by the title of "Disciples of Christ," or by the more popular epithet of "Campbellites." Shortly after the commencement of the present century, the Rev. Thomas Campbell, a prominent clergyman of the Seceder Church, emigrated from the North of Ireland to the United States, and located in Washington county, Pennsylvania. He was accompanied by his son Alexander, at that time a young man, and possessing superior talents, who had just completed his studies for the ministry. Both of these laboured at first among the destitute Seceder Churches in the Western part of Pennsylvania, and as they became more thoroughly acquainted with the state of sects and denominations in this country, and observed the vast variety and number of religious organizations which here existed, they conceived the idea of accomplishing an union between them. The restoration of the primitive unity of the Christian church was the prominent purpose for which they determined to labour.

* We extract the above article from the London Despatch, in which paper it appears as No. 22 of "Sketches of Religious Sects." The Disciples of Christ, whose views it lays down, are happy to know, that in whatever part of the world their lot may be cast, they are not "Campbellites," nor can any such name be justly employed to designate them. Neither is it correct that they sanction open communion, as practiced by some Baptist churches in this country.—Ed.

The Campbells began to preach among the Seceders with reference to this object, and to aid in the accomplishment of it, they resolved to discard all human creeds and confessions, and receive the Scriptures as the only course of instruction and authority in the development and determination of religious truth. They denied that confessions of faith were necessary, or even useful, to the success or purity of the Christian church; and they contended that the impartial and enlightened interpretation of the Bible would infallibly lead mankind to a knowledge of the truth.

These views were, of course, very obnoxious to the rigorous sect of Seceders to which the Campbells belonged—a sect who had experienced innumerable splits and subplits, divisions and subdivisions, in reference to the most minute and insignificant points of Christian doctrine and practice. The Campbells accordingly withdrew from them and established a congregation on Brush Run, in Washington county, in this State, in 1810, which thus became the foundation of their future organization—the birth-place of one of the most numerous and influential denominations now existing in the Southern and Western States. The principle on which the new church was founded was simply this: That nothing should be received as a doctrine of belief, or as a maxim of duty, for which there could not be produced the authority of Scripture, either directly expressed or indirectly implied by inference or by example.

Guided by this principle the Campbells proceeded in the free examination of the Bible, and arrived at the conclusion, as among the first fruits of their inquiries, that infant baptism was a usage not enjoined or approved by Scripture, and consequently improper. They also objected to sprinkling, and contended that immersion was the only legitimate and valid method of administering the ordinance of baptism. In consequence of this expression of views, the Campbells and their adherents were invited to become members of the Redstone Baptist Association. He did so in 1813, and Alexander Campbell was appointed the "Messenger" of the Brush Run Church to that association. Even among these people, however, Mr. Campbell's views were singular and extreme in consequence of their liberality; his talents were commanding, and his influence became so great, that the utmost enthusiasm was excited. About this time he engaged in several public discussions on theological topics, which greatly extended his fame. One of these was with Rev. J. Walker, a Seceder minister; the other was with Mr. McCall, of the Presbyterian Church. Both debates discussed the subject of Baptism, and the result in both instances was to create many converts to Mr. Campbell's doctrines.

His adherents had become so numerous in 1828, that in that year a convention of preachers took place composed chiefly of members of the Redstone Association, whose object was to consider the ancient and apostolic constitution of the church, and see what could be done to restore it. After proper consideration they determined to reject all human creeds, all ecclesiastical ceremonies, in the shape of confessions and formulas, and receiving the Bible as the sole source of authority, live and preach accordingly. This principle led to the rejection of many usages which had been observed by the Baptists with whom they had formerly been associated. Thus a new sect was organized, based on different principles, and characterised by different practices from surrounding sects; but the purpose of the new society was to promote unity, by the adoption of a free catholic principle, which could attract and ultimately embrace, members of the various sects, and thus incorporate them into one. From this period "Disciples" formed a separate organization, the professed object of which was to restore pure and primitive Christianity both in letter and spirit, in doctrine and in practice.

In accordance with this principle the establishment of the doctrinal basis of this denomination has been progressing in its nature, and the different heresies which they entertain have been developed successively. The starting point was the essential nature and importance of Christian unity in the Christian church. Ten years afterward the doctrine of the immersion of adults was accepted as the only proper mode of baptism, and as the only means by which men could obtain remission of sins, and could appropriate to themselves the blessings of the Gospel. And thus all the other leading doctrines which they now entertain were successively approved and adopted.

Alexander Campbell, the chief founder of this denomination, is without question, one of the ablest polemics and theologians in this country. He has conducted many public debates, some of which have been with the most eminent men of the day — such as Bishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, on the subject of Romanism and Protestantism, and Robert Dale Owen, on Infidelity and Socialism. In both of these great logical tournaments Mr. Campbell was confessedly the victor. He has spent a long and active life in preaching the doctrines which he believes, and in establishing churches and institutions which are intended to diffuse education and theological knowledge among the community. His efforts have been highly successful. His followers at this time are very numerous in Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri; and the whole number of communicants belonging to the Disciples' churches is about two hundred and fifty thousand, while their ministers number between two and three thousand.

Among the leading peculiarities of this denomination are the following: they practice weekly communion, the Lord's supper being administered in a simple manner on every Sunday. They are not in favour of close communion, but are very liberal and charitable in this respect, permitting persons of piety, belonging to other sects, to commune with them. They observe the first day of the week, not as a Jewish or Christian Sabbath, but as a day commemorative simply of Christ's resurrection, and useful as a season of religious worship. They condemn all written creeds and formulas of faith. Their church government is congregational, each society having exclusive control of its own affairs. They believe that the Scriptures are the means employed by the Spirit to lead men to repentance, and that the contents of the Scriptures are the direct source of that faith by which the Gospel is received savingly and effectually. They discard the use of all human terms and phraseology in speaking of religious truth, such as the "trinity," "triune," &c.; confining themselves to the very words employed in Scripture. In consequence of this peculiarity, they have been charged with denying the doctrine of the Trinity; but the truth is, that they believe and receive everything which the Scriptures affirm and teach in reference to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

This denomination, though little known in the Northern and Eastern States, is very numerous and influential in those States which we have already mentioned. They have established and now conduct two colleges, one of which is located at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky; the other at Bethany, Virginia; besides many minor institutions. They have religious newspapers and theological journals, prominent among which is the Millennial Harbinger, published at Bethany. They number among their ministers many men of superior learning and ability, such as Alexander Campbell, Rev. Robert Milligan, Professor in Bethany College, a man of great logical acuteness and power, and Professor R. Richardson, of Virginia.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

"And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate, and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. For God hath put in their hearts to fulfil His will, and to agree, and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled" (Revelation.)

HAD I lived in the days of miracles, I should surely have been a believer, exclaims the sceptic. Had I seen Christ or the Apostles, I should have undoubtedly had my scepticism removed. But Sir, you do live in a day of miracles! How so? You are yourself a miracle. The whole universe around you is one grand miracle, which your finite understanding is incompetent to solve. Besides, the prophecies recorded in the Holy Scriptures are being fulfilled every day and hour; and yet you clamour for miracles! I tell you, honest friend, you would not believe though one rose from the dead. You are blind. You are deaf. Your heart is callous and your conscience is seared. Now, the blind man sees not the signs in the heavens, or the beauties of the natural world; so neither does the deaf man thrill with joy at the sound of glorious music, and heeds not the voice that warns him of the concealed pit.

Shake off your stupor, O spiritually blind and deaf reader! and open your heart to see the wonders that God is doing and is hastening to do! The world moves—and the time has come when God will speedily judge those who, in olden times, were drunken with the blood of Saints and Martyrs. Eighteen hundred years ago He lifted the veil of the future, and pointed out to St. John, in the Isle of Patmos, what is transpiring in Europe at this very hour. Eighteen hundred years ago He declared that the nations should agree to give their help and allegiance to the Great City until the time of the end, when they should turn upon her in wrath; and then great Babylon should be cast down, even as a millstone is cast into the sea, and her place in the land should no more be found. The vengeance of the Almighty has tarried long: but, judging from present appearances, it will be both terrible and lasting. Italy—poor, priest-ridden Italy—is one seething caldron of passion, and fury, and hardly suppressed riot and bloodshed! Menace! by the cohorts of Austria on the one hand, and the legions of France on the other, she has yet much greater cause to fear her own citizens, ripe as these are for rebellion, and anarchy, and atheism! With an imbecile old man in the chair of St. Peter—with a despot on the throne of Charlemagne, who scruples at neither perjury nor assassination—with a foolish young scion of the House of Hapsburg at the head of affairs in Austria, and an ambitious and unscrupulous King on the throne of Sardinia—the times are surely near at hand, when the curtains will rise on the first scene in the last act of the great drama of time.

Already the stage-manager's bell is sounded, and I doubt not but the will soon begin. It would be preposterous in any person uninspired to attempt to predict how the great consummation is to be achieved. It may be that France will take possession of Italy; the Prince Napoleon and the King of Sardinia; it may be, that Austria will take possession of the Pope's dominions for herself; or it may be, that the Republic of Italy will overturn the chair of Peter, and inaugurate a Red Republic. But, let the event be what it may, for Italy! alas for the Great City! days are numbered, her winding sheet is already woven, her pall-bearers are at her grave dug!

"And I heard another voice from heaven saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues: For her plagues have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities. Reward her even as she rewarded you, and double unto her double according to her works: To her cup which she hath filled, fill to her also. How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her: for she saith in her heart, I sit a queen and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine, and she shall be utterly burned with fire, for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her. And the kings of the earth, who have committed fornication with her, and have lived deliciously with her, shall bewail her, and lament for her, when they shall see the smoke of her burning: standing afar off, for the fear of her torment, saying, Alas, that great city Babylon, that mighty city: for in one hour is thy judgment come."

Blessed, indeed, are the men to whom it is permitted to live in this, our succeeding generation. Blessed are the wise, who having eyes see, and have ears hear, and having tongues confess that God is Almighty, and Jesus is the Messiah, the righteous Lord of all earth! O man, whose heart is unregenerate, whose thoughts are vain, whose life is devoted to sense and pleasures of sense, what confusion and tens you—what dismay—what utter dishonour! O man, humble and lowly, loving your Maker and doing to your fellow-men, rejoice! for the day of your triumph is at hand—even at the door. Verily, the fig-tree begins un-ly to cast its leaves! D. R.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM AMERICA. — No. I.

NEW YORK, East 14th Street,
May 6, 1859.

Beloved Brother,—I have for a long time considered it as a matter of importance, that the brethren in England and America should mutually communicate through their respective periodicals the condition of our common cause, for the information and advantage of all; and it is to be regretted that the numerous brethren who have visited the churches in the United States, have hitherto neglected to acquaint the British churches with the character of our cause in the West, which, I am satisfied, would be gratifying and acceptable to them generally. I feel that it is essential to form a more intimate acquaintance and intercommunication, for various reasons, which are too obvious to require enumeration. It certainly would inspire the churches in each country to emulate whatever good quality peculiarly characterises the one, and to eschew whatever is derogatory and reprehensible in the other. These two vineyards of our work are at present too much isolated in action. The true aphorism, "Union is strength," or cooperation is life-imparting, speaks very significantly to our brethren on both sides of the Atlantic, and thus I especially urge the advisability of adopting the course which is now presented for the consideration of the churches, however small and dispersed,—however contracted their spheres and contumeliously regarded. The work of our Master, in whatever country or locality it might be situated, requires to be prosecuted by every means susceptible of propriety, and inviolable to calumny and unholy impeachments. He demands that we should exert every possible influence in our power to effect its advancement, and I conceive we omit one means within our reach for that purpose, by not cultivating a more definite intimacy with the progress of the truth in the several fields of its operations. It is true that some items of intelligence are occasionally culled from the American works relative to its advances there, and these appear in the pages of the British Millennial Harbinger, but then they do not convey to the British brethren any distinguishing idea of its quality and its extent. The good news which we received in Britain of large numbers being added to the saved through the instrumentality of our American brethren, has from time to time given an impetus to our zeal for, and our interest in, the truth. We felt encouraged, that though its course was retarded by the barriers of a politically supported religion, and a cloud of dense sectarian error and bigotry in England, yet in America it flourished in the health of its own undying nature. We know not to what measure of improvement it will attain by its advocates and professors becoming united in the work as far as practicable, and blending more freely their common interests in the common cause.

In West 17th Street, between the 6th and 8th avenues, a building for Christian worship is very conspicuously situated. No massive marble columns of the Corinthian order, decorated with mythical hieroglyphs or enigmatical designs of classic art, surround the humble worshipper who enters its sacred precincts. No gilded casements enclose windows of fantastically ornamented glass, which please the eye and impede the admission of light—no towers and turrets mark the vanity and pride of the people who assemble there; neither does a steeple hold its head of worldly ambition high in the clouds, and look with carnal assumption into the face of the God whom it dares to mock. But plain brickwork is the character of that edifice of Christian worship. Its importance does not consist in its exterior aspect, but in the divine solemnity of spiritual experience which exists within its walls. Our brethren have erected a meeting-house in every point consistent with their principles. It is spacious, very neatly furnished, and is convenient for their services; and it also has a highly-suitable room beneath for Lord's day school purposes. The brethren and sisters composing the church are about 250 in number, and are chiefly from the most intelligent of its people; one of its greatest blessings being, what our British churches lament as a general deficiency, a number of young speakers. There are grave experienced brethren who share the duties of the eldership, and manifest much anxiety for the care and general weal of the flock. About eight years ago they paid 11,000 dollars for the building which they now occupy, and have expended nearly another 1000 in providing a suitable place for the immersion of candidates and other necessary improvements. As evidences of their liberality, to which good characteristic they are ceaselessly inciting each other, they pay our Bro. Stark, as their pastor, 1200 dollars per year, and have given to previous pastors from 1000 to 2000 dollars. For the benefit of our English brotherhood I will add, that several of the brethren here subscribe from 100 to 500 dollars annually for the support of the cause exclusively in New York, besides assisting its progress in other places. Their services are held on Lord's days at 10-30 a.m. and 7-30 p.m. On Tuesday evenings a lecture is delivered to the members, and on Thursday evenings a public meeting is held, when the Scriptures are read by the pastor, and brethren deliver brief addresses. On the whole the brotherhood are very energetic, having zeal according to knowledge, and appear resolved to illuminate their sphere with the light of the Gospel, and are encouraged thereto by prospects of increasing popularity and reliable probability of securing advantageous additions. We rejoice at their success. Your's in the truth,

THOS. BUTLER, JUN.

LETTER FROM VICTORIA.

Erin Cottage, St. Kilda, near Melbourne,
Victoria, March 12, 1859.

Dear Brother, — Your note appended to my letter published in the Harbinger of December last, prompts me to address you again. You will be rejoiced to hear, that progress is the order of the day among the disciples of Christ in this colony generally. Talk with whoever one may, whether to worldliners or to professors, all seem to recognise the fact, that Christianity, in its practical exhibition, is grounded on any thing but a scriptural basis. New Testament principles are becoming more generally understood and appreciated by the public. Prejudice is giving way, and the truth as it is in Jesus is exhibiting its power in arresting the attention, and taking hold on the minds of its hearers.

The church at Prahran now numbers 36 members. Two females were immersed into the name of Jesus last Wednesday evening, and two pastors have recently been chosen. On Lord's day evenings we have a goodly number to hear the glad-tidings: indeed, so well are they attended, that we now propose to apply for the large lecture-room of the Mechanics' Institution, in order to accommodate our increasing numbers.

Our brethren at Moorabbin and East Brighton are also progressing in the same ratio. Bro. Walker has been chosen pastor. Of Melbourne I cannot give you any positive information; but, as in England, so it is here, viz. that the metropolis has its peculiar difficulties, which makes it hard work to impress the truth on the concentrated mass of evil, self-interest, and gross crime that exist therein, to so much larger extent than in the provinces.

We have five brethren at the Dandenong diggings, and on Monday, the last day of February, Bros. Potts, Wilder, and I went there to see them. It was a delightful excursion. We left Bro. Potts' at Moorabbin at half-past four a.m. (having there the previous night): it was a bracing morning, and quite dark when we mounted our steeds. Our road lay through the bush for some 8 or 10 miles, a country, with occasional rising spots, which we now and then obtained a view of our splendid bay; and before we were at the Dandenong mountains, rising one the other in sombre grandeur. I know how to describe the imposing scenery: the pleasurable feelings we experienced at the sight. The nearest approach I witnessed to it in Old England, was the country from Wrexham to Ludlow, through the vale of Langollen; or, the Cumbrian hills viewed from the deck of a steamer. Nearly the whole distance we had to travel through a densely-timbered forest, the road being formed by the bullock-traversing the district with provisions, labor must indeed have been great, for the scrub is from 3 to 8 feet high, and it has been trodden down by the teams, as well as the trees felled along the circuitous route. To a cockney, the scene was certainly altogether novel and exciting. "Over the hills and far away" mountain some of them 4000 feet above the level of the sea, surrounded us, with trees from 100 to 200 feet in height. Some parts appeared like a forest of charcoal, all vegetation having been blackened by a bush fire; some of the tall charred trees looked as if they would fall on us. The trees here were never bare of foliage, but while they presented a pleasing and noble appearance, they were hollow and rotten within. We arrived at our journey's end soon after 10 a.m. having ridden 38 miles in about six hours. Our brethren were not a little pleased at our unexpected visit. We remained five days, perambulating the diggings, during which time we partook of refreshment in Bro. Procter's tent. On our return we visited the famous fern-tree gully, and a gratifying sight it was — so picturesque that a Raphaelite would have gone into ecstasies at the sight. The tall trees on a grassy sloping hill, the trunks quite bare, smooth and white half way up; the graceful ferns thriving under the shade of the tall companions, the deep green grass surrounding the roots, with delicate small flowers, forget-me-not and convolvulus in abundance, and parrots in the boughs — all so plainly depicted as to delight an artist. The above school. — The journey was great for one day. The visit was intended to arrange for the brethren meeting in tents on the Lord's day, which is now carried out. — Your's in the truth

NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS, CRITICISMS, &amp;c.

THE COMMUNION OF SAINTS.

"We are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit." So commences an inspired scripture of the church of God (Phil. iii. 3.) The Head of that church, in announcing its establishment, declared of its members, thus qualified, "The Father seeketh such to worship him." The church has a mission in the world, but for that mission it must first be prepared by rightly worshipping God in the spirit. The prophet-mediator's forty days of communion with the Highest must fit him to descend to the people with the tables of the covenant in his hand (Ex. xxiv. 16.) No simpler law is found in nature than that which is thus laid on the collective people of God. It is, in substance, the early injunction, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high" (Luke xiv. 49.) "Before entering on a work in which all the resources of moral strength and goodness are required, approach the everlasting fountain of both, till, by drinking into His spirit, you shall have become partakers of the Divine nature."

It is a grievous mistake to expect spiritual revolutions in the world, while overlooking the discipline and edification of the church. If all the work had been delegated to a few, and they of a separated and "sacred order," "the many" might well be careless on the subject. But if the church is to be an army, and every member a soldier—or a furnished house, with every vessel and implement "meet for the Master's use"—then the worship by believers, and their right instruction, should be objects of first solicitude, and the right seeking of these must be the surest way of blessing the surrounding multitudes of "them who are without."

Not only is individual worship the preparation for individual service, but common worship for united usefulness. Hence the exhortation, "Let us consider one another, to provoke unto love and good works; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting (one another), and so much the more as ye see the day approaching" (Heb. x. 24-25.) This passage will at once indicate one point we wish to illustrate, viz. worship must be something done by the worshippers rather than for them. To realize this idea of church-worship, there is required first, the qualification of the worshipper. An assembly for worship must be an assembly of believers. Let us not be misunderstood. The preaching of the Gospel is essential—never to be neglected. This must be done in mixed assemblies. But it seems to us that the modern systems have confounded two things which the primitive church kept distinct—evangelistic work among the unconverted, and the worship and mutual edification of the churches. When we look into the New Testament, and find the disciples coming "together to break bread" (Acts xv. 7)—speaking of that symbol as the "bread which we break" (1 Cor. x. 16)—doing this when the whole church was "come together into one place" (1 Cor. xiv. 23)—regarding it as an incidental circumstance when there came in "one that believed not" (verse 24)—and making it their business to "edify one another" (1 Thes. v. 11)—and set all this beside a scene in a modern place of worship, where a mixed assembly gather to hear one official personage read, pray, and preach—one is conscious of a wide divergence. Especially does this remark apply (strange to say) to Nonconformist churches. Even under the system of which forms of prayer and the more manifest priestly symbols form a part, there is often actually a greater variety in the ministerial arrangements, and a greater personal share in the proceeding by the people, than among many of those who profess to come much nearer to primitive freedom.

But the very presence of the unconverted, the worldling, the formalist, the hypocrite, as a constant and legitimate part of the assembly,* must have a constraining effect on worship. Suppose the members of a family never met but in the society of strangers, how formal a thing would domestic intercourse become! Or, suppose that a teacher, having one class of the totally illiterate, and another of those somewhat advanced, should resolve on teaching them always together, and adapting every lesson as much as possible to all, must he not constantly either retard the one class or bewilder the other? The effect, then, of habitually worshipping in the presence of the unconverted, must in the same way tend to lower the tone of spiritual exercises, and mix up, in mischievous confusion, the preaching of the Gospel and the edification of the church.

But it may be answered, "Our churches do meet as churches to transact business and observe the Lord's Supper." The answer simply is, Neither of these satisfies the scriptural idea of an assembly for Christian worship. As to the assembly for business, (business for the most part really secular) no one will say this can fairly be called an assembly for worship. With regard to the ordinary observance of the Lord's Supper, our complaint is, that that which the early Christians made their principal object in assembling together, (Acts xx. 7, Cor. xi. 20, compared with Acts xi. 42) is, for the most part, merely "appended to another "service," or thrust into an afternoon, that it may not interfere with "the preaching."

To carry out the idea of worship by the people, we add, that worship must be free. One man's trains of thought and modes of expression will not do always and for all! "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." The man to pray, for instance, is he who is in the spirit of prayer, and not merely the man whose office it is to do that work for all. "How is it then, brethren," says Paul, "when ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation?" This is liberty, and the only restraint enforced is in the admonition, "Let all that be done unto edifying" (1 Cor. xiv. 26). "But will not this plan introduce fusion?" This is the fear of those who have never fairly tried it. The possibility of such a consequence is admitted. But it is a possibility that was recognized and provided for even in apostolic days—the days of miraculous power. "If anything be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace. For YE MAY ALL prophesy one by one, that all may learn and all be comforted. And the spirits of prophets are subject to the prophecy of God. For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, AS IN ALL CHURCHES AND ASSEMBLIES OF THE SAINTS" (verses 30-33.)

But will not some be over ready to speak? Possibly they will, and therefore the injunction, "Let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak" (James 1. 19, compare Eccle. v. 1, 2.) The remedy for such evils is found in the enforcement of precepts like these, not in the destruction of "the comfortable liberty" the Scripture gives. The principle of the latter expedient, consistently carried out, would lead us the whole way to Rome.

The very idea of worship suggests another thought. In all arrangements for united worship, simplicity, the handmaid of spirituality, should find a permanent place. To a rightly-disposed mind, love of display is distasteful where, but absolutely distasteful in the church of the living God. But things are often tolerated with a view to conciliate "the world." Is not doing "evil that good may come" And is it the way to lead the world to higher tastes, to begin by flattering lower? Is not the sinner's conscience too, against all such compromise? And, finally, is not the spirit of conformity, entirely opposed to the truth? To our mind, the Church of Rome, by aping the world—the Church of England aping Rome—and Dissent aping the Church, appear illustrations of stages downward—low, lower, lower, towards uttermost contempt!

TAKING DOWN THE SHUTTERS

No. 1 of a short series of tracts by S. J. Chew, of Bond-street chapel, mingham, entitled "Looking for Daylight," is now published. During the last month there have been indications that others also are rubbing their eyes, and entering upon or preparing for the search. "Looking for Daylight!" — When men look for daylight at noon, it may well be asked, Where are they? And the answer would scarcely be, In the open fields, under the clear blue sky. Those who look for daylight when the Sun's rays have started the perspiration from their neighbour's brow, are late in getting up, and must have neglected to take down the shutters. Well, well! We won't quarrel about the past, only throw them open now — the Sun won't blind you, though your eyes may water a little at first. "Looking for Daylight?" We once saw advertised "Concentrated Sea-Air," (much recommended for invalids — whether to be supplied in bags or boxes, we were not informed. Daylight, one would almost imagine, has retreated into a black bottle, or been compressed into or under a bushel, so that we have now to run about with a lantern to look for it. Has not the sunlight of Christianity been shining eighteen hundred years? Certainly it has! Well, then, where are those Christian legislators, Christian pulpit-men, Christian pewholders, who are only "looking for daylight?" Where? Not in the open plain, but in certain closed-up houses with small doorways and heavy-looking window shutters. On the door of each house will be found an inscription, "Baptist," "Presbyterian," "Wesleyan," "Independent," "Establishment," &c. being of the number. The Tabernacle, evidently for the purpose of excluding light, was roofed with badger-skins dyed red, &c. These houses, for the most part, are covered in with old parchments, curious pieces of antiquity, in the shape of trust-deeds, confessions of faith, and the like. Upon close inspection it will be found the window-shutters are not solid, but frames covered with the same material. Here and there the light gets in through slits and holes, and then you have the inmates running about looking for daylight. On one of these houses there has stood for some time a printed notice to the effect that "persons may enter who subscribe the following," and then you have an outline not at all in apostolic terms. "More light" has, however, got into the house, and it has been resolved, "That though the old outline shall remain, with the intimation that those who subscribe may enter, the words, 'and others who do not,' shall be added." The effect of this is, that certain new-comers insist upon opening the shutters, the old house is found an improper abode, and a new one, after the Jerusalem model, will occupy its site. But where are we getting to? It was not our intention to say this much, but to give a few words from Lord John Russell, Mr. Chew, and others. Well, then, "Looking for Daylight," No. 1, is upon "The Pastorate," and shows that the author somehow has got into the light. It contains a preliminary address, and as we intend to give an extract therefrom, our readers who wish to know what S. J. C. says upon the Pastorate, must send for the tract. The following from his introductory pages, we need scarcely say, is to our mind: —

* We see no objection to their presence in any capacity, as such generally are at any observance of the Lord's Supper in Nonconformist churches.

"There is one objection which answereth all arguments—an objection put in these few words: 'Ah, but the times are so different.'

"How very consoling a plea this is for anybody, and everybody, who wants to get away from any part of God's requirements.

"Wherefore putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour? Thus it is written, 'Well, yes, that's very good; but—but—you see—there's now such competition in trade—a man has to be so thoroughly wide awake to get a living at all; and it is to be doubted whether a man of business can afford to be so scrupulous. I should be very glad if things were not so, but we must take them as they are; and it would'n't do for me to be a man worse than an Infidel, by not providing for my own house. You see, my friend, how it is—don't you know?—the times are so different.' 'Yes, I see how it is; you want the best excuse you can get, Mr. Worldly Wiseman, for your saying when you buy, 'tis naught, 'tis naught; and then for your going away and boasting.'

"I charge thee; observe these things without preferring one before another, doing nothing by partiality.' 'Yes,' says the preacher, 'that's very good, very good indeed; but you see, Mr. Conscience, if I were to begin to meddle with that influential member who walks disorderly, what a disturbance there would be in the church: and what would become of the cause, it is impossible to say. It may be that the sin of Susan Norton was not half so bad as his, but I knew that she could be excluded without any rupture, and without any falling off in the funds. But it's altogether different in this case. He has a good many friends in the church who would stick fast to him at all hazards : and for the sake of peace it's better left alone. Nobody wishes more than I do, that we had a better state of things ; but we can't help it : the times are so different now.' And so our time-serving, place-loving preacher gets quieter for his conscience, that for the present answers very well.

"One more preliminary remark. I own not the importance of all the modern talk about essentials and non-essentials. If God plainly tells me to do a certain thing, woe unto me if I do it not : and a presumptuous sin it is to say, 'tis a non-essential, and I can get to heaven without it.' Adam and Eve once thought it not essential to abstain from eating of the fruit of a certain tree : they ate of it ; to their dreadful cost and ours. Uzzah put forth his hand to touch the ark when it seemed in danger : this was a thing forbidden unto him to do ; and for that deed the Lord smote him that he died.

"How God, in the day of judgment, will take exactest measurement of human guilt we cannot explain ; and how he will deal with certain sins of ignorance we cannot tell ; but of this we are quite sure, that to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.' Can any revelation which God has been pleased to make, be so unimportant that I may continue to heed it not ? Can it be looked upon as a trifle, that I declare what may be left undone of all that he has spoken ?

"In what I write, I wish not to offend anyone. 'Measures not men' candidates for a seat in the House of Commons sometimes say. Daylight I want : truth I seek ; and indebted to any one shall I be who will aid me in this search. If I teach error, he will be doing well who will refute it. One thing I know, if I know nothing else—that I am willing to be instructed. Not, however, how to hold my place or my reputation by a compromise with truth and my own convictions ; not how best to say one thing and to mean another : that sort of instruction I hold in thorough downright contempt. 'The Bible, the Bible alone' is my authority, and he who will help me to understand it, is my benefactor and my friend."

A few days back, at the London Tavern, Lord John Russell indicated that a little light had broken in upon him, and found himself longing for the good old paths. He observed—

"I think that all the efforts that are made are most praiseworthy, to churches and places of worship not belonging to the Established Church ; but they would fall short, were there no auxiliary means of this nature by the poor may have the Gospel preached unto them. Because you are all aware of these places of worship, some of the Established Church are of a very stately character ; one recently opened said to have cost £60,000 ; and there is a number of other places of worship longed to the various dissenting churches that are ample and commodious ; but unfortunately, the poor are not found in great numbers in those places of worship, and I have often discussed with ministers of the Established Church and members of dissenting bodies as to the reason why it should be so. It is, I think, unfortunately in many respects it seems a great improvement—that we cannot, in these times of luxury and civilization, resort to the simplicity of the early Christians. (cheers.) We are told by a Roman writer—a Pagan writer—that when Christians were brought up to be examined as to the crime they were supposed to have committed, they answered that they held meetings amongst one another, in which they sang hymns to Christ, and encouraged temperance, inculcated moral virtues, and read their sacred books to one another. Nothing could be more simple than that, nothing more likely to induce one to abstain from the consolations of the flesh. But now-a-days, our places of worship become places where people resort to in the best dress they can afford ; and in measure, they shame those whose religion does not fit them, to mingle with persons sumptuously dressed. A dissenting minister at Brighton told me, that the way he could reach the hearts and souls of the poorer persons living in the streets and lanes at Brighton, was to go in the middle of the streets, and thus the poorer persons, who did not like to appear in a place of worship in their shabby clothes, put their heads out of the window to see to what he had to say. This is one of the illustrations amongst many, that our places of worship do not reach the whole of the community. That the poor have the Gospel preached to them, is one of the first duties of the Christian minister and the Christian society."

Plain admissions, but not much to be done. It is, however, something to see that modern churches do not meet the wants of the people, and that primitive churches did meet their wants.

At the recent meeting of the Congregational Union, the Rev. S. M.

read a paper on "The State of Pastors and Churches," which produced much discussion.

"The Rev A. Reed asked, would they not find in going back to their spheres of labour, that they must almost inevitably fall into a certain routine order of things? They would find great difficulty in getting the requisite liberty to set themselves free from the thoughts, customs, and expectations of men, and just to pour out the soul according to the inward convictions and feelings of the heart. God help them, and give them more of this sacred liberty that springs from a heart released from the fear of men, and sensible chiefly of the presence of the Lord, and the desire in the best way they could to do his work. Then with respect to the liberty of the people to speak in the meetings of the church. No one would doubt that if they could devise methods so as to encourage all those to speak who were properly qualified, edification and profit would result, and keep alive the interest of meetings for worship. The present plan of conducting those services had some disadvantages, but still it would be necessary that the minister should exercise a due control; and instead of making any sudden change, the people would have to be gradually trained for liberty, so that it did not run into license. Might they not, more than they did, invite members to sing out a hymn, read a portion of Scripture, and as it might be found profitable, throw open the meeting more or less? He had found that when this was done, persons used to pray who had never been called upon. The Independent churches, by God's grace, had been the freest of any in Britain, and he hoped they would not stop where they now are."

Mr. Reed no doubt feels that Independent churches cannot "stop where they now are." Progress or death is the order of the day. But the people (members of Independent churches) — poor things! — "must be gradually trained to liberty." It just occurs to us, that if they are not by this time pretty well through with their training, the ministers to whom they have so long been in subjection had better give up, and let the training be carried on by other masters. Mr. Reed appears to think that his class must keep their hands upon the window shutters — too much light would be dangerous. The people — those sad creatures — "would run into license." Well, who are these ministers that take upon themselves to measure out liberty to the church?

Has the Lord given liberty in ministry to his people? To what extent has he given it? Dare any man say they shall have less than He has given? Will any presume to give them more? Who is this presumptuous man that says the pulpit (which means control over the entire edification of the church) is mine? Did Jesus or his Apostles call such an officer into existence? Never! Whence then is he? Of the Apostasy! An eldership in each church, "apt to teach," taking part in and overseeing the teaching of the brotherhood, we can find in the New Testament; but one man over a church, "gradually to train it for liberty," and keep his thumb upon the window-shutter bolt, lest the full light of day should find entrance, we must leave Mr. Reed to defend.

"IS THERE NOT A CAUSE?"

"A LAY-SERMON, preached in the New Temperance Hall, Birmingham, on Sunday, May 8, 1859, by John Brindley, LL.D. a layman of the Church of England," is just published, price 2d.

A cause there must be, for every effect has its cause—a good or justifying cause there may not be. The reader will say, "Cause for what?"—and the answer is, Was it requisite, and is it proper, that within a few yards of three or four churches of the Establishment, a layman should open a meeting-house and minister to members of that church at the very times the worship of the church is conducted in consecrated buildings near at hand—that he should collect and consolidate into a regular congregation, under his own ministrations, members of the Church of England, still claiming for himself membership with that church? Now, notwithstanding the Doctor's effort to establish the contrary, we submit he has "no case"—that he is bound to direct these people to the churches and clergy of the district, or to come out from the Establishment. For his anomalous position there is a cause, but not a justifying cause.

The sermon proposes and answers the question, "What is Dr. Brindley?" and the reader learns that John Brindley is a schoolmaster and LL.D.—that he did good service in assailing the late

Robert Owen and other Socialist leaders—that recently he took foremost position in dispersing the deluded Mormons, who had made Birmingham a strong hold—that subsequently he continued street-preaching, and that on Easter Sunday, the happiest day of his life, forty-nine (of the persons brought in by his preaching) knelt with him at the Lord's table in St. Philip's church, to whom others have been added. After showing that Birmingham is a very ungodly town, the Doctor urges that there was a cause for his preaching. The proper reply we consider to be this—Every believer in Jesus, in whose heart love for God and for sinners is shed abroad, is bound to preach Christ whenever and wherever he can find people to hear, and that to the full extent of his ability. But that one is at liberty to form converts thus made into a church, gathered around himself, to be ministered to by him, while in that neighbourhood there is a church in which he claims membership, and which does not approve that step, is not only not justifiable, but is to constitute himself a schismatic, and to violate alike the laws of the New Testament and the spirit of the Church of England. To defend himself Neighbour Brindley takes to statistics, and shews that Birmingham is in a worse condition as to church and chapel accommodation than several large towns in England—that there are not half the sittings provided which would be wanted, were the adult population to attend only once on the Lord's day. This may be a good reason for out-door preaching by those whom Dr. B. calls laymen, if the laws of the church to which he belongs allow such preaching, and if not for leaving that church; but it can present no reason whatever for forming and ministering to a congregation as Dr. B. is doing. According to his own shewing, there are provided in Birmingham places of worship 66,812 sittings, while the number of persons attending on the census-Sunday was only 43,540. There is, then, cause for preaching to fill these sittings, but none for Dr. Brindley's determination to keep them empty in order to fill others he has provided; and that, too, while he proclaims himself, not a dissenter from the polity or faith of the Established Church, but a member thereof. What, then, has moved the Doctor? The sermon answers the question, though not intended to. John Brindley, LL.D. desired to see the Rev. Dr. Brindley. The Doctor was again and again appealed to for a view to the ordination of a layman, and Dr. Brindley, in answer, offered a stipend of £50 per annum would be accepted, it being understood by the Doctor that the people would add £100 per annum. But the Doctor insists that he has no room for Dr. Brindley, so the layman continues in his clerical work, takes a better place, and asks, "Is there not a cause?"

Yes, Dr. Brindley! There is more preaching, and also for more places, or for considerable addition in those only partially filled, as things are, the people are repelled than attracted. Let Dr. Brindley, like a dutiful son of the Established Church, do all he can to support the churches around; or, let him himself to the Apostles' order, in which he must abandon the Church—denounce its subjection to civil power, its infant membership, its unscriptural polity, and its antient distinction of clergy and laity. Let him set before the people, with better arrangements than they now offer, the good old ways of Apostles' times, and then to the question, "Is there not a cause?" the answer is, "Certainly there is, and may it bless the work!"

HOW TO READ THE BIBLE

MR. EDITOR,—How is it that the Bible you say are so plainly set forth in plain English are not seen by those who read it as much as you do? An answer to this question will much oblige you truly,

It is one thing to search the Scriptures for truth and quiet, and another to read them to ascertain what they can apply in support of certain views, or to read only for the purpose of defending previously formed opinions, and to have their reward. Want of a true view to the scope and context of passages under consideration, is a most common source of error, without which no dogmas would not have one Scripture pleaded in their support.

The following remarks upon the Bible, and rules for reading it, are from the pen of one who stands second to none in his close attention to the Word of Life, and who has the experience of a long life bearing upon the subject.

"One God, one moral system, one Bible. If nature be a system, religion is no less so. God is "a God of order," and that is the same as to say he is a God of system. Nature and religion, the offspring of the same supreme intelligence, bear the image of one father—twin-sisters of the same divine parentage. There is an intellectual and a moral universe, as clearly bounded as the system of material nature. Man belongs to the whole three. He is an animal, intellectual, and moral being. Sense is his guide in nature, faith in religion, reason in both. The Bible contemplates man primarily in his spiritual and eternal relations. It is the history of nature, so far only as is necessary to show man his origin and destiny; for it contemplates nature—the universe—only in relation to man's body, soul, and spirit.

The Bible is to the intellectual and moral world of man, what the Sun is to the planets in our system—the fountain and source of light and life, spiritual and eternal. There is not a spiritual idea in the whole human race, that is not drawn from the Bible. As soon will the philosopher find an independent sunbeam in nature, as the theologian a spiritual conception in man, independent of THE ONE BEST BOOK.

The Bible, or the Old and New Testaments, in Hebrew and Greek, contains a full and perfect revelation of God and his will, adapted to man as he now is. It speaks of man as he was, and also as he will hereafter be; but it dwells on man as he is, and as he ought to be; not as he is physically, astronomically, geologically, politically, or metaphysically; but as he is and ought to be morally and religiously.

The words of the Bible contain all the ideas in it. These words, then, rightly understood, and the ideas are clearly perceived. The word and sentences of the Bible are to be translated, interpreted, and understood according to the same code of laws and principles of interpretation by which other ancient writings are translated and understood; for when God spoke to man in his own language, he spoke as one person converses with another—in the fair, stipulated, and well established meaning of the terms. This is essential to its character as a revelation from God; otherwise it would be no revelation, but would always require a class of inspired men to unfold and reveal its true sense to mankind.

We have written frequently and largely upon the principles and rules of interpretation, as of essential importance and utility in this generation of remaining mysticising and allegorizing. From our former writings we shall here only extract the naked rules of interpretation, deduced from extensive and well digested premises; fully sustained, too, by the leading translators and most distinguished critics and commentators of the last and present century.

RULE I.

On opening any book in the sacred Scriptures, consider first the historical circumstances of the book. These are, the ORDER, the TITLE, the AUTHOR, the DATE, the PLACE, and the OCCASION of it.

The order in historical compositions is of much importance: as, for instance, whether the first, second, or third, of the five books of Moses, or of any other series of narrative, or of even epistolary communications.

The title is also of importance, as it sometimes expresses the design of the book. As Exodus—the departure of Israel from Egypt; Acts of the Apostles, &c.

The peculiarities of the author—the age in which he lived—his style—mode of expression—illustrate his writings. The date, place, and occasion of it, are obviously necessary to a right application of anything in the book.

RULE II.

In examining the contents of any book, as respects precepts, promises, exhortations, &c.; observe who it is that speaks, and under what dispensation he officiates. Is he a Patriarch, a Jew, or a Christian? Consider also the persons addressed: their prejudices, characters, and religious relations. Are they Jews or Christians? Believers or unbelievers? Approved or disapproved? This rule is essential to the proper application of every command, promise, threatening, admonition, or exhortation, in Old Testament or New.

RULE III.

To understand the meaning of what is commanded, promised, taught, &c. ; the same philological principles, deducted from the nature of language ; or the same laws of interpretation which are applied to the language of other books, are to be applied to the language of the Bible.

RULE IV.

Common usage, which can only be ascertained by testimony, must always decide the meaning of any word which has but one signification ; but when words have according to testimony, (i.e. the dictionary) more meanings than one, whether literal or figurative, the scope, the context, or parallel passages must decide the meaning : for if common usage, the design of the writer, the context, and parallel passages fail, there can be no certainty in the interpretation of language.

RULE V.

In all tropical language ascertain the point of resemblance, and judge of the nature of the trope, and its kind, from the point of resemblance.

RULE VI.

In the interpretation of symbols, types, allegories, and parables, this rule is supreme :—Ascertain the point to be illustrated : for comparison is never to be extended beyond that point — to all the attributes, qualities, or circumstances of the symbol, type, allegory, or parable.

RULE VII.

For the salutary and sanctifying intelligence of the Oracles of God, the following rule is indispensable :—

We must come within the understanding distance.

There is a distance which is properly called the speaking distance, or the hearing distance ; beyond which the voice reaches not, and the ear hears not. To hear another, we must come within that circle which the voice audibly fills.

Now we may with propriety say, that as it respects God, there is an understanding distance. All beyond that distance, cannot understand God ; all within it, can easily understand him in all matters of piety and morality. God himself is the centre of that circle, and humility is its circumference.

The wisdom of God is as evident in adapting the light of the Sun of Right-cousness to our spiritual or moral as in adjusting the light of day eyes. The light reaches us with effort of our own, but we must open our eyes, and if our eyes be sound, enjoy the natural light of heaven. There is a sound eye in reference to spiritual light, as well as in reference to natural light. Now, while the philological principles and rules of interpretation enable many men to be skilful in biblical criticism, and in the interpretation of words and sentences ; who can perceive nor admire the things signified by those words ; the sound eye contemplates the things themselves, and is ravished with the moral truths which the Bible unfolds.

The moral soundness of vision consists in having the eyes of the understanding fixed solely on God, and his approbation and complacency for us. It is sometimes called a single eye, because it looks for one thing supremely. Every one, then, who reads the Book of God, with one aim and one desire — intent only to know the will of God ; to such person the knowledge of God is easy : for the light is framed to illuminate such, and such, with the salutary knowledge of things celestial and divine.

Humility of mind, or what is called the same, contempt for all self-born pre-eminence, prepares the heart for the reception of this light ; and is virtually the same, opens the ear to hear the voice of God. Amidst all the arguments from the flesh, the world, and Satan, a person is enabled that he cannot hear the still small voice of God's philanthropy. But, removed from pride, covetousness, and ambition—from the love of the world—in coming within that circle, the circumference of which is unfeigned humility, and the centre of which is God himself, the voice of God is distinctly heard, and clearly understood. All within that circle are taught by God : all within are under the influence of the wick-

ITEMS OF NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM.

Last month, among the prominent items of intelligence from this place, were our occupation of the Circus, and an attempt on the part of the authorities to put down all open air speaking. Since the last communication Bro. King has delivered another discourse in the Circus — subject, "Primitive and Modern Preaching." Samples of both were presented, and the effects generally produced were contrasted — the nature and extent of the results were exhibited, and numerous questions from divers sorts of persons followed. Though the second day was unfavorable as to the weather, (a settled rain came on about an hour before the time of meeting) a large company assembled, and great attention was paid throughout. Increased attendance at our ordinary meetings and interesting inquiries are among the results.

The crusade against open air preaching increased in its vigor; some speakers moved off at the command of the police, others released and were fined, three had some 13s. each to pay, and were given to understand what they might expect should they again appear. Bro. King continued to preach in South field and behind the Town-hall, and though the police stood near, in no instance did they in any way attempt to interfere with him, while in the same places, both before and after his discourses, when others attempted to address the people, they were ordered off or their names taken. The committee formed in consequence of the magistrates' conclusion in Mr. Chew's case called a meeting in the Odd Fellows' hall, from a lengthy report of which in the Daily Post we give the brief extracts following:—

"Last evening a meeting, convened by circular, 'of friends favourable to open-air meetings,' was held at the Odd Fellows' Hall, Upper Temple Street. There was a numerous attendance. The circular stated, that the recent interference of the police with various persons connected with religious and other societies, while holding open-air meetings, and several such persons having been summoned before the magistrates, under the pretence that they had obstructed, or caused to be obstructed, the public thoroughfare; a committee had been appointed with the view of protesting against this interference, and also, if necessary, against the decision of the stipendiary magistrate, by which those meetings were declared to be an infringement of the bye-laws. — Mr. David King was called upon to preside, and after a few preliminary observations in explanation of the object of the meeting, which he said was intended for the purpose of devising measures for a future course of action, called upon the Secretary of the Committee, Mr. A. G. Mackenzie, to read a minute of the proceedings of the committee since its formation. — Mr. Mackenzie afterwards read several letters apologizing for absence, including notes from the Rev. Dr. Mackenzie, Rev. J. Burton, Alderman Mantion, Rev. Dr. Miller, and Mr. George Dawson. Mr. Dawson's brief note remarked, that he was not aware the law forbade all meetings in the open air. If so, he broke the law during the recent election. On his return home he should examine the law carefully on this point. — Mr. Bridge then moved 'That in the opinion of this meeting, the recent decision of the magistrate, forbidding open-air meetings, ought by lawful means to be opposed, as an infringement of our liberties and rights as Englishmen.' — Mr. Grove (one of the persons summoned and fined on Wednesday) supported the resolution. He said, that though for many years he had held open-air meetings, he was never summoned before. When he considered the whole circumstances of the case for which he was fined, he came to the conclusion that it was regularly planned. He believed that no policeman, of his own accord, would have laid an information; he must have been ordered to do so. — Rev. E. Derrington followed. He expressed his belief that the course which had been taken in opposition to open-air meetings, was a combination against the Alliance and Teetotalism on the part of the publicans. Whilst he thought the interference of the police was an infringement of their rights, he held it to be their duty not to put themselves in the way of the police. He was not 'in the know' personally, nor would he mention names, but he knew a man who had charged a publican with having a policeman in his care on the particular morning on which the information was charged against Mr. Grove and his two friends. He was of opinion that this movement would do good to the promoters of open air meetings. He considered they had been too lukewarm, and that some sort of association in out-door efforts was desirable, and if they would now combine it would be beneficial. — Before putting the resolution the Chairman said that he regarded the decision of the magistrate as a stretching of the law; but if it came to a question of imprisonment, let them like Peter, on being released, go back to the place from whence they had been removed. (Hear, hear.) This would probably induce the magistrates to reconsider the construction they had put upon the bye-laws. Believing the law to have been strained, there was an alternative, if necessary, which was to appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench. If this failed, happily there was a dernier ressort, which was to appeal to the town, and there would be, he was satisfied, such a response as would compel an alteration of the law. The motion was then agreed to unanimously.—Mr. Carter then moved the following, and it was declared to be carried, 'That a subscription list be commenced for the purpose of obtaining funds to take any steps the committee may deem advisable, when in any approved case a person shall be summoned and fined.'—The meeting then separated."

After this meeting several town missionaries were brought before the magistrate, but in the meantime numerous letters had appeared in the daily papers, a deputation had waited upon the watch committee, legal gentlemen had spoken upon the subject, the effect being that the chief of the police announced that in future, where obstruction was not caused, the police would not interfere. The next day, when three persons summoned before the magistrate appeared, the police asked permission to withdraw the charge. We are therefore now at liberty to preach the Gospel in the open air, as was the case last year, which we have not at all ceased to do during the agitation.

On the cover of this month's Harbinger we expect some allusion to what we consider desirable for Birmingham in connection with the expected meetings in August.

Four lectures of the course announced as under have been delivered, followed by discussion. A gradually increasing company pay much attention.

"The Past, Present, and Future of the Christian Dispensation.—Tuesday evening lectures will (p.v.) be delivered in the meeting-room Cherry-street, corner of Union-passage, by D. King. This course will embrace the introduction, progress, and perfecting of the Christian economy; also, the rise, consummation, decline, and coming destruction of the Apostacy. The progress of the church will be traced for the purpose of marking our present position, prospects, and duty. After each lecture opportunity will be given, under proper regulations, for free discussion upon the leading points of the lecture."

As our space and time are now pretty well exhausted, other matters must stand over till, if spared, we write again next month.

REVIVAL MOVEMENT IN IRELAND.

We have received the Belfast News of June 17th, which contains report of revival meetings held in Belfast, and other places. On the 16th a prayer was held in the Music-hall, when the place was filled, and no could not obtain admission. About ministers of all denominations were present—the service consisted of singing, and addresses by various ministers the evening the different churches in town were open for special service prayer-meetings, and they were all attended. Indeed, the paper quoted says that the movement continues to strength, and that the work is extensive in the country districts. The instantaneous conversion recorded are numerous, some instances, remarkable.—At A revival meetings, numerous attended were also being held. Mr. G. St. minister, stated that at first he was ful as to the character of the movement but now he was convinced the work of God; the bodily prostration which witnessed in the converts was the of mental depression consequent on cation of sin, and so soon as the saw Jesus as their Saviour, these prostrations passed away. A vari interesting facts in relation to the conversions were also narrated by other speakers. The meetings were adjourned.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

CANADA.—Bro. G. Garraty, of Gardiner, Maine, reports a tour of ten weeks in the Queen's dominions, during which time he baptized sixty nine believers for the remission of their sins.

ILLINOIS.—Bro. Francis Apperson, Vermont, Fulton county, says, under date 20th April, 1859, that six persons had been added to the church in that place. He also reports a meeting at Whetsell's School-house, McDonnough county, which resulted in nine additions; these, with a similar number previously baptized, were organized into a church, two being voted into the office of bishop, and two into the office of deacon.—Bro. J. M. Harris, writing on May 4, reports a meeting at Mill Creek, when four made the good confession.

OHIO.—Bro. W. A. Belding, writing from Mentor, Lake co. in April, states that he has baptized 172 persons during the Winter in that district.

TEXAS.—Bro. H. Thomas, reports a meeting at Hallettsville, Lavacca co. on March 31, with thirty additions.

OBITUARY.

THOMAS BREWER.

On the 21st of May last, our beloved brother, Thomas Brewer, took his departure from this world of sin and sorrow, to that where all is life, joy, and love. He was one of the three brethren who, about 20 years ago, commenced meeting together for the purpose of attending to the institutions of the Gospel. Our brother was much esteemed by his employer as a diligent and faithful servant, and he was beloved by the brethren for his usefulness in the church. His affliction, which was long and severe, was borne with patience and submission, sustained by the joyful hope of a glorious immortality.

" 'Tis finished, 'tis done, the spirit is fled—
The Christian is gone, the brother is dead;
The Christian is living through Jesus' love,

THE GATHERED LILY.

"My lovely little lily, thou wert gather'd very soon
In the fresh and dewy morning, not in the glare of noon;

The Saviour sent his angels to bear thee hence, my own,
And they'll plant thee in that garden where decay is never known.

My lily! oh my lily! I saw thee hour by hour
Still dropping nearer to the earth, my pale and precious flower;

And as I mark'd the glazing eye, and felt the cheek grow cold,

The mingled thoughts that fill'd my heart, they never can be told."

THE views which nature takes of death are surrounded with gloomy terror, because of the consciousness that death inflicts the punishment of separation, loss, and absence; but, blessed be God, the Scripture gives brighter views of this wonderful change of being and of worlds, and in describing it often presents imagery of a soft, sweet, consolatory nature. What picture can be more grateful for the mind's eye to contemplate, than a richly cultivated garden, with its verdant graceful slopes, its fruitful valleys, and cool fertilizing streams? And the beloved Lord of the plantations going down into the garden to gather the clustering lilies. They are shining in the pure lustre, and diffusing their costly fragrance; one bends its young stalk, and He puts forth His hand to strengthen and support it, that it may obtain greater brilliancy of color and elegance of form. He gently breathes upon another, whose white cup is filled with golden dust, which it scatters from its delicate petals, perfuming the atmosphere around. He passes on, permitting that one to stand a little longer, that more of the golden dust may be scattered. And now He lingers by a sweet flowret; He stoops to caress it, and firmly clasping the trembling bud, He snaps it from the stem, and plants in those bright, pure, celestial regions, where no dark cloud intervenes, where no storm ever happens, where no bleak chilling blast can ever blow; but where, in serene skies, warmed by the genial heat of the Sun of Righteousness, it shall expand its glowing loveliness, and blossom in never-fading gloom.

We had fondly hoped to rear this promising bud for ourselves—we had looked forward to the unfolding of its beauteous leaves, we had seen their rich tints, and clasping it to our loving hearts, we had inhaled its balmy odour, and valued far above all price its exotic beauty. But He who gave this fair flower all its sweetness has gathered it, that He may preserve its sweetness and pure whiteness from decay.

Oh! there is love even in the gathering, that is soothing to our wounded feelings. He has transplanted it to the paradise of God, that He may water and cultivate its opening beauties. The Beloved came into the garden to gather lilies, and He has chosen our much loved and cherished one, and clothed it with immortal life, that it may join the garland for the King's palace, where its surpassing loveliness shall never fade away.

Bitterly, and with broken hearts, had we asked the Father to spare our little lily—it was so entwined around the parent stem, every tendril was so closely attached, that in severing the bud the stalk has bled in every vein. But though now suffering, the time will come when the Beloved will remove the root to His everlasting bowers of peace and joy, where, reunited in congenial soil, they shall flourish together throughout the countless ages of eternity.

Had we retained this precious flower, it might have withered, or its fragile tenderness been crushed by a cold unfeeling hand. But now it is safely sheltered by a Father's warm love—it has gone where it was welcomed by the King of kings and Lord of lords; and we will strive to say with grateful submission, "Thy will be done." And we do hope to strike our harps with the melodious anthem heaven resounds with, and waft this note above all others, "My Jesus hath done all things well."

PROFANITY REBUKED.

THE Rev. Samuel Wesley, Rector of Epworth, and father of the celebrated John Wesley, once went into a coffee-house in London for some refreshment. There were several gentlemen in a box at the other end of the room, one of whom, an officer of the Guards, was swearing dreadfully. The rector saw that he could not speak to him without much difficulty: and therefore desired the waiter to give him a glass of water. When it was brought, he said aloud, "Carry it to yon gentleman in the red coat, and desire him to wash his mouth after his oaths." The officer rose up in a fury—but the gentlemen in the box laid hold of him, crying out, "Nay, Colonel, you gave the first offence; you see the gentleman is a clergyman, and you know it is an affront to swear in his presence." The officer was thus restrained, and Mr. Wesley departed.

Some years after, being again in London, a gentleman joined him whilst walking in St. James's Park, and inquired if he had seen him before. Mr. Wesley replied in the negative. The scene in the coffee-house was then recalled to his mind, and the gentleman added, "Since that time, Sir, I thank God, I have feared an oath."

I NEVER FORGIVE.

IN the course of a voyage to America, Mr. Wesley heard General Oglethorpe, whom he sailed, making a great noise in the cabin, on which he stepped in to know the cause. The General immediately dressed him, saying:—

"Mr. Wesley, you must excuse me, I have met with a provocation too great for a man to bear. You know the only wine I drink is Cypress wine, as it agrees with me the best of any. I therefore provided myself with several dozen of it: and a villain (his servant who was present) most dead with fear) has drank up the wine of it. But I will be revenged on him, I have ordered him to be tied hand and foot, and to be carried to the man-of-war with sails with us. The rascal should have been careful how he used me, for I never forgive."

"Then, Sir," said Mr. Wesley, calling to him, "I hope you never sin."

The General, confounded at the reply, threw his keys to the servant and bade him do better in future.

Here, then, is the point. If we never forgive, we must never sin.

Very proneness to sin which we find in ourselves should be a most powerful incentive to the cultivation of a spirit of forgiveness.

PEACE.

THERE is peace where the spirit of Jesus dwells
In the heart of the lowly and contrite ones;
There is peace, where the anthem of gratitude
To the throne of the Father, from ransomed
There is peace, where the brethren of Jesus unite Though confronting the legions of Satan and
To contend for the faith with their armor of light
From the leagu'd powers of darkness their reun to win.

And there's peace, where the sinners, forsaking their way,

Embrace the Redeemer, believe, and obey.

Oh! there's peace and there's joy,

The world cannot destroy.

In obeying the Saviour's commands!

Here abiding with love,

(One with Jesus above,

To make his name known in all lands!

"Tis my peace," saith the Lord, "not the peace of the earth.

That I give to my children while enjoining
For the world will afflict you—not knowing worth:

But in me you'll have peace: therefore be of good cheer!"

Yes, there's peace, though the wicked, with sword and with fire,

Assail unto death the blest children of day:
For the Comforter whispers of peace by the pyre.

To his triumphing martyrs a sure shield and
And there's peace, when at last 'neath the shadow of death,

For the sake of the truth, they with joy yield their breath.

Oh! there's peace from above—

From our God who is love,

When the terrors of death are destroyed;

When the grace of the Lord,

And the might of His word

Are felt in the soul, and enjoyed!

THE AGENCY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT IN CONVERSION AND SANCTIFICATION.*

THE chief cause of misapprehension in regard to spiritual influence, is, as it appears to me, to be found in the fact, that most persons confound the agency of the Spirit in the conversion of the sinner, with the influence he exerts as indwelling in the heart of the believer. Hence the vague and unscriptural notion, that the Spirit may be received before faith, and that faith itself is something wrought in the heart by a special and supernatural operation of the Spirit. This, indeed, seems to be with many, the beginning and end of all spiritual influence, and they depend, accordingly, upon certain mental or emotional impressions, of which they have been the subjects, for their evidence of conversion, their assurance of pardon, their means of sanctification, and their hope of heaven.

We regard, however, the conversion of the sinner and the sanctification of the believer as distinct matters, accomplished, indeed, by the same Spirit, but in a different manner, and from a widely different position. We conceive the Holy Spirit to stand to the sinner in a relation very distinct from that in which he stands to him who is a member of the family of God. With the former, he is an outward witness for the truth; but the latter "has the witness in himself." To the first he is an unknown visitant or stranger—to the last, he is an indwelling and cherished guest. To the sinner, he is as the rain which falls upon the surface of the earth to soften and subdue—to the believer, he is as a fountain from within, springing up into everlasting life. In short, to bring the matter at once to an issue, we deny that there is any scriptural authority for the notion that the unbeliever, or man of the world, can receive the Spirit of God. We hold this dogma to be in direct opposition to the Divine testimony, since Christ himself declares to his disciples that he would pray the Father, and He would give to them another Comforter, "even the Spirit of Truth," continues he, "WHOM THE WORLD CANNOT RECEIVE" (John xiv. 17.)

That which is pure, must be received into a pure vessel; and it is not until the heart is "purified by faith," that the Holy Spirit may enter to dwell therein. This is the view everywhere given in the Scriptures. Peter said to the believing penitents on the day of Pentecost, "Reform and be baptized for the remission of sins, and you shall (then) receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." Paul wrote to the Ephesians, "in Christ ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation, in whom, also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of the inheritance." And also to the Galatians: "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying Abba, Father." It is, on the other hand, nowhere stated that the Holy Spirit was given to any one to make him a believer, or a child of God.

But you may ask, is not every convert born of the Spirit? Must not every one be regenerated before entering the kingdom of heaven? True, but being "born of the Spirit," or regenerated, and receiving the Spirit, are matters quite different. No one can be born by receiving the Spirit. No one can be born of anything that he receives, for the simple reason that he must be born before he can receive any thing. Hence the Scriptures say that the Spirit is given to those that "are sons." How, then, you will inquire, is an individual "born of the Spirit?" — In order to comprehend this, we must be careful to maintain consistency in our interpretation of the figure, and must remember, that in the Scriptures, comparisons are employed with the utmost accuracy and suitableness, in illustration of the particular points to which they are applied.

The figure of a spiritual birth is drawn from a natural or literal birth : a re-generation from a generation. Hence, in all leading points, a just resemblance must be preserved between the fact and the figure. This we find, accordingly, in the language which the Scripture uses whenever this striking figure is introduced. James says, "God, according to his own will, hath begotten us by the word of truth." Peter says, we are "regenerated, not of corruptible seed, but incorruptible, even of the Word of God, which lives and abides for ever." Paul says to the Corinthians : "Though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers, for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel." And John says : "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is begotten of God." It is the gospel, then, which constitutes the incorruptible seed of which the children of God are born ; as in the parallel figure of the sower, (Mat. xiii.) it is the gospel of the kingdom which is sown by the Son of Man, and which falling into good and honest hearts, brings forth abundant fruit to God. To believe that great proposition, that Jesus is the Christ, is, in John's expressive language, to be "begotten of God." It is thus with this sublime proposition and its proofs, as we formerly stated, that God first meets the sinner. In a word, it is the gospel that is received by the sinner, and not the Holy Spirit. Yet if he receive the gospel, spoken by the apostles in words inspired by the Holy Spirit by them "with the Holy down from heaven," and " demonstrations of the Spirit," he is justly said to be " God," or of the Spirit, " the word of truth ;" and when tism, he comes forth from t from the womb, the figure c tion is complete — he is bo and Spirit — he is born a above." Being thus born f he is prepared to receive the adoption, that Holy Spirit ter, which God bestows u children, and which becom an internal indwelling wit earnest of their eternal and produces in them, throu tifying influences and th truth it had revealed, the p of love, joy, peace, and right

The communication of th rit may, then, be justly reg great end of the ministra gospel. Unless the Holy s ceived and enjoyed, all faith all professions are alike nu in vain. "If any man ha Spirit of Christ, he is none consequently, can have n with him—no sonship to G nest of a future inheritance session of the Spirit is inde evidence of sonship, and the the gospel has been truly be

Nor is this enjoyment Spirit momentary or tran nature, as many seem to mistake for it those evanes cents of feeling which may version. The Comforter i with the Christian for ev latter is hence taught to supply of the Spirit of Chri that he may receive ; to s may find ; to knock, that opened to him." "For if evil," said Christ to the "know how to give good g children, how much more heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him." The graces and the blessedness of the Christian are alike "fruits of the Spirit." The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, and which keeps his heart and mind; the joy that animates, and the love which warms his soul, are inward feelings or emotions which must be produced by the presence of the Divine Spirit, no less than those outward works of piety and humanity which the gospel enjoins.

THOUGHTS BY THE WAYSIDE.

"But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed" (Gal. i. 8, 9.)

THAT the Apostle Paul is embraced in the word we is clear; but we think, from the peculiar mode of the expression, that others besides Paul are included; and as he preached the gospel by divine authority, those coöperating with him must have equal authority with himself: and as none others had equal authority except those who received the apostolic commission, the conclusion inevitably follows, that we includes all of the Apostles, and consequently excludes all others, or who are not Apostles. The word we, as found in the Apostolic Epistles, is inclusive and exclusive; and so with the word us—in most cases embracing or meaning only the Apostles. "Therefore, whether it were I or they, so we preached, and so ye believed." "We are of God: he that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth not us." The Scriptures abound in such examples, sustaining the position assumed; but other quotations are unnecessary. It is true that Stephen, Philip, and many others, preached the gospel under the influence of the Holy Spirit; but the gospel was taught them by the Apostles, and hence they did not, like the Apostles, receive it by the revelation of Jesus Christ. The Apostles preached first the gospel of Christ, and the only gospel, so far as known to us, that will prove to be the power of God unto salvation to all who will obey it; and if we do not receive the gospel as they preached it, but receive and believe some other gospel, it matters not by whom preached, we have no promise of everlasting life; and they who preach another gospel, whether angels, men, or demons, are anathematized world without end. The gospel that saves is the gospel that the Apostles preached, and to them must sinners look for the conditions of eternal life. This truth should be written upon every heart, read and known of all men. We should not go to the Law, the Prophets, or the Psalms—but we should sit at the feet of the holy Apostles of the Son of God, and learn the way which leadeth unto life eternal. This truth learned, believed, and practiced, one of the most important steps is taken toward the union of all God's people in the faith formerly delivered to the saints. We are not to be understood as teaching, that none will be saved who lived before the days of the Apostles, for we believe there are many; but we are to be understood as teaching emphatically, that none now who have an opportunity of learning the gospel, and of choice refuse to hear, believe, and obey it, as preached by the Apostles, can reasonably expect to have a right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the city. To hear the Apostles, is to hear the Lord of Glory, "Him that speaketh from heaven." All the ingenuity and so-phistry of all the rabbins in Christendom cannot persuade sober-minded men, that the pure gospel of Christ is not perverted by the so-called evangelical ministry of the present day, by written formulas in the shape of creeds and confessions of faith, that fetter down the consciences of men and perpetuate error from generation to generation. Before there can be a counterfeit bill, there must first be a genuine bill. Before there can be a spurious coin, there must first be a genuine coin—or an error, there must first be truth—a perverted gospel, a true gospel—and so on the principle holds good throughout. But when we apply the right detector, it is an easy matter to distinguish the real from the unreal—the gospel preached by the Apostles, and a gospel preached by men. “We are of God: he that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God, heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth and the spirit of error” (1 John iv. 6.) This is the divine test or rule. There are three serious objections to all human creeds. 1st, There is no divine authority for them. 2nd, There is no necessity for them. And 3rd, They perpetuate error. This scripture we think has a bearing upon the point—“For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book; and if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book” (Rev. xxii. 18, 19.) This, in connection with other portions of the Word of God and the above objections, should for ever seal the doom of human inventions; and all the creed mongers in the world can never meet and refute these objections.

In this paper we propose taking a general survey of the gospel as preached by the Apostles, and for a more full development would recommend the Testament to our prayerful study. Notice, first, the meaning of the gospel, which is a word answering evaggellion in the Greek language. It is a compound word from eu, good, and aggella, to bring news; thus showing the gospel to be good news concerning Christ. The same original word is translated in Luke ii. 10, “An angel said unto them, Fear not, for I bring you good tidings of joy, which shall be to all people.” The gospel, then, is good tidings of joy to all people, and whatever do bring such news to all people is a version of the gospel. The good message carries joy to all people—willing hearts. It elevates our thoughts heavenward, and lifts up a hope, a rainbow that spans the cold waters of Jordan and encircles the throne of the heavenly city, where tall angels continually bow before the King Imperial, and all the sons of God clap their hands and shout for joy.

“A hope so great and so divine
May trials well endure,
And purify our souls from sin,
As Christ himself is pure.”

Having ascertained the meaning of the term gospel, we shall give some particulars of the good tidings the Apostles preached as none ever did the gospel in fact and in power. It is important that we should know where they began; for, taking account of the gospel as preached, from first to last, we have only divinely-authorized schemes or ever will be offered, for the salvation of the souls of men. In determining the beginning point, there are a few little words of great significance—what, and where. For a solution of these words, and for enforcing their meaning before us, we appeal to the Savior's words recorded in the 24th chapter of Luke: “And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, begin-at Jerusalem ; but tarry in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." They are to begin the proclamation when they were endued with power from on high. Repentance and remission of sins were what they were to preach, and the where they were to commence was the city of Jerusalem. Upon the first Pentecost after the resurrection of the Lord Messiah, the Apostles were endued with power from on high ; they were in the city of Jerusalem, and preached repentance and remission of sins in the name of Jesus. Upon that day the Holy Spirit descended upon the Apostles. Upon that day the foundation of the Christian church was completed. Upon that day the long-promised reign of the Messiah began. Upon that day the gospel, in fact and in power, for the first time was preached. Upon that day the kingdom of heaven was unlocked, and converts for the first time introduced under the reign of Jesus as Lord and Christ. In the city of Jerusalem, and on the day of Pentecost, is emphatically the beginning. This truth will stand for ever, for its foundation is on the Word of God, and all the powers of earth and hell combined can never shake it.— "What millions of millions of mighty billows have dashed upon the rock of Gibraltar, and yet it stands unshaken. What fierce tempests have burst upon its summit, and yet it stands unbroken. What mighty thunders have rolled over it, and lightnings played around it, and yet it is unscathed. So this truth, holy truth, stands upon the Rock of Ages, and here we stand undaunted, unappalled, and unconquered." The Apostles began to preach the gospel by declaring that God had raised his Son from the dead, and exalted him to his right hand in heaven, angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him ; that he was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification. They also preached repentance and baptism in the name of Jesus, for the remission of sins ; and whatever they preached for the gospel at the beginning, they preached wherever they went, even down to the close of their ministry, for they delivered one and the same gospel to all. Paul thus wrote to the Romans : "For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth : to the Jew first, and also to the Greek" (i. 16.) "Therefore we are buried with him by baptism unto death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (vi. 4.) "But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness" (vi. 17, 18.) To the church at Corinth the Apostle wrote : "Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand ; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures ; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. xv. 1-4.)

In Acts we have the following facts stated in reference to the Corinthians : "And Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord, with all his house, and many of the Corinthians hearing, believed, and were baptized" (xviii. 8.) To the Galatians who had obeyed the same gospel the Apostle exhorts : "Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (chap. v. 1.) The same Apostle, in his epistle to the Ephesians, says : "There is one body and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling ; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all" (iv. 4-6.) The Philippians who had received the gospel were exhorted "to press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (iii. 14.) The Apostle Paul declares that the Colossians, in obeying the gospel, were "buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead" (Col. ii. 12.) "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1.) "But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath, from the beginning, chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth, whereunto he called you by our gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thes. ii. 13-14.) "Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. x. 22.) The Apostle James says, in his general epistle : "But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed" (James i. 25.) These are the words of Peter in his first epistle : "The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ, who is gone into heaven and is on the right hand of God ; angels, and authorities, and powers being made subject unto him" (Peter iii. 21-22.) In the first general epistle of John we hear him say, "That which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us, and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 John i. 3.) "And this is his commandment, that we believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another as he gave us commandment" (1 John iii. 23.)

Thus we see, by commencing with the Apostles at the beginning, and following them through their entire ministration of the word of life, the same truths of the gospel are preached, the same duties enjoined, and the same promises given to all nations. No man ever will take the trouble to be acquainted with the sayings and doings of the holy Apostles, will not find in preaching one gospel to the Jews and another to the Gentiles ; Paul preaching one gospel in Rome and another in Corinth ; and James an entirely different one to the twelve tribes scattered abroad—but will discover the great links in the gospel chain all perfectly complete, nothing added to or taken from, harmonizing in all of its parts, thus affording the strongest evidence and proof of the divine wisdom displayed in the gospel of Christ. We will now state the principal or chief facts of the gospel to be the death, burial, resurrection, and the lifting up of Jesus on the right hand of the Majesty on high ; the commands to be faith, repentance, baptism, and a life of righteousness ; and the promises to be forgiveness of sins, the gift of the Holy Spirit, sustaining grace, and everlasting life. All the commands, and promises, make up the sum total of the glorious gospel of the Son of God, as preached by the Apostles ; and whatever scheme or system not contain these facts, commands, and promises, is a perversion of God's plan for redeeming a sinful, guilty world. If any man shall add to these things, God will add unto him his plagues of the last day. If any man shall take away from the words of Jesus, God will take away his part out of book of life. God's wisdom saves the soul—man's wisdom destroys the soul. There is no salvation in the gospel facts without the commands, none in the commands without the promises, none in the promises without faith in the facts and obedience to the commands. As a whole, the system is perfect, complete—perverted, it is powerless, valueless. To preach more than the Apostles, is to preach too much—to preach less, is to preach too little—to preach just as they did, is to honor God, to save ourselves and those who hear us. O that we would realize the fearful position we occupy as stewards of the manifold wisdom of God—the strict account we must give to Him in the last great day, and thereby learn to appreciate the boundless love of the Father of all our mercies in the gift of his Son, and the gift of the glorious gospel of our salvation. Whenever we can bring ourselves to the determination to stand aloof from the doctrines and commandments of men, and every earthly consideration, and learn of Jesus and the Apostles the one consecrated way to heaven, then will reason ascend her wonted throne, and in peerless majesty sway her sceptre of peace over the hearts and consciences of undying mortals. "Then will the wilderness and the solitary place be glad, and the desert rejoice and blossom as the rose." Then would we catch the lofty strain of Israel's sweetest bard, and exclaim, "O clap your hands, all ye people, shout unto God with the voice of triumph, for the Lord most high is terrible, he is a great King over all the earth." "Now, I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment."

CHRIST'S RELIGION : ITS BASIS.

"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made. In him was life, and the life was the light of men" (John i. 1-3.)

"CHRIST IS GOD."

The first words of this remarkable passage antedates creation, carrying us back into boundless eternity—the term "in the beginning" being a Hellenistic term indicative of eternity. The Psalmist indicates the eternity of God in the following lofty language:—"Before the mountains were brought forth, or even thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting, thou art God" (xc.)

Whatever is indicated by the term, "the Word," it must have existed prior to creation, since it created all things; therefore, it must be uncreated, eternal, having the attributes of God.

Our holy religion has this as its basis

* From the Banner of the Faith.

—the Messiahship and Divinity of Jesus; and grateful indeed are we to our heavenly Father, that the oracles of heaven upon this vital proposition are clear and specific. "And now, Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was."—"I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world: again I leave the world and go to the Father."—"But unto the Son he saith, thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom."

From these Scriptures we learn the absolute eternity of the Word, which became incarnate and abode among men, and is unquestionably Jesus our Redeemer. "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." He became the medium of divine communication—the channel of salvation—the fountain of life—the source of immortality. John further declares that "the Word was God," placing the proposition beyond dispute, resting upon direct revelation—a declaration having the corroborative testimony of all the ancient manuscripts, the strictest criticism sanctioning this as an authentic oracle of heaven—a brilliant ray of divine truth, entering the heart to cheer and comfort.

The Apostle had just used the term Theos, God, as applicable to Jehovah, and in the same verse he uses the same noun applied to The Word which became flesh and dwelt among men; and the lofty appellation of God we find applied to him in the following Scriptures:—Rom. ix. 5, 1 John v. 20, John xx. 28.

"The same was in the beginning with God," showing clearly an eternal coöperation and fellowship—language inspiring to his sincere followers. "All things were made by him." What unmistakable evidence of his omnipotence! All created intelligence the result of his power—the Great First Cause of the moving masses of matter revolving regularly in boundless space. Is it possible that God could invest a creature with omnipotency, creating all things, (himself in the catalogue) and taught to worship him, in harmony with the oracle that our hearts are to be placed supremely upon God? Would it not be treason to draw away the affections of our race from the source of life and light, and place them upon a creature?

To make the matter incontestable, and to confirm the previous statement, it is declared that "without him was not anything made that was made." We therefore are permitted to behold his power and matchless wisdom everywhere in the wonderful adaptation and design observable all around us. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth forth his handiwork." The beauties of nature, the sublimity of the scenery around us, the music of the voice, the faculties mind, the roar of the ocean, the order of the storm—all speak the wondrous work of Jesus, the only Begotten the Father.

All that lives, and moves, as sprang into being by his power, and goodness; he created, sustains, holds, blesses, and governs. Men not therefore refuse to yield our hearts to another, but be faithful to him ever, worshipping Him as the Co-worker with the Father.

"In him was life, and the light of men."—For as he hath life in himself, so hath he the Son to have life in himself. We are the resurrection and the life.

"Life and immortality are brought forth by his resurrection from the dead." "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." He therefore has the power to confer spiritual life. A man cannot rise higher than his source; therefore must have this life in himself, different from any creature, since all created intelligences possess not the power to confer, but only to enjoy life.

We sometimes hear Rev. iii. 12 used as an objection to the absoluteness of Jesus, as though the arbitrary and superficial interpretation of this sage could counteract a clear and specific revelation. "The beginning of the creation of God" (archee.) Beginning means, as properly origin, or the beginning of the creation, which relieves the reader, and agrees with the unerring tenor of inspiration. May the faithful rejoice in the glorious hope of the Divine Redeemer and Intercessor, who we worship him as supreme, loving, because he first loved us. Could we be induced to lean upon the mighty arm of the Son of God, the bright would be the journey of how hopeful the hour of death, and how happy the unending cycles of eternal life. May we actively labor to inspire the hearts of perishing mortals around us with these lofty spiritual realizations, that our lives may furnish a record of noble deeds in the conflict with the arch-enemy of man. ## SYNOPTICAL EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.—No. II.

Romans i. 16-32.

PRESUMING that you and your scholars have fully and thoroughly investigated the various topics of Paul's introduction in his letter to the Romans, I now respectfully invite you to the consideration of his principle thesis. This he submits in the following verses: "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ—for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth—to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. For therein is the justification of God by faith revealed in order to faith, as it is written, But the just by faith shall live."

To the Roman Christians, the Greek original of this thesis was, no doubt, quite intelligible. They were a very highly educated people—and many of them wrote and spoke the Greek language with great fluency and precision. But since that time, it has ceased to be a living language. Its idioms are, in many respects, essentially different from that of our own vernacular; and it is, therefore, the more important that we endeavour to understand the precise meaning of the Apostle; that we fully and clearly comprehend his thesis, the "quod erat demonstrandum," before we proceed to his proof.

We shall, therefore, in the first place, consider very briefly, some of his leading terms and phrases. The word "Gospel" is fundamental. It literally signifies "good news" or "glad tidings." But in the New Testament it is restricted to the glad tidings of salvation. And as everything else depends on the death, the burial, and the resurrection of Christ, Paul by synecdoche, limits it still farther to the mere comprehension of these three fundamental facts. "Moreover, brethren," says he, "I declare unto you the Gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. For I declared unto you first of all, that which I also received, that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. xv. 1-4.)

But in his thesis to the Romans, he evidently uses it in a more comprehensive sense; to denote the whole scheme of redemption through Christ, embracing all its facts, its precepts, its promises, and its privileges, as these were first proclaimed to the world by the holy Apostles, and afterwards recorded in the writings of the New Testament. In this sense it is generally used in the Acts and in the epistolary writings.

The phrase "power of God," simply means that the gospel is the means and instrument, by and through which God manifests and exercises his power in saving all men who believe it. See also 1 Cor. i. 18-24.

The word "believeth" is to be understood in its common apostolic usage. In this sense, it always implies the obedience of faith. For an illustration of this, see the eleventh chapter of Hebrews.

The names "Jew and Greek," are equivalent to Jew and Gentile, or to the whole human race; for every member of which, the blood of Christ was, by the grace of God, most freely poured out.

In the seventeenth verse, Paul explained how the gospel is the power of God for salvation to every one that believeth it. It is owing, he says, to the fact that in it, and as an element of it, God's plan of justifying men by faith, has been revealed in order to produce faith. As saith the prophet Habakkuk, "The just by faith shall live" (Hab. ii. 4.) And as Paul afterwards adds, "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God" (Rom. x. 17.)

You are, doubtless, aware that much has been written on the phrases "righteousness of God," and "from faith to faith," as these words occur in the Common Version. But my object is not to criticise commentators, but to ascertain the meaning of the Apostle. And this is, I think, sufficiently evident from the whole context.

The proposition, then, which Paul here submits to his Roman brethren and which he afterwards proceeds to prove, is that the gospel as it was then proclaimed by the inspired teachers, and as it is now revealed in the New Testament, is the scheme ordained by God for the redemption of all who believe and obey it.

This is all that is expressed in his thesis as it is here submitted; but something more is evidently implied. He not only proves an affirmative, but he likewise illustrates and sustains a negative. He not only demonstrates that the gospel is the power of God for salvation to every one that believeth; but he also shows that it is the only means by which any one can be saved; that to be saved by law, the only proposed alternative, and the means by which the great majority of both Jews and Gentiles were then seeking to be justified, was practically impossible.

With this last clause he connects the very first link of his argument. That it is impossible to be justified by law, says he by implication, is evident. "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness."

It is not my purpose to trouble you or your scholars with details. You have your Greek Testaments, Lexicons, and Concordances, by the aid of which, you may extend your investigations to any desirable degree of minuteness. But you will allow me to call your attention particularly to the phrase "the truth" (την αληθειαν) as it occurs in the eighteenth verse. On it the scope of the argument very much depends. It does not mean all truth—for then the article would have been omitted. Nor does it comprehend the truth of the gospel; for this sense would not suit the scope of the argument. But it evidently means the great and important truth respecting the nature, the character, and the government of God; implying, of course, our relations, duties, and obligations to him. Against all who hold this truth in unrighteousness, the wrath of God is revealed from heaven. But (to supply the ellipsis) all men have done this. And therefore, all men are subject to the wrath of God, and must suffer the penalty of the law unless saved by the gospel, which, if not the only practicable scheme of grace, is at least the only one that God has provided for our fallen world.

It is true that Paul does not here to draw this conclusion. He hastens from the mere statement of his major premise, to meet an objection which some might be inclined to urge against the application of the argument to the Gentile world. It might be alleged that the Gentiles did not know God, and therefore, that they could not be charged with the withholding "the truth" in unrighteousness. To this Paul replies, that the Gentiles certainly are responsible in this matter. "Because that what may be known of God is manifest to them—for God hath shown it unto them. For the invisible things of God, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse."

Many have been greatly perplexed in attempting to reconcile this with what Paul has written to the Corinthians. But the difficulty is purely imaginary. There is really no discrepancy in the case. In his letter to the Corinthians the Apostle states as a fact, that the world, by wisdom, knew not God (1 Cor. i. 21.) And in his letter to the Romans the very same thing is implied, and much more is expressed. The facts here recorded, it appears, only that the natural men, or, if you please, the natural philosophers, did, by their wisdom, acquire the knowledge of God; but that by their speculations, they did actually pervert that knowledge God had at first communicated to Adam, in Paradise, in his own immediate presence; and that this knowledge was transmitted through Noah to the whole postdiluvian world, illustrated though it was, at the same time, by every page of nature's awful volume.

Paul does not say that men acquire a knowledge of Jehovah from the book of nature; nor does he affirm that men ever did acquire this knowledge from the lights of tradition and philosophy. Quite the reverse. The tendency of human speculations has generally been to corrupt theology—to pervert the knowledge of God—to promote idolatry—and of course, to degrade human

But the error was more in the heart than in the head of those concerning whom Paul writes. God had made himself known to men personally ; also by revelation, by tradition, and by the light of nature. Had men really desired to retain the knowledge of God, they might have done so. And had any honest inquirer after "the truth" been hindered by a want of capacity, or by any other cause beyond his control, he would doubtless have been judged according to the light afforded and the knowledge acquired. But the fact is, they did not want to know God. "Because when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful ; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish hearts were darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and to four-footed beasts, and creeping things ! Wherefore, God also gave them up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves ; who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed forever." "And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind to do those things which are not becoming ; being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness ; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity ; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, deceitful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful ; who, knowing the judgment of God, that they who commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them."

Here, then, ends the general argument of Paul respecting the Gentile world. He does not even pause to draw his conclusion. It is, alas ! but too evident, that persons guilty of any one of the preceding vices, can never be justified by a law which requires nothing less than a perfect obedience and conformity to the whole revealed will of God ; and consequently, that if any of the Gentiles are saved, it must be through the grace of God, as it has been revealed in the gospel of his Son.

What a rich field of thought, then, does this chapter open up to the student who has a mind to comprehend all its logical and practical bearings ! How exceedingly degraded is fallen man ! How prone to forget God, and to form and worship idols of his own character ! How powerful, and how divinely adapted to our condition, must be that gospel that can elevate, change, and adorn human nature — that can transform "the raven to a dove, the lion to a lamb !" How necessary, even to morality, is the knowledge of God ; how evidently true is the maxim of Solomon, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (Prov. ix. 10.) And how necessary, therefore, it is to recast the minds and the hearts of the rising generation in the mould of God's own construction.

Let us labour, then, my dear brother, thus to educate the youth of our country, and to hasten on that glorious era, when the knowledge of the Lord shall fill the whole earth as the waters cover the sea.

LETTER FROM A FATHER TO HIS DAUGHTER, AND HER REPLY.

DEAR DAUGHTER, — I take this opportunity to write you a few lines. For some time I have been pondering in regard to the step you have taken. You alone are responsible for your conduct ; but, as a father, I feel that I should like to express to you my feelings in the matter. I have a deep interest in your future welfare ; as much so as any father can have. You say that you have been influenced by nothing but the truth in taking the steps you have. I sincerely hope you are not denied of the Father, for it would indeed be an awful thought. I could have wished that I might have had the privilege of seeing you before you took the step, but I could not. Jesus says he is the truth and the life ; and if he has influenced you by his Holy Spirit to do as you have done, I ought not to object. But if Mr. Lowel has influenced you to believe that all you needed was to be baptized, it is a different thing. Mr. Lowel does not believe in the operation of the Holy Spirit in regenerating the soul, and that is denying Christ; for he says, "I am the way, the truth, and the life."

My prayer is, that you may not be led astray, for to be deceived is awful beyond description. I wish to be plain, but kind and faithful. I ask your forgiveness for my unfaithfulness to you, in that I have not lived more as a Christian ought to live. Though you have been baptized, it will not benefit you, unless your soul has been regenerated by the operation of the Holy Spirit on your heart, and you have Christ formed within you, the hope of glory. Jesus says, "I am the Word;" and the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. O, dwell upon that name — the only name whereby you can be saved. The Psalmist David prayed that God would, by his Holy Spirit, open the eyes of his understanding, to make these things plain. The teachings of the Holy Spirit will do more to enlighten your mind than the best human teacher. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. Now that sect who call themselves Disciples deny this. I have heard Mr. Lowel say, that no person was influenced by the Spirit of God. Paul says it is the Spirit that maketh intercession, according to the will of God; therefore, we cannot pray acceptably to God except the Spirit maketh intercession for us; hence they do not believe in prayer. I sincerely hope you do not believe that all you need is to be baptized. They do not teach anything about newness of life, because they do not believe in being influenced by the Spirit.

It is remarkable that a few in that locality have had such a wonderful revelation of the Scriptures. Men that have been preaching and searching for forty years don't begin to know anything compared with them. Daughter, believe me, I feel deeply on this subject; and why should I not? I suppose they told you there was no difference between them and the Baptists; but it is not so. There is as much difference between them and the Baptists, as between the Baptists and any other denomination. If there difference, why should we be separated?

To be a Christian and to live a Christian, is to be actuated by the Holy Spirit, which is the life and power of religion. My prayer is, that you and your husband may enjoy that which is better than life. I have talked much, but with the kindest of feelings, I must close. I should like to hear from you more. Come and see us. — Your affectionate father, J. F.

REPLY.

DEAR FATHER, — We were happy to receive your kind letter, though it makes some grave charges against the disciples. You say Mr. Lowel teaches that "all an unregenerated man needs is to be baptized." No wonder, assured, father, that we believe that. So, of course, if Mr. Lowel teaches as you intimate, we have been influenced by him. We do not believe one solitary thing that he says; hence, you will be more about our being persuaded by Mr. Lowel to believe. But if he teaches as you represent, he would be more unscriptural in his views than he who says "that the special operation of the Holy Spirit is all we need for salvation depends on one single thing, the Holy Spirit, what becomes of the rule of judgment which suspends the rewards and punishment of man's own deeds? (See Matt. x. 12, Rom. ii. 6, and 2 Cor. v. 10.)" He says, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved" (Mark xvi. 16). Now, if Mr. L. says that baptism is needed for salvation, he speaks in text, and virtually disbelieves in the efficacy of that thing as he does who says that only is necessary. Jesus has put both together for salvation, and God has joined, let no man dare asunder. Again, we believe the revelation of Paul (Gal. iv. 6) "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his son into your hearts, Abba, Father." We do not believe because we are not sons, therefore he sends forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts to make us sons. That is which is but human tradition, and we do not believe. We do believe Peter says, "God gives the Holy Spirit to them that obey him" (Acts v. 32).

do not believe that God gives the Holy Spirit to them that disobey him in order to make them obey him. We believe that the world cannot receive the Holy Spirit (See John xiv. 17.) We do not believe, however, that the Holy Spirit enters the hearts of the world to convict and convert them. The former we believe, the latter we do not believe, because we find it morally impossible to believe both, and we prefer to believe the Bible. It is true, the Spirit does reprove and enlighten the world; but he does not enter their hearts in order to do it, but does it through the truth. (See John vi. 63, viii. 32, and xvii. 17; also James i. 18; 1 Cor. iv. 15, and scores of other texts.) Thus you will not fail to see that the Spirit operates through the truth, and not through the air. It is one of the greatest privileges of God's children to pray to their Father in heaven. But we believe Jesus when he says, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." We believe Peter when he says, "Repent and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins" (Acts iii. 38.) We do not believe men when they say, "Repent, and pray for the remission of sins." We believe Ananias when he says, "Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord" (Acts xii. 16.)

We do not believe men when they say, "Kneel down and pray, and pray away your sins." You say the Disciples do not teach anything about a new life. O! father, if you had heard Bro. L. address the converts as to their new relations, new lives, new duties, you never would have preferred this charge. But how can you suppose that the Disciples told us there was no difference, between them and the Baptists? There is a very great difference.

1. The Disciples of Christ take Christ's name, while the Baptists, like the carnal Corinthians, take the name of John the Baptist. You exhorted us to think of Christ's name, and we, like dutiful children, have been thinking of it.

2. The Disciples take the Bible alone as their rule of faith and practice, while the Baptists take the Bible and human articles of faith with it. A world of difference!

But it may be confessed that the Disciples of Christ are like the sects in one thing. The Wesleyans take the name of Wesley, their leader—the Lutherans take the name of Luther, their leader—the Baptists take the name of John the Baptist, their leader—and the Disciples of Christ take the name of Christ, their leader. They are alike, therefore, in taking the names of their respective leaders. You will not think this too severe, when you reflect that you have said that the Disciples deny Christ. You could have said nothing worse to Judas or Thomas Paine. You seem to think it strange that a few in this place should be right, while so many learned and pious men are opposed to them. What truth is there in the universe that could not be put down by such an argument? It would have put down Republicanism in the days of Jefferson, Protestantism in the days of Luther, and Christianity itself in the days of the Apostles. It would have disapproved the very existence of America in the days of Columbus, and it would this very minute prove the Baptists wrong on infant baptism. Nine-tenths of the Christian world teach infant baptism. Now, is it not remarkable that the few people about here have had such a wonderful revelation on the subject of infant baptism, that the most learned and pious men in all Asia, Europe, and America, who have spent forty years in studying and preaching, can't begin with them? We trust that you yourself, upon reflection, will give this up as a bad argument.

Please accept our thanks for the interest you have manifested in our welfare. In hope of eternal life, I remain, your affectionate daughter, C.

CHRIST'S CHURCH IDENTIFIED.—No. VII

"Upon this rock will I build my church."

In a number of the Christian Journal we have the following :—

"A LETTER MIS-SENT. — Among the letters advertised at the Concord (N. H.) post office, is one directed to the 'Church of God.' The religious establishments of that place refused to take it in, and thus acknowledge that it has been mis-sent!"

Yes! they "refused to take it in!" Did they not thereby identify themselves as sects, and not the church of God? They felt in their hearts and consciences, that this letter was not intended for them. But how different would it have been had one of the apostolic churches been in that city? Do you not think that this letter would have fallen into its hands? Most certainly: and by common consent. But, had it been written by Jesus Christ, containing instructions of the most vital importance, the sects of Concord would not have been benefited by it, having cut themselves off, both by their organizations, and the names of their organizations, from its appropriation.

On one occasion I addressed a letter to "the Elders of the Church of Christ, Lawrenceburgh, Ky.;" and on another, to "the Church of Christ, Augusta, Ga." I heard from both these letters afterwards. The postmaster at Lawrenceburgh, although a zealous Methodist, never seemed to have dreamed of handing it to one of the Elders of the Methodist church, but on the first opportunity, handed it to one of our Elders; and the postmaster at Augusta, a Roman Catholic, sent my letter promptly to a principal member of the Christian church in Augusta! Thus, our bitterest opponents are compelled to acknowledge that their party organizations and names are of human origin, and not in the Bible! Indeed, there is not one fragment of Bible truth addressed to any merely sectarian organization. The epistles, the only specific addresses to churches, are addressed to "the saints," "the church of God," &c. And as the sects are not addressed, or spoken to, so they are not spoken of in the Divine records, unless it be in some apocalyptic prediction concerning the apostacy. There can, of no divine authority for either origin or their maintenance. The thing willed to them in the old testament of our Lord and Jesus Christ. What would you of a man who should claim under a will in which he is not named? What would you think of a man which should claim certain rights and privileges, from a charter, in which there is not one word by which he can be identified? Self-originate churches have originated their own charters; but Jesus has never signed his signature and seal to any one of them, or, if he has signed and sealed, as a Presbyterian, he has not the Magna Charta; and vice versa; or if he has signed the Baptist charters, or any other, he has vetoed all the other sects, unless it can be proved he has put his hand and seal to all antagonisms and to palpable and irreconcilable contradictions! No, never!

I do not intend to be hard on any denomination. I do not say of the membership of the different denominations, what I say, and wish to emphasize, of their organization. There are Christians in heart, in the "evangelical sects," and probably some considered by "the orthodox" as unevangelical, is what I am here to admit—even in the Romanish church. God forbid that I should deprecate abstract a single iota from the religious worth of a member of any denomination in Christendom. I love myself, I must "do to others as I would have others do unto me." It gives me exquisite pleasure to say that there are gems, yes, stars of Christian exhortation in all the churches with which I am acquainted — men of endowment, not only intellectual, but spiritual, and of a truly excellent! But this I say, have gotten into the wrong place, in organizations that are not Christ's. Why else is it, that our preachers have been pleading in the breadth and of the land for Christian union? Why, but to unite the Christians now severed, most cruelly and impiously severed, by human organizations, in that one, and only one organization, of which Jesus, the head and foundation of his church, is the author and the finisher! If we did not believe that there are Christians in all the sects, there would be none among the sects whom we could invite to the heaven-appointed, and blood-consecrated, and self-sealed platform of Christian union—the foundation of prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the rock of salvation, the chief corner stone. At this stage of the investigation, permit me to say to any member of a sectarian organization, who may deign to read this communication, that the time speedily approaches, when he will be compelled to occupy the position sought to be established in this essay. We will illustrate as follows:—The Baptist, or the other sectarist, goes after death to heaven's door, and knocks. It is asked, "Who comes?" "A Baptist," or "a Methodist," or "a Presbyterian," or "an Episcopalian," or "a Reformer!" A startling response is heard from within, "Those names are not recognized here. They are not in that divine charter in which are guaranteed all the promised blessings of the New Covenant. There is nothing promised to the wearers of those names in the last will and Testament of Jesus Christ!" What, then, will you do? I will tell you what;—if you can, in truth, say a "Christian comes!"—"I am a Christian—a disciple of Christ," all will be well; but, if you cannot, all will be ill for ever! The mantle of your orthodoxy will be stripped off, and you will walk naked, and men and angels will see your shame! Party pride and denominational selfishness will there be hideous deformities. Party peculiarities will become lighter than the chaff; nay, if they shall have prevented you from following the truth, so far as is rendered accessible to you by the Father of Lights, they may become fanged vipers to sting your soul with undying agonies! Why, then, not divest yourself of all that is not purely Christian now? Why not at once put on "the wedding garments" of original apostolic Christianity? If you can, but through bigotry or prejudice will not, at the great day of solemn accounts, you will be "speechless."

In the report of a late Presbytery, our church has been published as a pirate ship, because it has no human creed: and that report represents the creed of a church as being its flag or banner. Now, not to dwell on the fact that the church of Christ, in its palmiest days, had no human creed, what shall we say of a church whose flag is a human fabrication—which has never been recognized by the King of saints—which never existed in the world until more than fifteen centuries after Christ had built his church upon the rock of salvation—and which those who muster under it endeavour to impose upon the world as the banner of Christ's church? I will not say that this is piracy. Nor will I say that it is either forgery or counterfeiting; but I will say that a procedure, such as this, under our government, or in any well regulated earthly kingdom, would be treason, and hanging would be the penalty!

This Presbytery makes much ado about official grace. I wonder if they know whence their official grace was derived. Follow the turbid stream to its fountain, and you will find that fountain to be the Church of Rome. They have neither ordination nor baptism from any other source. And the same is true of all the Pædobaptist sects. Is the Church of Rome the church of Christ? If this question is answered in the affirmative, it follows that the Presbyterians, and other kindred sects, are not churches of Christ, for they were excommunicated and accursed by the Roman Catholic church of Jesus Christ; but if the Romish church is not the church of Christ, but the "beast," "the man of sin," "the scarlet lady," "the mother of harlots," &c.; she had no Christian ordination, nor Christian baptism, nor official grace to impart. How has the son of pride fallen from heaven! Take which horn of this dilemma you please, and the Pædobaptist sects, on their own principles, are without ordination; and consequently, without official grace and baptism!

I will here give the views of an eminent modern Baptist writer on this subject. Speaking of the old reformers, such as Calvin, Luther, &c. he says:—

"They reformed upon the doctrine, and reformed upon the manners, and reformed upon the morals of the church of Rome; but they did not cast Rome away and go back to the Bible, and search there for the original model, as we have done, and confine themselves to it; or look for the church in the wilderness, where Rome, the great dragon, had driven her for that Christian baptism, and that Christian ordination, which Rome, as anti-Christ, could not confer. They were content to protest against Rome, and denounce its fearful hierarchy as the very man of sin and son of perdition; but to this very day they dare not officially declare that the baptism and ordination of this anti-Christ are not true and valid Christian baptism, and good and lawful Christian ordination; or to do so, would be utterly to invalidate their own, since Calvin and his co-presbyters were all baptized and all ordained by anti-Christ. The question came up in 1854, in the New School General Assembly, which met at Buffalo, whether as Presbyterians, they should recognize the baptism of the Roman Catholics as valid Christian baptism; and while they denounce that church as the very anti-Christ foretold in the word—while they know that it has been in every age the great enemy and bitter and bloody persecutor of the true followers of Jesus—they did not dare to decide that it could not and did not confer the sacraments of Christ. Its hands, all reeking with the blood of martyred saints, conferred the only baptism which those men ever received who gave baptism to the Presbyterian church; and when they venture to decide that this was not and could not be Christian baptism, they, by that act, decide that they have never been themselves baptized.

"The facts concerning this discussion should not be forgotten. The question which had been referred to the Assembly for its decision, was a very simple one, and to an uninterested spectator would have seemed very easy of solution. It was in substance this: Is baptism and ordination conferred by the church of Rome valid and lawful Christian baptism and ordination? It was referred to a special committee to examine and report. The majority of this committee reported that our standards declare the Pope to be anti-Christ, and the baptism or ordination of anti-Christ could not be Christian baptism or Christian ordination. But a majority of the Assembly voted for the indefinite postponement of the whole subject, which was simply a refusal to decide the question either way. And the reasons given for the course were, that if they ventured officially and authoritatively to deny that Rome was a true church, and her baptisms and ordinations lawful and valid, they would by that act offend unchurch themselves, since their ordinances came to them through Rome; the baptisms and ordinations of Rome invalid, then Luther and Calvin were never baptized nor ordained; and so who constituted the first churches of the Reformation. If they were unbaptized, then they are not true churches, since a company of unbaptized believers, however pious, have ever been regarded as a church. If their ministers were unordained, according to Presbyterian usage and authority, they had no right to baptize or ordain others; so the churches never have received through them the ordinance of Christ, and therefore, must be now out of them."—Ten Days Travel in Scotland and the Church, p. 412-413.

The Presbyterians have no less than four courts, which they presume to style courts of Jesus Christ. When did Jesus constitute these courts? Is there any authority for them? Is there any charter or constitution which gave his church? None whatever is known, from history, that even apostolic councils were not held until the middle of the second century. Jesus constituted his church, and after six hundred years constituted four Presbyterian courts for its government. Alas! alas! poor, proud human nature! No! Jesus Christ never did anything! If they say he did, let them produce the proof, or acknowledge treason. A court not named in the constitution! This may be all very well in ecclesiastical hierarchies, but would be a little dangerous and troublesome should such privileges be introduced in instituting civil courts, in any State, unknown to their constitution. How much authority would they have? Just none at all. They would not be unconstitutional, but against the constitution. So, beyond all successful controversy, it is, and must for ever be, without all ecclesiastical rights, not warranted by the Scriptures.

While we are on the subject of Presbyterian courts of Jesus Christ, it is not be amiss to give Finney's account of Christ's supreme Presbyterian "These things," says he, "in the Presbyterian church, their contentious janglings, are so ridiculous, so wretched, so outrageous, that no doubt their jubilee in hell every year about the time of the meeting of the General Assembly. And if there were ten heaven, no doubt they would be shed over the difficulties of the Presbyterian church. Ministers have been dragged from home year by year, perhaps leaving a revival in progress, and gone up to the General Assembly, and there heard debates and witnessed a spirit, by which their souls have been grieved and their hearts hardened; and they have gone home ashamed of their church—and ashamed to ask God to pour out his Spirit upon such a contentious body.”—Finney on Revivals, p. 269. Finney was, when he wrote this, the pastor of the Presbyterian church in the city of New York.

And now, whilst many sectarian combinations are being formed against us to put us down, or at least to hinder our success; and since the Baptists sometimes are found in the puling embraces of these loving combinations, I will treat the reader with an extract from a book by the Rev. John Flavel Bliss, A.M. entitled, “Letters on Baptism,” &c. This Mr. Bliss had been the pastor—he tells us, on his title page of several Congregational and Presbyterian churches in Western New York; and as we learn from this preface, was converted to Baptist views upon the subject of Christianity. He declares himself as follows:—

1. “No being in the universe, besides the great Jehovah, shall have liberty to make a fold, or a constitution of a fold, in which to gather the friends of the Saviour.
2. “Jesus Christ is to be sole King—exclusively to reign—to have all the power and the exclusive jurisdiction.
3. “All legislative, judicial, and executive powers are vested in Christ.
4. “All Christians, as soon as converted, must come into the fold, or kingdom of Christ, so as to be one, and enjoy free communion together.
5. “The laws are all written in the Bible.
6. “As people naturally are estranged, they must become the hearty friends of the King, in order properly to take the oath of allegiance.
7. “Baptism is the voluntary subjection of himself, on the part of a believer, to the exclusive jurisdiction of Christ, within his kingdom.
8. “This subjection to the exclusive jurisdiction of Christ, in his way, is necessary to membership under him, and membership to privileges.
9. “To alter either the form of that oath, or the principles of it, so as to recognize other jurisdictions, other rules, or other folds, or to build them up with other subjects, or with another oath, as it would be in all governments, so, here, it is high treason against the King.

10. “An opposition line of things, or imperium in imperio, or competing folds—as in all other governments, so, here, is high treason against the King.

11. “Church discipline is exclusively the exercise of delegated power from the rightful sovereign, and in manner, form, spirit, and purpose, precisely as he has prescribed, and for his interest and that of his kingdom.

12. “To aid, abet, or assist in building up any state of things, as in all other governments, so, here, is treasonable rebellion; and more heinous, as the character of the King is infinitely more glorious than that of any other king.

13. “Jesus Christ alone has the appointing power to the ministry.

14. “All divisions must be nipped in the bud.

15. “Jesus Christ is recognized as the only fountain of power in all things.

16. “None are within the kingdom of Christ, but those who after conversion, are baptized into the exclusive jurisdiction of Christ.

17. “Free communion to all Christians by keeping the avenues into that kingdom free and open to all real Christians.

18. “No churches may be so joined together as to control each other at all, in any way which will in the least interfere with the exclusive jurisdiction of Christ as sole monarch; and no rules are ever to be admitted that will interfere with his exclusive dominion and jurisdiction as sole King.

19. “All action in relation to the ministry is under the King, and within the kingdom. Membership, and piety, and qualification to be judged by those within the kingdom according to the rules of Christ, are indispensable” (pp. 178-182)

Whether or not the Baptists will adopt, or have generally adopted these principles, I presume not to say. But I do presume to say, that they are substantially correct, and worthy of universal acceptance. Take, then, together the testimony of Bliss, or the reasonings and proofs of the author of “Ten Days’ Travel,” and the Pædobaptist sects are not churches of Christ, but rebellious and treasonable institutions against the King of saints; and it is altogether probable that the Pædobaptist denominations entertain just about as favourable an opinion of the Baptists. The Church of England, and the Episcopalians of the United States, believe and teach that all sects are unauthorized — lack the grace which is supposed to percolate through the fingers of the authorized ministry in broken, or, perhaps, unbroken succession through all the Popes from the Apostles! Anan, a Presbyterian, has written a book against Episcopalian Methodism, which has been endorsed by a number of the Presbyterian literati in the East, in which he labors to show that Methodism is a system of fanaticism and enthusiasm. And there is something earthly, scarcely anything divine, which the Methodist more than abhors, than the "five points of Calvinism." Call us uncharitable, but we learn charity among the "A kingdom divided against itself cannot stand, but cometh to desolation." A. R.

THE FINAL JUDGMENT.

Most men who have lived under the light of the gospel, and who die in their reason, feel themselves compelled to pronounce a judgment upon their own character, which either inspires them with the hope of the gospel, or else leaves them to utter despair. Why, in any case, that judgment which an individual, under the light of the gospel, and in the last moments of reason and of life, passes upon himself, should be reversed at the final judgment, must argue a degree of self-flattery and self-righteousness, that leave him as ignorant of himself and of the Divine love, as he is destitute of that holiness which alone can fit him for the bliss of heaven.

The view of the final judgment which we have given us in the 25th of Matthew, represents all the nations of the earth assembled before Him who, as the Son of Man, is both our Peer, our King, and our Judge. All nations, we see, are assembled before Him. Amidst myriads of angels he takes his seat on the throne of his glory. And this vast assembly of nations gathered before him, in the language of the metaphor used, he separates as a shepherd divides the sheep from the goats. The sheep he places upon his right hand, but the goats on his left. In these grand divisions they stand, not as nations, but as individuals taken out of all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people.

Reader, do you imagine yourself one of the vast multitude whom no man can number, and that you shall one day stand before the Son of Man, by whom you shall be judged as by a peer. Be assured it is no vain imagination. It is a serious reality, as true as that you live. He has the fixing of your destiny, for all judgment is committed to the Son, that all may honor the Son who honor the Father who sent him. You may be prepared to stand before the Son of Man.

In the judicial proceedings of this day, no mention will be made of the soundness or unsoundness of doctrine, nor of the orthodoxy or heterodoxy of our creed, nor of our forms of government. Nor will any man be commended for his regular life and going habits; nor blamed for any of these moral qualities.

Nothing of all that now so engages the intemperate zeal of those defending their religious opinions, forms of faith and doctrines, will be considered, or enter into the question, or constitute any part of the character, that shall determine the destiny of every man. The systems of moral or religious reform affecting the state of the heart towards God—none of the religious enterprises of the day, or of any age, or to come, that leave this great question out of view, will avail against the eye of Him who sits in judgment on the real character of men.

Men there are and have been of rank high among men as philosophers and religious reformers, who then be found on the left hand of the Judge. They may have given their fortunes to ameliorate the condition of man. They may have evinced much zeal in combating religious error. They may have done much in the cause of religion and humanity. They may even have performed mighty works in the name of God, may have cast out demons, may have sealed their testimony with blood, who nevertheless shall found not entitled to a place on His right hand. But is it asked, why such characters shall ultimately have no inheritance in the kingdom of God and of his Anointed, the answer to the why may be found in the fact that ambitious men, smitten with the mere love of distinction amongst men, can as well indulge their native vanity and pride in these ways, as other men who seek the gratification of the same passions in the acquisition of worldly renown from riches, statesmanship, or military honors. Self-gratulation in the acquisition of the adulation of the multitude, constitutes them all alike idolators—elf-worshippers.

No man can have a just regard for the fellow-man who perceives not his true moral and spiritual relations to God and his fellow-men. But understanding these, he can do much in the cause of God and humanity. The cause of God is, indeed, the cause of humanity. For He so loved the world, dead in sin, that He gave his only begotten Son, that whoever believes on him may not perish, but have eternal life." The intelligent and true believer has perceived this Divine love, and feels it beating on his heart, and evinces it to be a great reality by the fruits which it bears, prominent amongst which are the acts of piety and humanity that speak a heart filled with love to God and man. Such an one sees in every other man an object of the same Divine compassionate love. And for the reason that he was loved, he perceives that all men are loved; therefore he loves all men. But as he loves the character of the Saviour above all others, he especially loves those who resemble him in character. And while a most benevolent feeling pervades his heart, and actuates him towards all men, he loves with complacency those who most resemble Him whom he most loves. What pleasure, then, must such an one enjoy in works of humanity. Especially great must that pleasure be which is derived from ministering to the necessities of those who bear the moral image of One whom we love supremely.

And here, may we not see, is the culminating point in evidence of our discipleship. No mere nominal disciple ever affords such evidence. No lover of the world ever attempted it. For where no moral beauty is seen, there can be no admiration nor delight in beholding the picture. Hence the Saviour, when he assumes the official character of a judge, and gives the evidence upon which alone a just decision can be made, omits whatever men might conceive to be of an equivocal character. Hence the infallibility of the test for determining the genuine character which he has given us.

The ground of our final acceptance is thus stated by the Judge. To those on his right hand he says, "Come you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world; for I was hungry and you fed me: I was thirsty and you gave me drink: I was a stranger and you took me in: naked and you clothed me: I was sick and you visited me: I was in prison and you came to me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee hungry and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And He shall answer, and say to them, Verily, I say to you, inasmuch as you did it to one of the least of these, my brethren, you have done it to me."

Alas, for the present Christian profession, if this indeed be the true test of Christian character! Piety and humanity, evincive of love to Christ is, it would seem, the only test that can stand the scrutiny of the Judge, or the ordeal of that day. If such be not the fruit of our faith, the hope built upon it is all a delusion, and the testimony upon which it rests will be our final condemnation. The Founder of the Faith always intended that these fruits of it shall characterize his people in all the ages of time, and that nothing else, or less, shall be the ground of final acceptance. If, therefore, our forms of faith and doctrine, and church governments, and church doctrines, and ethics, and family worship, and private devotion, or any other religious service, rendered by way of afflicting our souls—if they yield not the fruits of piety and humanity, from love to our adorable Redeemer, it is all Pharisaism, self-deception, an awful mistake, incorrigible.

THE MANIFESTATIONS OF GOD.—No. II.

3. THE next divine manifestation recorded, occurs on the arrival of Abram in Canaan from Haran. It is thus briefly narrated:—"And YAHVEH appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land: and there builded he an altar unto YAHVEH, who appeared unto him" (Gen. xii. 7.) Abram had but newly arrived in the land of which God had said, "I will shew it thee." "The Canaanite was then in the land." Hence the patriarch may be regarded as, at the time, weary with his pilgrimage, a stranger in a strange country. Whether he knew what were the Almighty's designs in bringing him to this foreign clime, we cannot tell. However that might be, how seasonable, that as soon as Abram has completed his journey, God should appear to him. The same God who commanded his obedience in Haran, accepts it in Canaan. Surrounded by the alien and degenerate sons of Ham, who probably viewed him with suspicion, how refreshing to meet with One to sympathize with him, One in whom he could confide, and He the possessor and disposer of the whole earth! Such were the circumstances in which "the Coming One" came to the Mesopotamian sojourner. He had already "become" to Abram a gracious, promising God, announcing that he should be a great nation, and that all the families of the earth should be blessed in him. He now "becomes" mindful of the severe test to which he has put his servant's faith, and "comes" forth to the vision of the patriarch with a further specific promise, expressly suited to his circumstances: "Unto thy seed will I give this land." So affected is the man of God with the divine regard thus exhibited, that forthwith he erects an altar to YAHVEH, on which to give expression to his thankfulness, and at the same time testify his unworthiness to live thus to enjoy the divine favor. Let the reader observe how careful the historian is, to connect the building of the altar with the appearance of YAHVEH. "YAHVEH appeared to Abram—Abram built an altar—an altar to YAHVEH—to YAHVEH who appeared to him!" Such fulness in so brief a record is of the utmost force. "Who appeared to him," if we would avoid charging the writer with unmeaning tautology, be taken as equivalent to "when—because he appeared; and memorial of that instance of God's gracious and memorable condescension."

Before commenting on the next instance of divine manifestation, we call attention, in passing, to the peculiar phraseology of chap. xv. 1: "these things the word of YAHVEH came unto Abram in a vision, saying, The peculiarity is, that the word YAHVEH should be said to have come in a vision! A spoken word is visible, and, strictly speaking, cannot come in a vision. A speaker, created or uncreated, may come in a vision, and scenic representations like those of the Prophets and in the Apocalypse may be presented to human vision, but such language seems unsuited to simple oral communication. Can we record before us be legitimately supposed to intend the personal Word? "was in the beginning with God." To his coming the intimation wholly appropriate; and ancient Jewish tradition might be quoted in support of such an idea, seeing that Gen. iii. 8 the Targums unanimously render, "And they heard the voice of the Word of the Lord God walking in the garden;" and that of Jerusalem goes on with the next verse, accordingly, "And the Word of the Lord called unto Adam." Declining to any conjecture, whether Jewish or Christian, we content ourselves with having called attention to the remarkable style of this verse, and simply affirm respecting it, that it is the obvious course to suppose, that when Abram heard the words preserved in the record, his eye was greeted with some manifestation of the presence of the Divine Speaker.

4. We now advance to a most interesting manifestation of God granted Hagar, narrated in chapter 16. Afflicting her bondmaid, the latter fled from her face, and is found by the Angel of YAHVEH* "by a fountain of water in the wilderness." "And he said unto Hagar, Sarai's maid, whence comest thou? and whither wilt thou go?"

* Or "Angel YAHVEH," malak y being susceptible of either rendering.

she said, I flee from the face of my mistress Sarai. And the Angel of Yahveh said unto her, Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands. And the Angel of Yahveh said unto her, I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude." With astonishment we hear the angel say, "I will do it!" What angel can this be? "And the Angel of YAHVEH said, Behold thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael (God will hear); because Yahveh hath heard thy affliction. And he will be a wild man; his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren." "And she called the name of YAHVEH that spake unto her"—"of Yahveh that spake unto her!" Was it then Yahveh who had been speaking to Hagar? Does the Messenger of YAHVEH bear the name YAHVEH? Even so: just as in the New Testament the Son of God bears the name God. Hence this Messenger must be distinguished from all created messengers, celestial and terrestrial. "She called the name of YAHVEH that spake unto her, THOU GOD OF VISION: * for she said, Do I, indeed, here see (i.e. live) after the vision?† Wherefore the well has called, THE WELL OF THE LIVING VISION." Surely this narrative is radiant with divine beauty! To whom is this vision granted? To Hagar, the Egyptian bondmaid. She is a daughter of Ham—an alien from the chosen family—not in the line of the promised seed. Yet it is to her that Malak YAHVEH comes as an angel of light, mercy, peace, condescension. And what were Hagar's present circumstances? Alas! the most distressing conceivable. The poor woman expected soon the pains of child-birth, and here she was an outcast in the wilderness. Provoked by her own ill-conduct, Sarai had been so afflicting her, that she had fled from her face. And Abram had acquiesced. Oh! accumulation of distresses. Whither should she go? What would become of her? This is the precise juncture selected by YAHVEH for his manifestation to the bondmaid. And how does he appear? In surroundings of terror, uttering words of severity? On the contrary, he stoops to the humble rank and distressed condition of this Egyptian female, and in lowliest love inquires, sympathizes, counsels, promises, reassures. That Hagar returned is evident. Abram heard the story, accepted this solution of the difficulty, and memorialized the kind interference of his covenant God. "And Hagar bare Abram a son; and ABRAM called his son's name, which Hagar bare, Ishmael." Yet, comforting as was this vision of God to Hagar, it was such as fully to impress her with the majesty of the divine presence. While she realized in the Angel The Coming One, she was conscious that this Coming One was God: "Thou God of vision."—"Thou mighty One, to be dreaded in the greatness of thy power and majesty, the Creator of the heavens and the earth, ruling and controlling all things as thou wilt, hast thou then thyself appeared in vision to thy handmaid; and do I yet live? How great is thy kindness towards me! Henceforth my soul shall remember thee, not as the God of power or majesty—but as the God of vision."

We cannot dismiss this beautiful, descriptive name of Deity, without remarking that it seems to carry the Christian mind onward to the Incarnation itself. It is one of the superlatively grand facts announced in the Glad-tidings, that God has been seen on earth by sinful men; seen, traversing the hills and vales of Judea, stilling the tempest, walking the sea, multiplying bread, healing the sick, raising the dead, preaching the glad tidings of pardon to the guilty; and thus giving forth an impression of the depth and sincerity of his love, which else would have remained incommunicable. Those who gazed on God manifest in flesh, did not perish through the sight. Perish! nay, the sight, when viewed with believing eyes, was life-giving. Hence the herald cried aloud, Behold the Lamb of God! And we, too, as we look and live a diviner life, exclaim with wonder and Septuagint renders it angelos kuriou—"angel of the Lord;" and Stephen (Acts vii. 32) so quotes the expression from Exodus. We are not sure that this settles the question, nor do we imagine its settlement of any practical importance.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

THAT Alexandrina Victoria should ever have ascended the English throne, is, perhaps, the only remarkable event in her life. George III. left five sons, the elder, of course, the heir; the others, in all likelihood, for ever debarred from the accession. The heir, the Prince of Wales, reigned as George the IV. and died childless; the second son, the Duke of York, died without reigning, and likewise childless; the third son, the Duke of Clarence, reigned as William IV. and died childless; the fourth son, Edward, Duke of Kent, died without reigning, but left one child, a daughter; and to her, thus remote from her inheritance, descended the patrimony of the Houses of Hanover and Brunswick.

When Victoria was six years old, her mother appointed the Rev. George Davys her preceptor; and his fidelity and zeal proved the wisdom of her choice. The Baroness Lehzen was associated with him as instructress. Up to her eleventh year the Princess was totally unaware of her claims upon the succession, or of any possible concatenation of events by which her condition in life would be materially changed. In 1827 the Duke of York died, and in 1830 King George followed him. The accession of King William, whose two daughters were already dead, placed her next the throne. Her education was now what would best fit her to wear the crown. Without overtaking her mental and physical energies, her instructors supplied her with every species of knowledge by which a Queen might profit. They read together the numerous treatises which had been written—for the most part in the continental languages—upon the education of a Princess.

She was familiar with the lives and actions of all who had conferred honor on the human race, whether as sovereigns, statesmen, scholars, inventors, discoverers, benefactors, poets, or divines. While yet in her teens, she spoke English, French, and German, with equal fluency—she read Italian, and translated Virgil and Horace—she was a proficient in mathematics, and showed a decided talent in all branches connected with the science of numbers. Accomplishments were not neglected. The Princess danced, sang, and sketched from nature. She laid aside a portion of her pocket-money to aid in disguising the indebtedness of her father. A sound religious training lay at the base of the fabric thus reared, and Victoria was made to realize, that as she was to reign over a nation professing Christianity, she must prove, by her private conduct, and in her domestic life, her right to the glorious title of Defender of the Faith.

On the 17th day of July, Victoria made her first public appearance as sovereign of the nation. She pronounced Parliament in person, addressing members of the two chambers from the throne in the House of Lords. Her palor betrayed her emotion, but her manner was calm and composed, her bearing at once child-like and majestic. Her voice was distinct, though tremulous. It was a proud day for Great Britain—the people unreservedly gave away their hearts, and became the first at once of love at first sight. And she has never regretted the spontaneous precipitate act.

Victoria I. was crowned in Westminster Abbey, on the 28th of June. The venerable pile was dressed with unusually unprecedented splendor. Her nation in Christendom, and several of its pale, had sent their representatives, and the maiden Queen was "separated"—to use the solemn continental expression—in the midst of the imposing and gorgeous assembly, which any country had witnessed, either in Westminster Abbey, Notre Dame de Paris, or the Kremlin of Moscow. Victoria knelt and devoutly implored the Divine guidance for herself, and a blessing for her people. From that time forward she has discharged with exemplary fidelity, every duty which has devolved upon her as Queen, and sought to enlarge the sphere of her duties as a woman, that by charging those also, she might offer a model to the mothers, wives, and sisters of her subjects. She felt how imperatively needed was an example of strict virtue on the British throne.—Goodrich.

LETTER FROM A. CAMPBELL TO THE "AMERICAN HARBINGER"

NEW ORLEANS, May 10, 1859.

BRO. JAMES A. CAMPBELL. — My Dear Sir: Your favor of April 29 was duly received at Jackson, Mississippi, a few days since, from which we were much gratified to learn that you all at Bethany were in the enjoyment of your usual good health, and that all things were moving on in their wonted channels, both in the church and in the college. We, too, have been on the wing, pregrinating portions of Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and are now in Louisiana, whence we are about to proceed to Columbus, in Mississippi. Thence we intend to direct our course homeward.

We have delivered many discourses on the great themes of the Christian Scriptures, not forgetting the claims of Bethany College. For, indeed, Christianity and Christian education are kindred themes, and inseparably connected and coöperative in the full development of each other.

In the Universities of Great Britain, at least in my Alma Mater, the studies of the Greek and Roman tongues were called "humanity"—and those classes were not unfrequently called "Humanity classes." Poets say:—

"Tongues and sciences happily combined, Softened the rude, and calm the boisterous mind."

Education, as contemplated by a Christian philosopher has, at least, and at most, four distinct departments. These are the literary, the scientific, the moral, and the religious. These constitute its four cardinal points. We have arranged them in this location in their proper order. They are severally and essentially distinct from one another. And yet they may be found from boyhood to manhood simultaneously conducted and prosecuted.

In this order we are rationally and scientifically compelled to contemplate the great elements and themes of human education. The religious element, we are sorry to say, while admitted by Christians of every creed as all-essential—transcendently important, is the least understood, the most mismanaged, and the most neglected by all. The reason most obvious is, that not a tithe of the so-called teachers were, in the proper sense of the word, themselves educated. The stream cannot rise above its own fountain. Learned men are comparatively few; but educated men are still fewer.

I sometimes hear men saying to their pupils—"I will learn you a lesson." I would travel a hundred miles on foot to hear one of these pedagogues "learning his pupil" a lesson! It would be a full-orbed miracle. The Great Teacher himself never learned one of his pupils, or disciples, a single lesson. Pupils learn, and teachers teach! "Jesus taught his disciples." He merely taught them. They themselves learned. This only by the way.

But the Great Teacher himself never propounded a theory. The word Christianity is not once found in any Holy Writ. It is a speculative, or, as we now use the word—a philosophical term, incompatible with the diction of the Holy Spirit. No inspired man did ever propound one speculative view. Hence, the absence of the term Christianity in the inspired diction, of which we now have so many theories. We might as rationally expect to meet with the terms Calvinism, Arminianism, Trinitarianism, Unitarianism, or Sabellianism, in the inspired Scriptures, as the word Christianity. Such terms are the mere monuments of obsolete philosophies.

Was any man ever healed of any malady by admitting a theory of his own malady? Doctors study theories of diseases, and sometimes teach them; but patients are healed by taking medicines congenial to their case and their constitution, and not by assenting to any orthodox theory of their disease, or of the modus medendi—or the manner of treating it.

Now, as the Great Physician alone understood the true theory of sin and its cure, he alone could prescribe for it, and he alone has rationally and wisely prescribed for it.

He has given us no theory to propose to saint or sinner. He has given to us in person, and by the Holy Spirit in matters of fact — palpable, demonstrable, and divine, the whole necessities and comforts of spiritual and eternal life.

These, too, are presented and adapted to the reason, the conscience, and the heart of man; and so demonstrate themselves by their fruits and effects, in every form and condition of humanity, to be worthy of God and of the universal acceptance of man, all potent to renovate and beautify all who cordially embrace it.

Philosophy or theory, according to Paul, "puffeth up, but love buildeth up." Faith, too, has to deal with facts and realities, with positive precepts and veritable oracles of God, and with no theory whatsoever.

One veritable fact, moreover, if it be a veritable one, is worth more in all matters of human interest, than the most plausible idea or imagination ever uttered concerning it. Such is the experience of all mankind, and therefore, it needs no proof. "He that believes and is baptized shall be saved," is an oracle of Jesus Christ; and "he that believes not shall be condemned," is another oracle of Jesus Christ, and just as true as the former. But the belief of this last oracle never gave one pleasing emotion to any one in a state of unbelief and consequent alienation from God. While the former rejoices with joy unspeakable in his faith and hope in God, the latter is crushed in spirit, cheerless, and foreboding endless misery and woe.

It is not believing, but that which is believed, that produces joy or sorrow, hope or despair. The power of faith is, therefore, in its object — in that which is believed, and not at all in the act of believing.

How much darkness, doubt, and bewilderment, in the absence of a clear appreciation and of a positive assurance of faith in the sublime, glorious, and blissful objects presented to us in the stupendous developments of the love of God, of the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and of the sanctifying and consoling influence of the Holy Spirit, which, when seen in their own true and proper light, and fully appreciated, give us "a joy unspeakable and full of glory."

There is nothing in the whole of thought, or vision, or imagination that can meet and satisfy the craving of humanity, but the well-attested of the Gospel of Christ; and there it is truly said to be "the power of unto salvation to every one that believes," and entertains it in his heart.

And what should or could produce man, did he gain the whole world, lose himself? And why substitute the Gospel any theory, speculation, imagination of man? What has paganism, Mahometanism, Scepticism, Atheism, or Deism achieved for man? They have, in fact, done nothing. They delude, they bewilder, they destroy.

And why should not all sects and discords, and their alienations be sacrificed and consumed on the altar of the Lord, one faith, one baptism, one Lord, one spirit, one hope, one God and Father of all, who is above all, through all, and in you all?"

It is never said in any passage of Holy Writ, on the subject of union or communion amongst Christians, there is but one opinion, or one truth, or one orthodoxy. Opinions, theories, speculations, orthodoxies, are not named in Holy Writ, in Old Testament or New, as a bond of union or a basis of communion. And, in all religion, faith, and conscience, why substitute any one of these, or all of them together, for any one of the seven promises which the Holy Spirit, under the sanction of the Lord Jesus, has propounded, sanctioned, and sealed by the Lord and Apostle to the Gentiles.

MOBILE, ALABAMA, May 11, 1858.

P.S. The great amount of rain that has fallen in the Valley of the Mississippi, covering very many plantations, has operated considerably against our journeyings, and against our success in raising funds for the rebuilding and replenishing Bethany College. The Mississippi has been, in its overflow, reported in the newspapers, in many places, over forty miles wide. Immense damages have accrued to our planters in the loss of fences, live stock, and in deposits of sand, injurious to the soil and to the prospective crops. It will, meanwhile, be a considerable entrenchment upon their liberality, though we have succeeded better than we could have anticipated under the circumstances; and, in some cases, much more liberality has been shown than we could or did expect, and we have yet many promises which we expect to realize within a year or two.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY AND BIBLE UNION.

THE Saviour designed that the renovation of humanity should be accomplished by "his body," and he committed the entire work to that divine fabric. The congregations which were to make up that body, were composed of members which were called branches, the Christ himself being the vine; and upon these congregations, as a unit, cemented in perfect oneness, was placed the responsibility of "converting the world," by which the earth was to be rid of sin. Everything was to be done by the body, under the direction of the Head, so that the entire work should redound to the Christ, through the fidelity of the body. As soon as the fatal work of sectioning began, all this glory departed, and while division prospered in its wickedness, the human mind necessarily lost the vitalities of revealed truths, those truths ceased to pierce the understanding, and men began to grope in that darkness which they called light. Divine truth is so pure, so ethereal, so perfectly sui generis, that it will not mingle with humanisms; hence, the absolute necessity that every mortal is under is, to abide alone in God's truth. There is a test, an experimentum crucis, indeed, by which any one may determine the difference between divine productions and the devices of humanity. All the parts and parcels of divine organisms dove-tail into each other in perfect homogeneity; all the parts run for ever in parallel lines, and can never clash. The mind that may study the teaching of Jesus the Christ, His parables, His miracles, His precepts, His example, and the utterances of the Holy Spirit through the Apostles, with a view to ascertain whether there is a perfect harmony and unity of all the parts, and an utter absence of all inconsistency, will be rewarded with masses of the richest fruits that were ever garnered in the understanding or in the reason. We know of no other method of measuring the mind of the Holy Spirit that is at once so edifying as this. To start with a proper appreciation of its immeasurable value, let any one endeavour to manufacture the record of a miracle or a parable that shall harmonize as perfectly with all revealed truth as each miracle and parable of the New Covenant does, and he will discover that he has undertaken a labour that is beyond the utmost powers of humanity. All the boasted intellect of man, even with the models of the miracles and parables of the New Institution to work by, cannot accomplish what we have proposed. The work of man must partake of his nature. The organisms of man always betray their origin. They are imperfect, as a matter of necessity, because a stream cannot rise higher than its fountain. Hence, in all the schemes that men have devised for carrying on God's work, or that they may devise, we easily find inherent evils, clashings and inconsistencies that form no part of Divine plans. God has declared that "His ways are not man's ways, nor are His thoughts as man's thoughts," and reason says at once that this is an essential truth. If a man could have devised anything for his spiritual welfare, he could as easily have devised all that was essential to it. Hence, there could have been no necessity for any Divine interference, if man himself had been equal to any part of the renovating forces.

God's plan for redeeming the world, for renovating all humanity, for promoting and prospering the universal salvation of the whole human family—for Divine love has never indicated a desire that any ONE member of the human family should be lost—is through the perfect oneness of all the members of the body of Christ. Nor is there any other device for this grand and glorious result. God abundantly furnished the means for the removal of every particle of wickedness from the earth, and the united apostles and saints, all being as ONE, were rapidly developing; the all-conquering power of this device, when division and sectionizing schism stepped in to shew their handy schemes. The divine work was thwarted and arrested by "sectionizing," just as the plans of Yahveh towards the elect race in Canaan were thwarted, arrested, and scattered towards the winds of all the earth, by rebellion against God's ways. That which the Christ of the New Institution gave as the responsibility of his one body, was never given, nor could it possibly be given, to "sections of the visible church." Those "sections" could as easily create a planetary body similar to the Sun, and endow it with the Sun's agencies in the universe, as they could perform any part of the work of the body of Christ. Finite things can only seem to approach the infinite; the reality is ridiculously absurd. Take an example: The united body in the apostolic age destroyed wickedness and worked righteously as a compact unit in Christ—drunkenness, lasciviousness, theft, murder, and all other forms of iniquity were destroyed within the range of that unit. That body formed no temperance societies outside of its own paths of duty, because it was within itself an all-powerful temperance society, such, indeed, as the earth has never seen since party divisions began, such as cannot possibly ever be seen again until all the branches are once more in the vine, until the body of Christ shall again present that unity that was the essential fitting for its work, its whole work. Everything that was appointed for the labors of that party was based upon its unity, and without that its labors are comparatively profitless—they are a show of work without its results. Hence, in exact keeping with what we have said of the test between divine and human organisms, what has the divided, distracted "Church of God," as it is profanely called, what have "the sections of the visible church" done in our day and generation, with the wickedness of drunkenness and its multiple evils to society? In their divided condition they were powerless over public opinion, and vast numbers of their members were deeply involved in portions of the crimes. But "the sections of the visible church," knowing their utter incapacity to accomplish what the Christ had ordained to be accomplished only by his body, and in utter repudiation of their claim to considered his body, did not dare attempt, as the church of Christ promote temperance movements, formed alliances with "worldlings" to order to succeed! Is this the way which Christ was to present to him without spot or wrinkle? Answer "sections of the visible church:" "the utmost altitudes of your 'orthodoxy,' from the loftiest platitude of your 'evangelicalism,' was this prohibition of the power and labor of the body of Christ, in ridding the world of only one of its greatest vices? Apostle, any of the saints taught by the Holy Spirit, would have hung their head at such a deed as this. But 'sections' worshipped this 'golden rule' rapturously for a while, 'but IN TEMPERANCE has triumphed over the traditions of the visible church' and 'unholy alliances,' drunkenness fixed institution, and will remain a curse until all who desire to be members of Christ's body shall be once more a unit.

All the various human organizations of the day for religious purposes, have the same features that we have described as the organism of "the sections" for conquering intemperance. The Tract Societies, the American Temperance Society, and all their various congeners are of the same school. They are of the earth, earthy; they are an amalgam of brass and clay. gross inconsistencies among the several parts of each of these institutions palpably what their origin was, and their labors must be, what their results will be.

These remarks are preliminary to the obsequies of one of these pretended bodies, which undertook to do the work after a pattern of their own manufacture.

In some of the recent debates among the active men of the American Foreign Bible Society, this fact was pronounced: "How can any society expect to prosper that stand upon such inconsistency as marks the action of this society? It proclaims the necessity of having faithful translations of the Holy Scriptures for all people except those who use the English language. This society refuses to make the English version faithful." This was a bold blow, made by one who was not in cal toward the American and Foreign Bible Society. In May, 1836, steps were taken to organize the American and Foreign Bible Society. This organization was made at a convention of numerous delegates from different States in the union. The first article of the constitution of this new society declared that the "single object" was "to promote the wider circulation of the Holy Scriptures, in the most faithful versions that can be procured." This principle was dear to all the members, and was often proclaimed. In 1838 provision was made for the distribution of the Scriptures in the English language, in the commonly received version, until otherwise ordered by the society. Thus the friends of faithful versions served this society until 1850, when the society reversed all the constant expectations of most of its early friends, and repudiated all thought of fidelity in an English version. This conduct drove Drs. Cone and Armitage, Rev. Wm. H. Wyckoff, Deacon Colgate, and others from the society, and inaugurated the American Bible Union. The American and Foreign Bible Society became a bitter and unrelenting persecutor of the American Bible Union, and in its rejoicing strength laughed to scorn the puny efforts of the American Bible Union, as Sanballat scoffed at Nehemiah's wall around Jerusalem. But its hour of retribution has come. It is now regarded by the Baptists as a piece of misplaced furniture, that is neither useful nor ornamental to anything. It had an anniversary meeting a few days since, and Dr. Dowling congratulated it upon its vitality, usefulness, and prospects. But alas! the sword of Damocles was then suspended over its head, and when the Baptist Consolidation Convention met, on the first instant, the sword fell with a telling blow. The movement in that convention, to turn over the decaying remains of the American and Foreign Bible Society to the Baptist Publication Society, was regarded as a death blow. The friends of the society pleaded for its life to be spared. The Rev. Dr. Fish, of Newark, was earnest in trying to save it from going into Coventry, into undignified retirement, but Dr. Fish declared that "the light of the society went out when they said, 'we will not change the version.'"

The Baptist Examiner says that this

American and Foreign Bible Society expended sixteen thousand dollars in collecting eighteen thousand. The Rev. Mr. Taylor, one of the former champions of the society, wished to save it from utter annihilation by squeezing it into the Baptist Publication Society at Philadelphia. Mr. Taylor "cited cases where agents had been sent into new fields, and for $500 collected in one case, only $10.50 were paid into the treasury; in another case $700 were collected, and only $5.75 cents came into the treasury, and so on."

The Rev. Mr. Corey said :

"There is no use of disguising the truth. The American and Foreign Bible Society has ceased to have a mission in this world. When Spencer H. Cone, William Colgate, Thomas Armitage, and Wm. H. Wyckoff, went out from us, they carried away with them the light of this society. Ever since then we have been trying to galvanize life into a dead carcass. We thought to do this in building for it the 'marble palace,' but the glory was not there. Then we thought to do it by means of 'colportage,' but this was the life of another body, and could not be translated into this. Some talk as though we were trying to kill the society. But they mistake the facts. It is already dead, and it is our work to bury the body."

The Rev. Mr. Westcott implored the brethren not to lay rash hands on the society, but he could not save it. As a preliminary to the funeral obsequies, old Father Maclay was elected one of the chief mourners. He has been denouncing the society for years, and now receives an office as pall-bearer to the effete body. Poor old man!

A terrible retribution has overtaken this American and Foreign Bible Society. The past week was a stormy one in the city of New York among the Benevolent Societies. The Baptist Consolidation Convention met on Tuesday, in the Oliver-street Church. Ex-Gov. Briggs presided. About eight hundred delegates were present from the various Northern and Western States. The exciting subject was, "What to do with the American and Foreign Bible Society?" Nearly two days were taken up in the discussion. The Bible Union brethren took no part in the discussion. The persons who, in 1850, put out the light and glory of the society, by stamping it as a "circulating" corporation, and not a body at liberty to "procure and circulate a revised English version," were now ready to bury the institution as a useless concern. Their eyes have been opened. Nine years' warring against the principles and work of the Bible Union have taught them a sorry lesson. Excepting about thirty men, such as Drs. Welsch, Dowling, and Mac-lay, with Rev. Mr. Cromwell, of St. Louis, and Westcott, of New York, and some of the acting Board of Managers, the entire convention, and afterwards the society itself (400 to 30) voted to instruct the board to unite the society with the Baptist Publication Society at Philadelphia, under one board, if practicable.

Nine years ago the American and Foreign Bible Society had death and life set before it. It chose death rather than life. It defied God and man in its attempts to make faithful versions for the Heathen, and to force an unfaithful version on the English race. It drove forth from its midst a feeble band of faithful praying men, and it scorned and reviled them. It was then in the zenith of its glory. There seemed to be no end to its dominion. It had possessed a noble name and a glorious history. Its receipts were large and its work was extending. The Bible Union was weak, was scoffed at and despised. Judson had said: "The attempt to make a faithful version will raise a storm of bitter persecution at the beginning, but truth is mighty and will prevail." The American and Foreign Bible Society took special delight in showing that Judson was a true prophet, as to the first part of the prediction; the American Bible Union has "bided its time," and is now enjoying the fulfilment of the second part of Judson's prediction. The American and Foreign Bible Society has been steadily going down, losing its friends, cutting itself loose from public confidence, diminishing its resources, and now, some eight hundred delegates from the Baptist denomination in the Northern and Western States to the Baptist Consolidation Convention, the great mass, with four hundred members, vote for laying the effete concern quietly away, where it may cease from troubling.

And what is now the condition of the American Bible Union? The life and light which became its own by the suicidal act of the American and Foreign Bible Society, in the year 1847, have given to it an amazing strength. In these nine years it has touched and passed the highest point of the social prosperity of the old society in its brightest days, in its career of two and three years. It has gathered to its friends in every clime. The earth rejoices that such a society exists. To-day, it has thousands of hearts turned for it—thousands of as pure men and women as this earth has ever known—and tens and hundreds of thousands ready to respond to every need for help. Its final revisers are working throughout the world as men whose learning is unchallenged. Error turns pale as they see the union marching steadily on the path of its destiny. And well they may. Its friends sometimes impatient at its apparent slow progress. But behold what a mountain of prejudice it has overcome! See what respect it has gained! How the very opposition to it has turned to its advantage! Has it not more than could have been anticipated? If the treasure is perfected by God, may we not hope rejoicingly and patiently?

God moves usually slowly but surely in the great purpose of his love. We may rightly infer, we think, a grander result from the labours of the Bible Union, in what at first might seem to be slowness in working out its purposes, its beneficent objects, its mission, of all others, the highest known now to the earth. God keep it humble and faithful to the end, in daily prayer to the Almighty Father.

Behold the unerring finger of Divine Providence: one of these societies is a humanism, a mere machine of iron, as shown in its gross inconsistencies, pleading for faithful versions of the Word of God for all other people of the English race, and in upholding an unfaithful version for that race, in steadily determining that, as it could prevent it, that race should have no other. The Spirit of God has "operated" in any such work as this.

The other society declared its determination to do all in its power to translate, as perfectly as the highest and most honest learning could do, the ideas that God delivered in Hebrew and Greek words, into all the verlars of the earth. Against this there is no law. It is in exact conformity to the thought involved in the declaration of Paul, that the Holy Spirit selected the words in which the revelations of God were made. The Bible Union, therefore, is not a humanism ; it rests exclusively on Divine favour, and God has blessed it. His blessings are sure for it, as long as it is faithful to Him.

A HEBREW CHRISTIAN'S ADDRESS

TO HIS COUNTRYMEN AT A CONVENTION OF CONVERTED JEWS.

MY dear brethren and friends of the house of Israel :—Longer than sixteen hundred years ago, the history of the New Covenant makes no mention of a Jewish Christian congregation or brotherhood, although the same history tells us of a great number of pious, faithful, and strong defenders, nay, even martyrs for the sake of their Messiah, Jesus of Nazareth, who were of our nation, Jews indeed.

It would take too much time, and be beyond our ability, to name or count all those Jews who are mentioned in sacred history, and written in the book of life ; I may only, therefore, make the following few remarks, to encourage your heart, and to elevate your joy in the Lord we profess.

About the year of our Messiah 130, a certain man named Markus, was elected as Bishop of Aelia. (This was the name of the renewed city of Jerusalem under the reign of the Emperor Hadrian.) "That Markus," says Eusebius of Cæsara, "was the first Bishop of Gentile birth ; his fifteen predecessors were all of the Hebrew race, resided at Jerusalem, and kept the knowledge of Christ pure and unadulterated ; they preached the gospel of the kingdom of God, as Jesus Messiah himself and his Apostles preached it ; because," continues the same author, "the whole church of believers were faithful Hebrews, from the time of the Apostles until the war with Severus, under the reign of Adrian." The names of those fifteen Overseers or Bishops were—Jawhus, Simeon, Justus, Zachaus, Tobia, Benjamin, John, Mathai, Philippi, Seneca, Justus the Second, Levy, Ephorus, Joseph, Juda. Yet in the course of their time the gospel was passed over to the Gentiles ; and in the same measure as the church of the Messiah increased by accession from the Gentiles, the Jewish Christian stepped more and more backward, until they receded entirely from view. Only a few of Jehovah's ancient people of the covenant shone like the glittering stars in the history of the church of our Messiah, Jesus the King of Israel.

When the abomination of the Popes of Rome overspread the world, darkened the light of the gospel, and pushed aside the pure doctrines of the Messiah, the single stars of Judah's race disappeared from the so-called Christian heaven—a thick veil was thrown over our people ; for what honest and intelligent Jews could be persuaded to em race that cruel idolatry for the holy religion of the Messiah ? Only here and there a few unhappy Jews, who, either to save their lives or their property, professed, seemingly, and did homage to the false god of Rome. Of course those unhappy men did all they could to make the world forget that they were Jews—that they belonged to the people, once the beloved first-born of Jehovah, but now delivered up for a shame and scorn of all nations upon the earth, because of their unbelief. They were ashamed of the name of Israelite—the most glorious name ever a nation bore. Since the time of the Lutheran Reformation, some bright sparks out of Israel again glittered here and there, and left beneficent and blissful traces behind them. But in the current century, and especially in the last twenty years, a new life has begun more particularly to move the dead and dry bones of our people ; and almost as in the days of old, a great many have become believers that the Lord Jesus is the promised Messiah, the King of the Jews ; amongst whom the considerable number of highly learned and respectable men, who, by their piety and true Christian conduct, receive the esteem of their fellow men.* But yet more, the national ambition of Israel was awakened in those who acknowledged Jesus the Nazarene as their Messiah. They were not ashamed to be called Jews. On the contrary, they became convinced that they have it to boast of, and that it is a great honor to be a real Jew. I hope, my dear Jewish brethren and sisters, that you all who are present participate with me in rejoicing that we are Jews, because one of our ancestors, the Apostle Paul, boasted of and felt very glad that he was a Jew. He says to the Gentiles, when he speaks to the Jew—“To whom pertain the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises.” Yet more: “Whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever.”

* Some of those men who are considered true disciples of Jesus the Messiah, in our time, were mentioned as follows :—Professor Neander, (the author of the well-known Church History,) Professor Stahl, Dr.

Salvation cometh only of the Jews. Already the mightiest and most intelligent nations verbally acknowledge Jesus the Messiah of Israel as Lord, who will soon appear again on earth in power and great glory, to judge and rule over all, in justice and in righteousness. And this, my beloved brethren, is our hope, that the same Jesus who died on the cross for our sins, and arose from the dead for our justification, and ascended to the right hand of the Majesty of heaven, will descend again upon the earth, to renew the fallen tabernacle, the overturned throne of his father David, to reign in the midst of his again gathered, again favoured people, Israel, in Jerusalem, the capital of that land of which we Jews are the legitimate heirs, according to God's own promises; for thus saith the Lord by the mouth of his servant Isaiah: “For a small moment have I forsaken thee; Biesenthal, and the publisher, Mr. Low, in Berlin. (There are a great many more distinguished Jewish Christians in that city.) Dr. Cappadosa and his brother, Dr. Da Costa and the Rev. Mr. Swartz in Amsterdam. Israel A. Saphir and Joachim Tauber in Pesth, Hungary. Mr. Elvin and the brothers Korbner in Hamburg. Mr. Hausmeister in Strasburg. The Rev. Drs. Ewald, Stern, and many others in London; and finally, who knows not the name of Herrshell, that unwearied laborer for Israel; and last of all, I mention a man who recently made the good confession, that Jesus of Nazareth is the anointed King of the Jews, Dr. Israel Pick, one of the Rabbis of Lemberg.

but with great mercies will I gather thee. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith Jehovah, thy Redeemer.

That hope of Israel has been preached by our blessed Messiah himself, as by all his Apostles, and for the sake of that hope Paul was summoned before the judgment-seat of Cæsar. It is true that the most important part of the Gospel of Jesus Christ—the glad tidings of the restoration of Israel as a nation in Palestine, under the personal government of their king, Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of David—has been long forgotten entirely. Our Gentile friends, in spiritualizing the Word of God, have deprived Israel of their hope, and interpreted all those precious promises, exclusively to Israel, for a spiritual Israel. They have fitted all to the “church,” though it accords with the testimony no better than “the fist to the eye”—(a proverb in German, signifying the unfitnes of a thing, so when an interpretation is unsuitable and far-fetched, they say, “It looks better than a fist upon the eye.”) notwithstanding the already mentioned circumstances, and also, that until every time there is a great multitude of pious ministers and doctors who continually spiritualizing away the inheritance of Jacob, and evaporating the hope of Israel, we—we Jews—who have the grace of God, have become the heirs with the Lord Jesus, we know that all the promises of God are yea and amen. The God of Israel is faithful, and will carry out his purpose in due time.

My dear brethren, glorious things are in store for us who are of Israel, but we would have a share in Israel's kingdom—if we would be partakers of Christ, our king—we must then view in the light of the gospel—we must believe what Moses and the Prophets, Jesus and his Apostles taught, and must also do according to the commandments of Jesus: we must be obedient to our glorious King, and we must shew to the world the fruits of our faith—kindness, benevolence, and meekness towards every man, and truth, sincerity and faithfulness in all our doings. the sweetest and most costly fruit of faith is love—loving-kindness towards all, especially to the brethren. Th fore, brethren, let us make a covenant—let us constitute a brotherhood in the name of our Messiah—let us not stand separate in the world, pining away amongst the nations, as if we had not one father Abraham; as if we had not one and the same hope. Let us encourage one another, if we err from the right way, and help and assist one another, if we are in want and distress. When we do this, then the names of Judah and Israel will again be exalted to that high degree, so admirably illustrated by the Christian worthies of our nation, cotemporary with the time of the first appearing of our glorified Messiah and King. Be not afraid, be not ashamed, my dear Jewish brethren, if the world calleth us “proselytes.” It is not true. We are not proselytes; but all those of the Gentiles who profess Jesus, our King, as their Lord, they are the proselytes—wild branches grafted into the olive tree of Israel; they do not bear us, we bear them; numerous, and rich, and mighty as they be; and few, poor, and unnoticed as we are. We know that there was a time when the Apostle Peter must be instructed by a vision from heaven, before he dared to receive a pious Gentile family, a Cornelius and his house, into the church of the Messiah, and that, only with that revealed purpose of God could Peter make his defence successfully before the congregation at Jerusalem. But, my dear friends, you must not misunderstand me, as if I would imply that we have any prerogative over and above our adopted brethren of the Gentiles. No, by no means. All they who become true Israelites by adoption, are the children of Abraham like ourselves; because, before God, there is no respect of persons—there is no difference between Jew and Greek, slave or free: all are equally guilty, and can only be saved upon the same terms—by Jesus of Nazareth, the Messiah. Yet this I would say, that there are testimonies in the Word of God, speaking of promises in particular to Israel, literal Israel, consisting of flesh and blood, not of gas and vapour, that must be also fulfilled in the literal, and not in the spiritual Israel.

In meeting the objections that have been made to our enterprise, of organizing a “Jewish Christian Brotherhood,” as if we were tending to form a new sect, I would like not to be misunderstood. I would tell you in few words, that we have nothing to do with any ism or ist in the world. No matter to what “visible church” any of us may belong, none of us must lose sight of our common hope, our common Messiah and King, who is, or rather should be, the chief-corner-stone of all churches, our all in all. Let none of us forget that we are not baptized in the name of Luther, or Calvin, or John Wesley, or into any other name under heaven, but into the name of Jesus; and before that glorious name, all others must stand in the shadow of midnight, as highly as we may esteem them.

My dear brethren, I repeat it once more, the object of our association is for nothing else than to encourage, to exhort, to comfort, and to help one another; to forbear with, and to forgive one another; or, in one word, to love one another.

And now, my dearly beloved, let me conclude with the last words of the Prophet Micah:—“Who is a God like unto thee? That pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgressions of the remnant of his heritage? He retaineth not his anger for ever, because he delighteth in mercy. He will turn again; He will have compassion upon us; He will subdue our iniquities; and Thou wilt cast all our sins into the depths of the sea. Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob and the mercy to Abraham, which thou hast sworn unto our fathers from the days of old.”—Israelite Indeed, June, 1859.

“PREPARE TO MEET THY GOD.”

HARK! The Judge of the quick and dead descendeth. Glad in unimaginable glory, he sitteth upon the great white throne. Heaven and earth must now retire, that the King of kings may hold the grand assize. Every angel is summoned—every saint is summoned—the spirits of the just are summoned—the dead, small and great, are summoned—all hell is summoned—heaven, earth, and hell are vacated, and their inhabitants convoked into one general assembly, for God has risen to judge the world. "Prepare to meet thy God, O, house of Israel!" and let the serious inquiry arise in thy heart—

"Shall angel bands convey
Their brother to the bar,
Or devils drag my soul away,
To meet its sentence there?"

"O, house of Israel," this exhortation, to "prepare to meet thy God," is addressed solemnly to thee by God's holy prophet. He calls earnestly for such a scrutinizing analysis of the heart, as will leave no sin discoverable by the eye of Him to whom all things are naked and open. When under the glance of your own eye, you discover so many sinful emotions of soul, so much envy, and hate, and ill-feeling, and earthiness; and so little love for Jesus, so little tenderness, and forbearance, and affection for men, and especially for your brethren; how vile and black must you appear to Him who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the heart! How little real effort is made to prepare to meet the Lord God Omnipotent! How little self-examination in view of the ordeal through which we all expect to pass! How many misspent hours, murdered hours, hours even that have been set apart for the worship of God, are trifled away in gazing about the congregation, thinking of some anticipated pleasure for the next day—criticizing the preacher's voice, manner, or appearance—or in some other way neglecting to prepare to meet that God who may suddenly summon thy soul into His wonderful presence. If the minister drops into the didactic style to teach you the way to heaven, or how to shun tumultuous hell, your mind, instead of laying it to heart, will engage itself merely in marking the clearness of his arrangements, the beauty of his style, or the force of his diction; if he rise to the grandeur of argument for God and for your souls, you will not unfrequently find yourselves all absorbed in the mere logic of it, premises and conclusions as proving, or not proving, some abstraction; while not a prayer is offered up for your own soul, or for your unconverted friend in the next pew, throughout the entire sermon. Again, if your preacher, under a sense of his own responsibility, feeling the worth of a soul that should escape from hell, fly to heaven, grows earnest in the conflict, waxing bolder and bolder for and feels able in the strength of God to go almost to the gates of damnation to preach the gospel of peace, how do you find yourselves merely attracted by the pathos of the speaker, the grandeur of his delivery, or some other trifling side circumstance that hinders a self-felt, solemn preparation to meet God! And when the congregation rises up in reverence, or bow down in humility, to pour out the soul of prayer to Him that liveth for ever and ever, often is God insulted by your assumption of prayer while your heart is far from Him, and only waiting for the performance should be concluded; you might take your seat at once. And do you always sing in the service what you feel to be true, and what with you really is true?

"Jesus, I love thy charming name,
'Tis music in mine ear."

"Yes, thou art precious to my soul,
My transport and my trust."

Blessed is that soul who can feel these words acceptably to God, for he will be prepared to meet Him. It is not sufficient simply to have a particular hatred to Christ, to have a rejection to him, to be willing to die; he should be loved and honored. A "charming name" must be really loved. "If any man love our Lord Jesus Christ, let him be cursed." No forms of worship, no singing, of prayer, of baptism, or of other observances in general, constitute a wedding garment, or fit us for the inheritance of heaven.

Yonder sits the Judge on his throne. Millions desire his blessing, and respectively present their pleas. One says, "Lord, I used to speak of heaven, with the tongues of men and angels." The King replies, "Why no sounding brass nor tinkling cymbal here." Another says, "Lord, I have a gift of prophecy and of knowledge, a mountain-hurling faith." The King answers, "Still, thou hadst no stand on the left hand." Another presents himself without love; he had pious parents, has been a Sunday school scholar, has been baptized, has been a church-goer ever since, has been in the church choir, and has even ed round the bread and wine, and says, "Lord, surely you will take me in!" But the King answers them all, "We can accept no substitute in the place of love and a preparation to meet your God; depart, you trusted in your own righteousness, and not in that of Christ; in your own good works, and not in the atoning sacrifice of Jesus." But unto them that love his name, his communion, and his people, he says, "Come up higher, ye blessed," for "Love is the golden chain that binds

The happy souls above,
And he's an heir of heaven that finds
His bosom glow with love."

DR. D. R. CAMPBELL AND HIS REPLY TO A. CAMPBELL

SOME of our readers are anxious to learn the result of the correspondence between Bro. A. Campbell and Dr. D. R. Campbell, in regard to the proposed discussion. The following article, extracted from the Christian Review of June 7, will afford the necessary information:—

BEING on a tour through Northern Kentucky, I accidentally came across a copy of the Western Recorder of April 6th, in which I read Elder A. Campbell's letter to Dr. Duncan R. Campbell, President of Georgetown College, Ky. followed by a "reply" from the aforesaid Dr. Campbell. I have read the reply with more than ordinary care, because I was anxious to know what obstacle, if any, was standing in the way of the proposed discussion. Not that I expected Dr. Campbell to meet A. Campbell in an oral discussion of the real points at issue between us and the Baptists! I expected nothing of the kind. I believed him to be too intelligent to risk himself in such a discussion with one so much his superior in intellect, learning, talents, and experience. And we know that his brethren did not expect or desire it. One of the most intelligent Baptist ministers in the country, and a great admirer of Dr. Campbell, in conversation with me a few weeks ago about this discussion, remarked, "There will be no discussion. It would be folly for Dr. D. R. Campbell to meet Alexander Campbell in an oral discussion! He has no thought of such a thing."

But while we who had some little acquaintance with Dr. Campbell did not expect that he would ever meet A. Campbell in debate, we had a right to expect him to act the gentleman, the scholar, and the Christian. His position in society, as president of a great denominational college, and minister of the Baptist church, gave us, as we supposed, a guarantee that however he might fail in that argument, he would treat Elder A. Campbell with that Christian courtesy that his age, high standing in the whole civilized world, and unspotted character entitled him.

All Bro. Campbell's communications to him were kind and pleasant, and marked with Christian courtesy. From this consideration also, as well as from the fact that D. R. Campbell is a comparatively young man, we felt assured that nothing coarse, vulgar, or offensive would be uttered by him against the venerable President of Bethany College!

But, alas! the youthful Campbell, being hard pressed, forgetting his own position in society, and what was due from him to talent, learning, age, and moral worth, comes out in this last reply, more in the style of a "pugilist," and self-conceited braggadocio, than a Christian gentleman. It is a sad picture of poor fallen human nature. In view of Dr. Campbell's miserable failure, we might take up David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan: "How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!"

We give below a few samples of his coarse and insulting language, taken from the aforesaid reply, as a mere specimen of the spirit, taste, and manner of D. R. Campbell, which the reader may take as an index to the man.

"Respecting your scholarship, shall I tell you that, through sheer dulness, you have misconceived the point," &c. "With a mental obtuseness equally astonishing, you also misconceive the point in my sacred illustrative example." "As a specimen of your uncandid and unscholarly inconsistency—originating, perhaps, in ignorance," &c. "May it not be hoped that you will soon abandon your shallow pretensions to accuracy and scholarship, and curb your foul tongue within the limits of decency," &c. "You are already whipped; and all men who have watched the progress of the correspondence believe it, except such as may yet believe that you are the first scholar in America."

How classic! What a beautiful manifestation of the Christian spirit! How well adapted is D. R. Campbell to be at the head of a college with a theological department! How profound must be his learning! And what may we not expect from the hopeful young men under his care, when they go forth into the world as Baptist preachers? B. F. Taylor, we suppose, may be taken as a sample, a sort of "first fruits," an earnest of the future crop!

Alexander Campbell dull, stupid, obtuse, ignorant! Well, that will do. The man whom the great Henry Clay pronounced the "greatest theologian of this or any other age," is here denounced by this stripling as dull, obtuse, ignorant!

But D. R. Campbell, in the vanity of his mind, says to A. Campbell, "You are already a light." This expression, we suppose, may be taken as characteristic of the man! It is the language of the bully, and belongs to the "ring."

But the most unkind part of his reply is a cowardly insinuation that his labours in the Bible Union cause have proved a failure, and that his work has been rejected by the judges in the case. We say cowardly, because he does not come out like a man, and say in plain words what he attempts to do by insinuation. But we can put no other construction upon his language, and we know that the Baptists understand him as we do; and they are taking the license from what he has said, to report everywhere that A. Campbell's revision of the Acts of the Apostles has been rejected by the final committee! The following is a part of his insinuation upon the subject:

"In view of your charlatanism, your empiricism, I no longer wonder at the humiliating ordeal you have been made to pass within the last few years. Your vain assumptions and pretensions to a scholarship which you were not to possess, occasioned the rejection. That was a sad day for your pride, when your work came in comparison with that of true scholars, and the hands of competent judges."

Now, so far as we know, if A. Campbell did revise the Acts of the Apostles, it has been treated just as all other manuscripts received by the Committee on Volumes, and published, just as the works of Drs. Conant, Lilly, and others. The final committee have not yet pronounced upon any of them, and therefore no insinuation, if we understand the matter, of sheer misrepresentation of the facts.

It was not our intention to reply, or to answer any part of the paper, but simply to express the universal feeling of the Christian brotherhood, so far as we have heard it expressed, and many intelligent gentlemen who are members of no church, and some who are members of the different denominations, have expressed their feelings.

Bro. A. Campbell will take notice of this document as he may think it deserves, if, indeed, it deserves notice. And we think, from the evidence before us, we all see, and that we all see, the utter hopelessness of ever convincing Dr. R. Campbell up to a fair discussion of the real points between us. Indeed, in this litigation, the truth is brought out, that the doctor is not qualified to do a work, and Bro. Campbell has underrated the man. There is no going to Bethany for a man to fight with the doctor. A man every equal can be found in his own neighbourhood, ready and willing to meet him and discuss any fair proposition covering the real issues between us.

And by the way, what has been said with Bro. Franklin's proposition, we are not mistaken, he was invited to an oral discussion some time since at New Castle, Ky. and accepted the invitation, provided one of several names named would meet him, and Dr. Campbell was one of them. J. M.

It is not the height which makes men giddy, but looking down on those below.

Superficial writers, like the mole, dig themselves deep when near the surface.

PRESIDENT D. R. CAMPBELL AND PRESIDENT A. CAMPBELL

"Our readers are perhaps generally aware that the presidents, whose names grace this brief notice, have been anxiously striving for months to arrange preliminaries for a discussion of grave religious questions, involving real or imaginary differences between the Baptists and the Disciples; and as the controversy is about ending in a failure to agree whether it shall be written or oral, we cannot let the opportunity pass without an expression of our sincere convictions regarding the matter. The obvious results from past developments must be of immense value to the cause we plead.

"In the first place, the correspondence presents Duncan R. Campbell, though a man of decided talent and learning, an adroit and uncandid partizan; while it presents Alexander Campbell as a giant still, as a man of superior learning, and of high moral integrity, which cannot fail to command the admiration of all beholders.

"Duncan R. Campbell's effort to prove A. Campbell's contradictions, is puerile beyond expression; while his attempt to prove the ridiculousness of our position of requiring positive obedience in order to enter the kingdom, and at the same time, claiming the right of all in and out of the kingdom, to commune together at the Lord's table, is positively scandalous. His statement that many are alarmed at Bro. Campbell's recent teaching on the subject, without the shadow of authority in truth. Whoever heard of any one amongst us advocating the right of an alien, of one who had not put on Christ in baptism, to approach the Lord's table? The Apostle said to the saints, and not to the world, 'Examine yourselves, and so partake.'

"Dr. Campbell must also pardon our interference, while we respectfully ask him, after opposing 'baptism for the remission of sins,' to be so kind as to point out any ordinance of the New Testament for the penitent believing sinner to perform, in order to forgiveness and adoption into the family of the Lord. We would be pleased to give it to our readers. Will others of our Baptist friends tell us what it is? If pardon or adoption is promised to the alien on the condition of faith, repentance, mourning, breaking bread, or prayer, give us the command, or the example. We are not trifling with the matter—we wish to know whether we, or our friends of some of the respective parties of this country are in error. We desire a full discussion of this matter; and our friends who oppose us, may rest assured we are so confident that we are right, that we will not be particular as to the mode of examination. We are anxious to test the truth of our teaching. If we are wrong, we have too much at stake to remain quiet."—Gospel Advocate.

We heartily concur with the Gospel Advocate, in the above, save the first of the following four words: "decided talent and learning." The expression would certainly have been as strong as justifiable if he had said a man of "talent and learning," but, in our judgment, it is a little too strong to say, "decided talent and learning." That Dr. Campbell has some talent and learning, may safely be admitted. But we are glad to see Bro. Fanning so fair, honourable, and unprejudiced as to be perfectly willing to do full justice to an insidious, pettifogging and intriguing enemy. We do not wish to see aught detracted from Dr. Campbell's talents, learning, or standing, in any way that is properly due to him. We do not feel prejudiced against him, nor wish to see others prejudiced, but if any man can deliberately consider the age, position, standing, and lives of the two men, and read the insulting, arrogant, and dogmatical letters of Dr. Campbell, without feeling ineffable contempt for him, then we confess that they must view the matter entirely different from us. Dr. Campbell is comparatively a young man. Alexander Campbell is now upwards of seventy years of age. Dr. Campbell has never been abroad comparatively any time, nor has he produced anything or done anything of consequence, making any mark in the world. The very circumstance of his holding this correspondence with Alexander Campbell, is the greatest event in his life, and will give him more note. The only thing we regret in the matter is, that he should have been lifted from his comparative obscurity and brought into such an extended notoriety, by a man, the author of more than fifty volumes, and known throughout the civilized world, and universally acknowledged to be a man of the first order of talent and learning. When we consider this, and think of his hoary hairs and venerable dignity, and see such a man as Dr. D. R. Campbell approach him in the style of an old conceited pedagogue approaching an ignorant pupil who had only half learned his lesson, we can but feel an ineffable contempt for the man.

If Dr. Campbell is truly and properly a great man, why does he not show a gentlemanly respect for the grave and dignified man with whom he is in correspondence? Why does he not show that he can appreciate the venerable, the time-worn, the laborious man; his ability, his learning, and the feelings of the man with whom he is corresponding? Why descend to the low, ill, bitter, and malignant style? Why lose his temper, give vent to his wrath, and lose sight of all dignity and manliness? Why all this unfairness, finesse, and caviling? The true state of the case is, that since a few wicked men among the Baptists, in the South and West, have determined on breaking up the friendly and fraternal state of feeling that was obtaining among us, and declared war upon us, they have not a man who will meet a man of our ranks, and attempt to defend the position they have assumed; we mean a man who can get anything like a general endorsement. The retreating, or running fight of Campbell, is about all that they can do. But they cannot escape in this way. They must meet the issue now in a fair and honorable way. There is no backing out from it. The people are the issues that the Baptists have been making with us, the things that they have put in their lips in the pulpit and in their publications. If they will agree to a position embracing the difference between the brethren of Kentucky and Mr. Campbell to come to Georgia to spread out the matter fully to the people, allowing Dr. Campbell any other man the Baptists may select, the privilege of replying, employ a reporter, and have it taken and published? If they refuse to do so, let the consequences be on their own heads. Or if Bro. Campbell is not induced to do such a work, Bro. Lard and Bro. Hopson ought now to be compelled to meet the matter or shrink openly from it.

"THE JOURNAL OF SACRED LITERATURE" ON CONANT'S VERSION OF JOB.

THE friends of Bible revision in general, and those of the American Bible Union in particular, will be gratified to learn how highly the Journal of Sacred Literature for July, 1859, speaks of Dr. Conant's Revision of the Book of Job.

A few paragraphs may be extracted from the article in question which will tend to sustain the call for revision, as well as afford satisfaction respecting this preliminary specimen.

On the faults of the Authorised Version the Reviewer thus comments:—

"That the English translation of the Book of Job, in our authorised version of the Scriptures, is exceedingly faulty, is, we presume, generally admitted by all persons competent to form an opinion on the subject. It is, in fact, incomparably the worst-translated book in the whole volume—almost every page abounding with errors more or less serious.

"The extreme incorrectness of the common version of Job is by no means an accidental circumstance, but arises from causes which were patent to every eye. In the first place, the subject matter of the book has a great deal to do with this. It is not a simple historical narrative, but a drama—like the greater part of the sacred literature—it consists of grave moral deductions. Then the book is, in all probability, the most ancient of all the inspired writings. Even the five books of Moses, the judgment of some of the ablest critics, must yield the palm to the Book of Job, as regards antiquity. In addition to which, as is well known, it is composed in a language of which there are no remains except what the Old Testament contains. If to these considerations we add that the ancient versions of Job—the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Syriac, are all more or less faulty, it will not surprise any reader, that an English translation of this book, made upwards of a hundred years ago, utterly fails to give a fair representation of the original.

"Indeed King James' translators were under the task on which they had entered beyond their ability, that in many instances they not only failed in giving the true meaning of the passage before them, but were reduced to the deplorable necessity of inserting sentences which have no meaning at all. Nothing would be easier than to extract scores of passages from the Book of Job, which convey to the English reader no more meaning than if they had been couched in Egyptian hieroglyphics!"

After specifying half a score instances in print, the writer proceeds:—

"Now these passages—and it would be easy to add to them—are not mere mis-renderings; they are absolute nonsense. It is quite obvious that the translators were at a loss how to render them, and were thus compelled either to pass them quite by, or else insert the ridiculous absurdities which we have just transcribed.

"The vast progress which has been made of late in the knowledge of the Hebrew language, happily enables us to remove these, and many other unsightly blotches, from this portion of God's Holy Word. During the present century Hebrew literature, indeed, has been cultivated with surprising success. And as we might naturally expect, no portion of the Old Testament Scriptures has received so much attention as the Book of Job. We could name at least ten or a dozen elaborate and valuable commentaries on this book alone, published in Germany by Hebrew scholars during the last quarter of a century."

The qualifications of Dr. Conant are then noticed:—

"As regards the qualifications of Dr. Conant, there can be no question that he is thoroughly competent for the important and responsible task which he has undertaken. He is well acquainted with the original language of the book. Report speaks of him as the first Hebrew scholar in America. He is moreover a good German scholar—familiar with the works of most of the continental commentators and philologists. The importance of this knowledge can hardly, we think, be overrated. To the want of it may be ascribed the signal failure of all the attempts hitherto made by our own countrymen to produce a translation of Job worthy of supplanting that in our English Bible."

Submitting chapter vi. of the New Version to an investigation, the Reviewer finds "no less than twelve variations" from the Common Version, "all of them seriously affecting the sense." Having passed them under review the writer remarks:—

"The critical examination which we have thus instituted must, we think, be pronounced, as on the whole, highly satisfactory. Only one or two instances occur of doubtful or objectionable renderings; whilst, the remaining variations are so important and so valuable, that a flood of light is poured on this hitherto obscure chapter."

After presenting a further number of variations, the contributor to the Journal thus glides into a comparison of Conant with Barnes:—

"These instances of improved rendering will, we think, suffice to convince the reader of the immense superiority of the new translation over the authorized version. A very careful and minute examination of the whole work has impressed us with the belief that it is unquestionably the best English version yet executed. Barnes's translation at the end of his commentary on Job occupied that position previously, but it must certainly yield to that now before us. The two translators, indeed, cannot for a moment be placed on the same footing as Hebrew scholars. Many passages in Barnes contain errors which have no place in Conant's translation. The acquaintance of the former with modern German commentaries appears to be very slight indeed; a circumstance which seriously detracts from the value of his translation."

Then follow thirteen "examples" of "decided errors on the part of Barnes, corrected by Dr. Conant."

"It would be easy to add to these instances. Indeed the superiority of Dr. Conant's translation is marked throughout the whole book."

As might be supposed, the learned Reviewer finds some faults. As we write not for Dr. Conant's information —who doubtless is posted up in the public reviews of his labors—we need not particularize these alleged errors. Assuming them to be real, still, as they are found in a revision, not final, but published for critical examination and suggestion, we question the appropriateness of the following reflection :—

“ But we have yet to notice three or four striking errors of judgment on the part of this eminent Hebrew scholar — which afford another exemplification of the truth of the remark, how unwise it is to entrust the translation of the inspired writings to any one individual, however accomplished.”

Although Dr. Conant may be the Bible Union's pre-eminent, or even sole translator of the Old Testament, his preëminent fitness for the post even this Reviewer does not dispute ; while, with regard to the New Testament his position is, we believe, more than equally shared. Approximate perfection, Dr. Conant promises to attain, in his own special sphere. No number of scholars would or could agree upon an absolutely perfect translation. Indeed, we may do well to learn the lesson, that no possible translation will ever have any right to hold back the enterprising from the inspired originals, and that so long as improvement in scholarship will remain possible—so long as larger discoveries of the mind of God will remain the privilege of those who will insist on constant recourse to the fountain head — so long will demand and supply continue to follow each other in this matter of Bible Revision, in recurring and advancing alternately, till the unmediated light of eternity shall disclose how positively inexhaustible were the treasures of the Scriptures !

Notwithstanding this writer's statements from the merits of Dr. Conant's version of Job, he concludes with a cordial and emphatic tribute of praise.

“ We have thus,” says he, “ endeavored to give the reader as full and exact a view of Dr. Conant's Job, as the limited number of our space will allow. It will be perceived that we have formed a very favorable impression of the work. It is our judgment unquestionably the best translation of that valuable and interesting book which has ever appeared in the English language. Indeed to those who have witnessed the miserable performances which have passed for English versions of Job previous to that of Barnes, it is really surprising to meet with a work like this. The present translator, as we have already observed, is fully qualified as a first-rate Hebrew and German scholar for the task which he has given himself. He also possesses what is almost equally necessary, a good knowledge of vernacular English, and moreover a sound judgment, not led astray by ingenious fancies and unfounded theories. Thus furnished, he has produced a work of which America will be proud ; a work which we fully believe is destined to remain an enduring monument of the ripe scholarship, sound judgment, and unquestionable ability of the learned translator.”

DID PAUL HAVE THE TWELVE AT EPHESUS RE-BAPTIZED?

It seems strange that a narration so plain as that of the baptism of the twelve disciples at Ephesus, (Acts xix. 1-7) should be interpreted so differently—sometimes, as it is, from the real meaning and design of the inspired writer. Many of the Baptists, in order to sustain their groundless dogma, that the kingdom commenced under the ministry of John the Baptizer, and that his baptism was the initiating ordinance into it — “ the door into the church” contend that the twelve were not rebaptized, or baptized with Christian baptism ; and interpret the passage, “ When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus,” to refer to a past period under the ministry of John, or “ unto John's baptism,” with which they had been baptized ! A more palpable perversion of Scripture, and a more glaring mis-terpretation of it, we have never met with. We had a conversation, a few days since, with a Baptist friend, in which he took the following most singular position. He admitted that the twelve were rebaptized, but that as John "preached the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins," when baptized with his baptism they received the remission of their sins, and were consequently saved from them; but as the commission had been given, embracing "baptism in the name of Christ," and "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," it was a duty enjoined upon them to be rebaptized. He contended that there was no command for it, as it was not said Paul commanded them to be baptized, as did Peter at the house of Cornelius, but that they submitted to it as a matter of choice and duty.

Now, how does the account read? While Apollos was at Corinth, Paul, after having passed through the upper coasts, came to Ephesus, and finding—not disciples of Christ, but—"certain disciples," he inquired of them if they had received the Holy Spirit since they believed? They replied, according to the Common Version, that they had not so much as heard whether there was any Holy Spirit! (a very strange thing, when John had said that Christ should baptize with the Holy Spirit, and when there was so much preaching about the Spirit and so many references to it;) but, as correctly rendered from the original, they had not heard whether the Holy Spirit was given, which entirely changes the meaning of the passage. Paul then very rationally inquired of them, "Unto what baptism they had been baptized?" and in reply they said "Unto John's baptism." He then proceeded to explain to them John's baptism, by telling them that "John truly baptized with the baptism of repentance, (reformation) saying unto the people that they should believe on him who should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus." And what then? "When they heard this"—heard what? Why, what Paul had just said to them, as we have quoted—"they were baptized in the name (by the authority) of the Lord Jesus." What can be plainer than the fact that they were rebaptized?

This single circumstance, and the language used, completely explodes the dogma, that the kingdom began under John. Its commencement then was always in the future—not only until the death and resurrection of Jesus, but until a period after; for the Apostles inquired of him, after his resurrection, if he would "at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?"—still looking forward to it—and were replied to by him in a manner that left its commencement future, until the first Pentecost afterwards, when they received power and authority from on high, and Peter, acting under special commission from the Saviour, opened it to the Jews. Never had it begun before. J. R. H.

THE RESURRECTION.

A seed found in the hand of a mummy two thousand years old, when planted bloomed into a beautiful flower.

Two thousand years ago, a flower
Bloomed brightly in a far-off land;
Two thousand years ago, its seed
Was placed within a dead man's hand.
Before the Saviour came to earth
That man had lived, and toiled, and died;
And even in that far-off time
That flower had shed its perfume wide.
Suns rose and set, years came and went;
The dead hand kept its treasure well;
Nations were born and turned to dust,
While life was hidden in that shell.
The senseless hand is robbed at last—
The seed is buried in the earth;
When lo, the life long sleeping there,
Into a lovely flower puts forth.
Just such a plant as that which grew
From such a seed when buried low—

Just such a flower in Egypt bloomed
And died two thousand years ago.
And will not He who watched the seed
And kept the life within the shell,
When those he loves are laid to rest,
Watch o'er his buried saints as well?
And will not He from 'neath the sod
Cause something glorious to arise?
Aye, though it sleeps two thousand years,
Yet that sleeping dust shall rise.
Just such a face as greets you now,
Just such a form as here we wear,
But yet more glorious far, will rise,
To meet the Saviour in the air.
Then will I lay me down in peace,
When called to leave this vale of tears;
For "in my flesh I shall see God,"
E'en though I sleep two thousand years.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM AMERICA.—No. II.

PHILADELPHIA, Walnut Street,
May 18, 1859.

Beloved Brother,—In England London is especially noted for its burden of vice and woe, whilst Bath is contradistinguished for its pious and philanthropic community. So, in America, New York is particularly cited as the city of abominations and iniquity, whilst Philadelphia is especially celebrated as the city of spiritual enlightenment and practical religion. Whilst there exists an inherent similarity in the customs and institutions of these two great trans-Atlantic cities, there are evident distinctive features which characterise the people who fill them. In consequence of the number of foreigners who superabound in New York, it sustains a larger measure of affinity and resemblance to England. It breathes more of its national spirit, and manifests less the disposition to caricature the English character, which the queen city of the East is far too prone to do. The Philadelphians regard their city as the finest in the world, being, as they assert, remarkable for its virtuous and God-fearing population, its commercial importance, and its general facilities of resource. In society its staple element is Quakerism, which undoubtedly imparts solidity and perhaps frigidity to the manners and character of the people; and as pleasure is not necessarily associated with vice, its facilities very obviously abound, whilst the indications of an irreligious people are much fewer than in most cities. Yet, as in England, these ancient relics are fast fading from the land; and it is supposed that were it possible for William Penn to revisit the state which he founded, and particularly Philadelphia, the stronghold of his people, he would find that the rising generation has significantly retrograded from the peculiarities and idiosyncracies which he introduced. However, he is still had in grateful remembrance, together with Washington, Franklin, and Girard—as the men who, by their mighty intellects, ennobled their city, and procured for it the great advantages which place it superior in rank to all others. They fail not to enumerate to the stranger the prolific category of benefits which those great men conferred: and in return for the fruits which the people have derived from their efforts, they have not forgotten to qualify their institutions by demonstrative adjectives, such as the Washington Institute, the Franklin Institute, and Girard's College.

It might be presumed, then, that brethren here are very popular, and therefore are numerous. The supposition quite natural; but whilst such men as Cheever and Henry Ward Beecher, of New York, with Chambers and Albert Barnes the Commentator, of Philadelphia, by influence of their eloquence and secta preaching, accustom the minds of the people to religions which are not the religion of the New Testament, it renders the countenance of our brethren far more rugged and austere, and their accessions proportionally less frequent. The church here is situated in Twelfth-street, below Melon, and a few miles from New York, of which meeting-house, or church, as called here, it is a representation, so far as its formation and its size are concerned. There is more the simplicity of ancient times about the church in Philadelphia, its prevailing characteristic being a general neatness of exterior, which perfectly harmonises with the currency of intrinsically sterling principles, and which especially beams from its character. The number of members is 150, and they are reputed to be punctual and constant in their attendance on Lord's day. The church has two elders and two deacons, and an average number of scholars, who are accommodated in a large room beneath the chapel. Our brethren and sisters in America are more interested in the progress of the scholars in our British churches are generally. They are the first and the last in the school-room, and have practical faith in the advantages which accrue from visiting absentees. Our Brother Challen is the senior elder of the church and its preacher for the position which he fills in the church, his qualifications are admirably adapted, and no brother possesses more of the elements of teaching and preaching in composition than does our Bro. Challen. A few years ago the brethren here were as much despised as any of our British churches were; but through his co-operation with the various religious movements of the city, he has had access to the pulpits and platforms of the sectarian churches, and popularised our principles with the people. On Lord's day afternoon he dresses 3000 persons in the union meeting, and also in the evening he preaches to a larger audience from the same platform. Our brethren also meet on Wednesday and Friday evenings, for brief discourses for prayer. They are slowly progressing. Your brother sincerely in the one hope.

In the beginning there was but one church in a city, to which all Christian converts belonged. But the care of the church was not entrusted to one man, but to several, who constituted a college of presbyters, and divided the duties of their office among themselves. This arrangement was analogous to that of the Jewish synagogue, after which the church was organized. A plurality of persons everywhere appear in the Acts as the representatives of the church at Jerusalem. They represent also the church at Ephesus (Acts xx. 17-28) and at Philippi (1 Phil. i. 1.) Titus was also instructed to ordain elders in all the cities of Crete. In such a college of elders, sharing a joint responsibility in the care of the churches, it would obviously be convenient, if not indispensable, for one of their number to act as the moderator or president of these assemblies. Such a designation, however, would confer on the presiding elder no official superiority over his fellow presbyters; but, coupled with age, and talents, and spiritual gifts, it might give him a control on their councils and in the government of the church. This control, and this official rank as the προεστως, which was first conceded to him by his fellow presbyters only as to a fellow presbyter, or primus inter pares, he began in time to claim as his official prerogative. He first began by moral means, and the influence of accidental circumstances, to be the bishop of the church, and afterwards claimed the office as his right. This assumption of authority gave rise to the gradual distinction between bishop and presbyter. It began early to disturb the relations of equality, which at first subsisted between the ministers of the churches—and in the course of the second and third centuries resulted in the division of the clergy into two distinct orders, bishops and presbyters. The government of the church was at first a democracy, allowing to all its constituents the most enlarged freedom of a voluntary religious association. It became an absolute and iron despotism. The gradations of ecclesiastical organization through which it passed were, from congregational to parochial—parochial to diocesan—diocesan to metropolitan—metropolitan to patriarchal—patriarchal to papal.

THE REVIVAL IN IRELAND.

"REVIVAL" is the word in use, but to say "the great revival of religion," seems to be using words not the most fit to express what is intended. "The awakening" would better represent the movement, and better accord with the language of Scripture. "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." There has then been, or there is still, going on in the North of Ireland, a great awakening of sinners to a sense of their danger and need of pardon and of Christ. Numerous communications from the spot enable us to notice the following particulars.

It must not be thought of as confined to one town, nor to one county. Communications from some thirty places are now before us, and its range is still widening. The following statement which relates to Belfast is, in substance, made in regard to various towns and villages—

"The influence of the revival is now almost without limit. All ranks, and classes, and creeds, have been reached by it in this town and its vicinity; and hundreds have been so completely changed, that it may be truly said of them—"Old things are passed away; behold, all things have become new." Entire streets which were known as being the most disorderly portions of the town, in which nothing was to be heard but quarrelling, cursing, and blaspheming, especially on Saturday nights, have been so thoroughly changed, that last Saturday night there was scarcely a house in them in which prayer and praise had not taken the place of drunkenness and disorderly conduct. In some of these streets every house had its penitent, or penitents. Those engaged in this work of calling upon penitents have not had far to go from house to house; for scarcely had they got out of one residence when they were earnestly entreated to enter another in the immediate vicinity, as a son or a daughter, a father or a mother, had been brought to repentance. In some instances the mental agony of these was evidently most intense."

To the above may be added a few lines from Mr. F. French, who has visited many of the places, for the purpose of getting exact information.

"A solicitor at B. told me that litigation had decreased; a publican, that no man could live by the trade; a policeman, that now they had less to do than usual. Beyond all doubt, the most abandoned of women have forsaken the streets, and cried to Jesus for mercy. I have heard interesting anecdotes of quarrels made up. I have seen it stated that deposits in savings banks have greatly increased, and I can certify that political demonstrations, 'gendering strife,' seem to be in abeyance. It is true that the editor of a public newspaper has been entirely incapacitated from collecting his thoughts on any subject. It is true that compositors in a printing office have been unable, through strong feelings of sin and bodily weakness, to go on with their ordinary work. It is true that the business in factories has been stopped through the same cause. But I believe it has been already, in some degree, made up to their masters by the return on Monday morning of 'hands' which used to be disabled by intemperance on the Sabbath. The more I see of this work, the more mysterious it appears to me; but with such fruit, we can believe but that God is using the

Other information is to hand concerning large out-door meetings, some of them lasting the whole night, and special trains, at reduced prices, for conveying person to mid-day prayer-meetings. In the Belfast Botanic Garden some 10,000 persons were present on one occasion. The following from Newtownlimavady gives, what seems to be a fair sample of the proceedings there and at other places:—

"On Friday evening, the 10th inst. the services began in Major Lancy's usual place of worship, by a convert from Balaclava. At eight o'clock, the general meeting commenced under the spreading boughs of a beech-tree. Nothing unusual happened, except the fervency of the devotional exercises, until a little after ten o'clock, when a cry was heard here, and another there, of the most heart-rending nature. Such a scene then took place as would defy the pencil or pen of the most celebrated painter or poet. The event was everything that could be desired. It was even the rustling of a leaf disturbed in the solemn assembly until shriek after shriek and groan after groan, proclaimed conviction had reached the soul, and the Spirit was quicker than a two-edged sword. At first the stricken victims were carried into Mr. Lancy's house. The room soon became overcrowded, but the lawn in front of the house was a very convenient if not a superior substitute. No person could have the least idea of the force of conviction until he sees some one stricken and examines for himself. You can imagine every one around you who was prostrate like Judas, and all would be run to the same end, did conversion follow! Perhaps sixty or seventy stricken this night. Think for a moment on such a sight. As the night advanced the cases become more frequent. On Friday and Saturday the work continued till six or seven o'clock the following morning. No one thought of returning home; prayer and praise were unceasing."

This statement would be incomplete were we not to add, that long-continued and fearful prostration, resulting in mental agony, is quite common. The case following seems to be but one of a thousand—

"A neatly-attired young woman, recently about twenty-two years of age, had been stricken an hour previously, and supported in the arms of an elderly friend who was seated upon a low stool. The party impressed appeared to be in a state of great prostration—a partial stupor, from which she was occasionally roused into a feeling of mental agony, depicted in heart-rending expressions of the countenance, and uttered in deep low wailings of terrible despair. Her face was deadly pale, and her eyelids firmly closed, except when partially raised by a convulsive paroxysm, and even then no part of the eye was visible except a narrow line of white. Her pulse was intermittent and feverish, and her face and hands were covered with perspiration. Occasionally she extended her hands with an action as if groping in the air, and at other times they were elevated high over head, where the hands were clasped with startling energy, and the features became rigidly fixed into an expression of supplication of which no language could convey an adequate idea. Her utterance was interjectional, and for some time, rather incoherent; but, mingled with sobs and moans, and agonising expressions of despair, we could distinguish exclamations like the following:—"Is there no hope?" "Oh, my heart, my heart!" "Pardon, pardon!" "Oh, Jesus, save me!" "Oh, God, have mercy!" Beside this poor girl two men were standing and praying aloud alternately."

This shall close our description of this movement, excepting only that we must add, that it commenced beyond the circle of minister and clergy. Rev. gentlemen are now busy, but where they present themselves in large numbers the effect seems to be less, and the most marked results have been produced where they have been entirely absent. Look at it as you will, this is not a little remarkable. Is this awakening of God? Then, in Ireland, as in America, He passes by ministers and clergies, and uses the common people. Is it merely excitement, produced wholly by means under man's control? Then ministers are not the men to act upon the minds of sinners, and the greater results spring up where they are not. In either case we feel compelled to urge that church members must depend upon themselves, labor according to apostolic examples, look to God for his blessing, and consider modern ministers not the Lord's instruments in His great saving work.

But the often-put question, Is this work of God? invites a passing notice.

Some there are who say, "Of God! Why ask the question? Only think of the poor deluded souls! Why, Sir, they are mad—verily mad! Men crying for pardon until they sink exhausted, leaving work, neglecting everything, bringing themselves to such conditions that you would think them nigh unto death, and all this of God! No, Sir—they are mad." But stay, my dear friend, let us give you another picture of a madman. He has been for years sinning against God—the wages of sin is death—he is unpardoned, and in the event of death closing in upon him while in his present condition, he will be cast into the lake of fire, which is the second and everlasting death. He is aware of all this, and also aware that he cannot secure life for one hour—that God wills to pardon him, gave his Son to die for him, and that in neglecting the salvation thus provided, he aggravates his guilt, deepens his condemnation, and challenges his Creator to cut short his career of rebellion. Knowing this, day after day he gives all attention to his shop, country house, or land, attends the theatre, gives pleasure parties, and is just as indifferent to his eternal welfare as an over-fatted horse would be to a stray grain of corn. Now, Sir—any large town supplies thousands of such men, and permit us to say, they are the veritable madmen. He is not beside himself who cries to God for pardon, who weeps when he finds no assurance that he has it, and who becomes too much concerned while in that condition to attend to the ordinary calls of perishing things. He is just coming to his senses. Mad he has long been, and now he borders upon sanity. Were the 300 men who on the day of Pentecost were pricked to the heart, and who cried out, "What shall we do"—were these men mad? They were insane while they remained unmoved, they were rational when they called aloud for salvation. And now with the same danger and the same need, why should not men, and by thousands too, cry aloud for salvation? The real wonder is, not that here and there we find an extensive awakening, but that it does not everywhere prevail. God is still love, the gospel is still the power of God, the Holy Spirit is still acting both upon the church and the world, still bringing, by means seen and unseen, the truth of God into contact with the human mind, and that truth does not everywhere prevail is only to be accounted for by the fact, that the multitude are mad enough to close their ears lest they should hear, and their eyes lest they should see, and harden their hearts lest they should be moved and the Lord should convert them, and because, like the possessed swine, they run headlong to destruction.

But a friend says, Can you account for, and do you justify, the long protracted agony and fearful prostration by which many cases are signally marked? We justify only the deep conviction of sin, and the determination not to rest until a sense of pardon is enjoyed. The prostration is accounted for by the duration and strength of the distress. This cannot be objected to on the ground that the first symptom has often been that of prostration, for upon examination, it will be seen, that though prostration may have been the first manifestation, the parties have before suffered and resisted.

These effects, which we can account for but cannot justify, are results, in our opinion, of two deviations from apostolic examples. It must be remembered, that while the "Acts of the Apostles" supply many records of conversion—of individuals, of households, of thousands in one day—yet no case can be found of an awakened sinner, (who had access to one of the Lord's disciples, so that he could put the question, What shall I do to be saved?) waiting one day, or even the half of a day, in order to enjoy that liberty and assurance of pardon, for which modern awakened ones cry for many days. The first of these is a deviation from the apostolic manner of addressing unconvinced sinners, and the second is a deviation from the apostolic answer to convinced souls who ask for salvation. It may be observed, that while the apostles did not fail to point out the danger in which sinners stand, and did not neglect to rouse them to a due sense of that danger, they at the same time so presented the love of God, that though conviction and repentance thus produced were deep, hope, as the handmaid and precursor of the assurance of pardon, sustained the soul that would otherwise have fainted; and though it did not instantly dry the streaming eyes, it at once changed the tear of fear for that of gratitude and love. Then, so soon as faith in the gospel facts had produced sorrow for sin, the apostles were ready to say, "Repent and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Lord Jesus, for the remission of sins." Repentance with them was a change of mind in regard to God and his character, the sinner and his sin—a determination to live to him who died that they might live—and every sinner was changed or begotten of God, was clothed upon without delay to "Arise and be baptized, and wash away his sins in the name of the Lord." They saw the Lord standing ready to give them their pardon by baptism—they "went down into the water"—they "came up on their way rejoicing." There were no singing parties standing over the prostrate sinners—no praying men, rousing one the other, that constant prayer might be offered over these seeking souls—no calling upon God for the assurance "just now"—all this is modern invention—the result of departing from the apostolic example. We believe a few, earnest, Christ-loving Christians, well instructed in the apostolic manner—that is, acquainted with God's Word—could at this time do a great work in the North of Ireland. The awakening is of the Holy Spirit—giving God the glory! The misdirecting of its results are of man, and as the Bible is in his hand, let him have the shame.

Only one point more. After an usual awakening of this kind, is there not an alarming falling away, and is not such apostasy proof that the work is not of God? O man! What a spoiler thou art! The Lord was more careful to provide for preachers of the gospel, in order to the awakening of sinners, than he was to provide for their protection and building up after conversion. But here deviation again strikes in, and weak brethren, for whom Christ died, are caused to perish. He instituted one polity for his church, and provided that all believers might be one—so that the world might behold their unity and believe. Man has broken up his arrangements, and converts know where to go, they are bewildered by conflicting claims of sects. The columns that record the progress of the awakening, contain squabbling letters upon the question, Which is the church? One of two things must occur in regard to most of the converts—they will staloof from every sect, or join one in which the order of the Lord's house is disregarded, and as all substitutes are human and inferior, many may fall away who might otherwise have remained steadfast. This matter has received a little attention from the Belfast press—some have discovered that the Lord's supper is calculated to deepen heavenward impressions, and propose, that instead of its administration only once in six months, as now among the Presbyterians, it shall be attended to quarterly; and, that the duty of ministers may not, on that account, become more burdensome, part of the usual preparatory meetings shall be dispensed with. Now, if the Lord's supper is good quarterly for the end in view, why not weekly? And as the first Christians came together every first day of the week to break bread, why not now attend on every return of that day to the Apostles' doctrine, the fellowship, the breaking of the bread, and the prayers? Let the ordinances of God be duly honored, and the falling away too common after "revivals," will be greatly reduced.

CONFESSIONS OF A FOOLISH MAN.—No. VI.

WILL HE DO?

THE Rev. Thomas Evans wants a church, and the church in Maryport wants a pastor. My reverend friend has been recommended by a neighboring minister, as one likely to suit; and so the agreement was made that he shall supply on probation.

As he goes up the pulpit stairs that first Sunday morning, there's a considerable amount of stock-taking being carried on by those who sit in the pews. Mrs. J. — a very grave and respectable member is Mrs. J. and seldom comes out on wet Sundays—well, Mrs. J. thinks he goes up the steps with rather too much levity; there isn't the steadiness there should be in a minister of the gospel. Miss S. notices the tie of his neckerchief; she thinks that proves he hasn't brought his wife with him, and she is afraid he's rather careless about his appearance. One deacon is wondering whether he'll do to associate with the genteel part of the congregation; from his manner in the minister's vestry, he's afraid he won't. All these estimates, and many more, have been made already: yes, before the Rev. Thomas Evans has opened his lips in the pulpit, the ecclesiastical measuring tape has been thrown over him.

I shall pass over that morning service—that is, as to how he read, and prayed, and preached. I shall not say whether the sermon was just an ordinary one, or whether it was that remarkable discourse which had in other instances, and elsewhere, produced such a profound impression in the preacher's favor.

I shall try to put you, my reader, just at the outside of the chapel that morning, as the congregation are coming out. You shall hear for yourself. These are some of the jottings:—

"I didn't like him very much."

"Well! Yes: it was all very good, but his manner is objectionable."

"A capital sermon."

"How do you think Mrs. J. liked him?"

"He isn't fit to be mentioned the same day with Mr. T. who preached for us a month ago."

"He's a very superior man."

"This will do, won't it, friend?"

"Rather too flowery."

"Too ranting for me."

"I should have liked him better if he hadn't been quite so blunt in his manner."

Now, good reader, put these sayings together, and what sort of a man do you think Mr. Evans is? What can you make of him? Will he do for Maryport?

In the evening the congregation is somewhat larger than usual. One way or the other, people have been talking about our friend on probation. And so curiosity has brought some, who can seldom be brought by anything else. It's a sermon to sinners. Not to the saints, you know. Notwithstanding, the saints will probably have a good deal to say about it, so we'll get outside the chapel again.

This time, our ears we won't have dinned by the opinions of so many. So we'll only hear a little of what three of the members have to say. These three I shall call John, James, and Joseph.

JOHN.—"I hope some good will be done to-night ; I thought the appeal a very impressive one."

JOSEPH.—"Did you?" (with a shake of the head.) "Too Arminian for us, though."

JOHN.—"Listen to me, my friend, and I'll tell you an anecdote your remark has brought to my recollection. A minister was once supplying a pulpit—he made a warm appeal to the unconverted—one of the deacons was highly offended at what he called the Arminianism of that appeal; but his fervent words led to the conversion of that deacon's only daughter. You, friend, have a daughter, too; be careful lest, by such words as your's, you stand in the way of her salvation."

JOSEPH.—"But, I don't think the Spirit would have turned from his work. If the daughter had been one of the elect, she would have been saved some way."

JAMES.—"Well, don't let us get into a controversy. Do you think he'll do for us?"

JOSEPH.—"If I'm to speak out my mind honestly, I don't believe he will do. I'm afraid he isn't orthodox."

JOHN.—"What is it to be orthodox? I've heard a deal about it in my time, but I never could get to know what it is."

And Joseph could not answer him; his hummings and ha-hings, it isn't worth while printing.

John speaks again. "Well, I have had a good day, and I'm thankful for it. You'll both of you be at the prayer meeting to-morrow night, won't you?"

Both say together that they'll not be able.

At this moment, the preacher and two of the deacons are seen coming: so the conversation drops.

The Reverend Thomas Evans is invited out to tea a good deal that week. And, to tell the truth, there are some warm-hearted folk at Maryport, and they will be glad to see him in their homes.

But at the first house he visits there's a dreadful coolness. There's the piano, with its crimson silk and fretted rose-wood. There are the damask curtains, with grand tassels and fringes. There are the massive chairs, the gilded ornaments, the pictures on the walls, and the Brussels on the floor. There's Mrs. J. so solemn and so stately. There are her two daughters, so quiet and as though they were afraid Mr. might be tempted, if they did not themselves by such reserve, to them an offer. It's quite clear to be a miserable formal affair through.

The poor reverend finds it very difficult, to talk. The subject the weather has been already exhausted—the size of the chapel has been discussed, and who are the settled ministers of Maryport. The garden has been looked at, and certain flowers seen to be very beautiful. The pictures and their subjects, have had their merits named. What next? Ah, the question. It won't do for a minister to have nothing to say: there must be set down as though he knew something. And in such company it is no use for him to say a great many things that might be proper enough elsewhere. Mr. Evans made a venture, but that venture was, in my next I tell.

TO BELIEVERS IN JESUS KNOWN AS PLYMOUTH BRETHREN

DEAR FRIENDS, — You profess to have come out from the Apostasy, as you sometimes say, "from systems"—"gathered to the Lord." It is, however, our conviction, that so far as we claim from being sustainable, that stand in regard to the Apostasy of the same ground as the churches whose fellowship you retire from. The Lord, his Apostles, established once for all faith, ordinances, and government in the church. The mystery of iniquity converted these—the Man of Sin sought to change times and laws, and was permitted generally to accomplish his wicked purpose, and thus was largely substituted "will worship" for worship according to divine appointment. The principles of the former dispensation were, in particular, "types of us," and the Lord himself said to them, "In vain do ye worship, teaching for commandments the traditions of men"—"Ye have made void the law by your traditions." Again and again were they called upon to "seek the old paths and to walk therein." You tell us that this dispensation is in ruin—that the Lord has not called to restore it—that former dispensations have ended in apostacy, and that the Lord never called them to restoration, but swept them away by judgment. That this dispensation is (or has ever been) in ruin, so that a company of disciples could not attend to all the ordinances of the Lord—that since the planting of the first church in Jerusalem the world has been, even for a single day, without gatherings of disciples submitting in all things to the government instituted by the Apostles—you do not prove, because you cannot. But could we grant that the apostacy has been universal, and that for a time no gathering of acceptable worshippers existed, yet your conclusion that restoration could not or should not take place, and that we have no instance of acceptable restoration under former dispensations, is an airy superstructure based on nothing. If the flesh has been introduced into the church by infant baptism—if sprinkling has been substituted for immersion—if priestly assumption has taken place of liberty in ministry—if the appointment of one pastor has come in the room of the ordination of duly qualified bishops in every church—if the quarterly administration of a sacrament presents itself as a substitute for breaking the bread every first day of the week—if pew-letting and begging-sermons have cast out the weekly offering of the Lord's people—if receiving by divers methods believers into the church now stand where immersion into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit formerly stood—if subscription to human creed has taken the place of the primitive confession—if; but why go further? If the above and other changes have taken place—if we have changed from right to wrong, we can and ought to change again from wrong to right, and to support any one of these substitutions is to perpetuate the sin first committed by others. If, in regard to ministry and the weekly breaking of bread, it is right for brethren to return to the old paths, it is equally right and necessary for them to do so in regard to baptism, bishops, deacons, &c.

So far is it from true, that former dispensations have not admitted of restoration and ended in failure, that the last dispensation, which was typical of this, and from which our apostacy takes the name Babylon, did not thus end, but remained its full time, and accomplished the purpose for which it was given. True, the people fell again and again, but they were again and again restored. Carried into Babylon, their temple destroyed, their worship impossible, yet did they rebuild and restore; they sought out the law of the Lord, and daily received instruction therefrom. God owned the work, and their rebuilt temple became more glorious than the former one, for the Redeemer appeared therein, filled it with his glory, and claimed it as his Father's house. Blessed type of our restoration. The Lord will restore his ancient faith, ordinances, and government, and then will he come and usher in a new economy—then will the present dispensation end, not in failure, but in having answered the purpose for which it was given.

BABYLON

of old held the Lord's people in bondage, and was a type of spiritual Babylon (Rev.) The people were called out and they came.

"COME OUT OF HER, MY PEOPLE," is now the Lord's call to believers in spiritual Babylon, (Rev.) and punishment is threatened those who refuse.

"Come out"—from what and to what? Not from Papal "system" or Church of England "system" to no system, or to one made by you, and to be modified at your pleasure. Apostacy is departure—Babylon signifies confusion—"Coming out" from confusion produced by departing from the faith, ordinances, and government of the Lord, can only be accomplished by returning to that which has been departed from. Do not, then, dear friends, any longer tell us that in the primitive churches only the immersed were received to the Lord's table, but that now you deem it good to receive others, because by so doing you take Romish ground. Protestants say, "The Bible, our only rule of faith and practice." You knowingly depart from the Bible rule, because you think it charitable, expedient; or, in a word, because you like to do so. Your will thus takes the place of the Lord's will, and your worship becomes will-worship, from which every believing soul is called to come out. That you, in this particular, may learn and do the will of God, is the desire of your's in the one hope of everlasting life,

DAVID KING.

"THOU AND THY HOUSE."

AFTER all, the children put people to the test; and the house reveals the moral condition of man. I never can form correct judgment of a man from seeing him, or hearing him in a meeting. He may seem a very spiritual person, and teach very beautiful and very true things; but let me go home with him, and there I learn the true state of things. He may speak like an angel from heaven, but if his house be not ruled according to the mind of God, he will not be a real witness for Christ. Now, under the term "house" three things are included, viz. the house itself, the children, and the servants. All these, whether taken together or separately, should bear the distinct stamp of God. The house of a man of God should be ruled for God, in His name, and for His glory. The head of a Christian household is the representative of God. Whether as a father, or as a master, he is to his household, the expression of the power of God; and he is bound to walk in the intelligent recognition and practical development of this fact. It is on this principle he is to provide for, and govern the whole. Hence, "if he provide not for his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." By neglecting the sphere over which God has placed him, he proves his ignorance of, and unlikeness to, the One whom he is called to represent. This is plain enough. If I want to know how I am to provide for, and rule my house, I have only carefully to study the way in which God provides for, and rules His house. This is the true way to learn. Nor is it here a question as to the actual conversion of the constituent parts of the household. Not at all; what I desire to press upon all Christian heads of houses is, that the whole affair, from one end to the other, should distinctly wear the stamp of God's authority. * * * A Christian's house should be but a miniature representation of the house of God, not so much in the actual condition of individual members, as in the moral order and godly arrangement of the whole. Some may shake their heads and say, "This is all very fine, but where do you get it?" I only ask, does the Word of God teach a Christian man so to manage his house? If so, woe be to me if I refuse or fail to do so. That there has been most grievous failure in the management of our houses, every Christian conscience must admit; but none can be more shameful than for a man to calmly and deliberately to sit down, satisfied with a disordered condition of his house, because he cannot attain the standard which God has set before him. All I have to do is to follow the line which Scripture has laid down; the blessing must assuredly follow. God cannot deny himself. * * * What can be more dishonoring to God than to see the house of His servant the very reverse to what He would have it? And yet, were we to judge of a man by what constantly meets our view, we would seem as if many Christians thought that their houses had nothing whatever to do with their testimony. Most humbling is it to meet with a man who, so far as they are personally concerned, seem nice Christians, but who entirely fail in the management of their houses. They speak of separation from the world, but their houses present the most distressingly worldly appearance. They speak of the world being crucified to them, and of their being crucified to the world, and yet the world is standing on the very face of their whole establishment. * * * It may, however, be urged, that Christianity affords no warrant for filthy and irregular households. This is most true. I know few things more distressing and dishonoring, than to see the house of a Christian characterized by filth and confusion. Things could never exist, in connection with a really spiritual, or even a well-adjusted mind. You may set it down that there must be something radically wrong wherever such things exist. In an especial manner, the house of God presents itself before us as a model. Over the door of that house may be seen inscribed this whole-some motto, "Let all things be done decently and in order;" and all who love God and His house, will desire to carry out this precept at home. ## QUERIES AND REPLIES.

"SECOND ADVENTISTS."

I desire to know from the title of your periodical, Millennial Harbinger, whether you and your brethren are Second Adventists? You will oblige by answering this inquiry.

We suppose there is a sense in which all who understand the truth of God are Second Adventists. Nothing can be more clearly revealed than the truth, that when Christ shall come the second time, it will be without sin to the salvation of all his called, chosen, and faithful people. When Jesus appeared the first time, he said and did many things which were not expected of him, and he omitted to teach and perform much that the Jews and Gentiles expected. It will probably be the same when he shall come the second time to visit this mere speck in his vast dominions, and decide the destinies of men and angels.

Perhaps some of our readers will inform us in Scripture language, first what Christ will not do, and secondly what he will do, when his next advent may take place. We do not ask for private opinions or dogmatical assertions, but for deductions arising out of the words of Christ and his Apostles.

COMMUNION WITH OTHER CHURCHES.

If a person desirous of joining the Christian church, cannot enjoy this privilege from the closeness of place, should he, while not being able to approve of some of the forms and regulations of another church, seek its fellowship in the things which he approves?

If a person, thus situated, live in the vicinity of a worshipping congregation, holding the faith and ordinances of the Christian church, in connection with forms and rules evidently not so apostolic, and think that it would be to his spiritual interest to seek the fellowship of such a people, we would say, let him unite with them, provided only they require nothing of him in faith or practice which the Divine Word does not inculcate. We think he would be more likely to enjoy himself than standing alone.

RE-BAPTISM OF JOHN'S DISCIPLES.

Was it binding upon the disciples of John to be re-baptized when they believed in Christ, in order to enter into his church?—G.

According to our understanding of the matter, the church of Christ was not organized in the days of John, and consequently he did not bring his disciples into the church by his baptism. His baptism was the "baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." It was from heaven, and good and valid during his short ministry. It seems that only a few of John's disciples followed Christ, and were ready for the coming of the kingdom; because on the day of Pentecost, the day that the church was fully organized, the "number of the names together was about a hundred and twenty." These no doubt had all been baptized, and we have no evidence that any of them were re-baptized.

But there is evidence that persons who had been "baptized unto John's baptism" after the kingdom came, and John's ministry was succeeded by Christ's, were re-baptized (See Acts xix. 1-7.) Here a dozen persons had been baptized unto John's baptism, most probably by the eloquent preacher Apollos, who knew only the baptism of John; but when they were more fully instructed, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. This was done by the Apostle Paul, and of course it was right and proper.

PRAYER FOR THE CONVERSION OF OTHERS.

How are we to understand 1 Tim. ii. 1? Does it teach what is so generally practiced in union prayer meetings, that Christians should pray for the conversion or salvation of those who believe but have not obeyed, or for those who do not believe?

We take this passage in its widest sense. We understand that it is our privilege and duty to make supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks for all men, in the largest sense of our language. God "will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth;" and Christ gave himself a ransom for all. If, then, God wills the salvation of all men in the widest sense, and that they should obtain redemption through the blood of Christ, it is right that all Christians should pray for it, and labor to bring about so glorious a consummation.

But it may be asked, how can we pray in faith for the salvation of unbelievers? We answer, when we pray for anything, it must be with our eyes open upon all the means that God has ordained to such a result. We are commanded to pray for bread. "Give us this day our daily bread." But no intelligent Christian expects God to give him daily food from heaven ready prepared for use, without the employment of means adapted to such an end. He prays with a clear perception of the law governing the case, and labors as well as prays. So we do not expect God to set aside his plan of saving men, in answer to prayer, but to save men on gospel principles, viz. through a knowledge of the truth.

ITEMS OF NEWS.

BANFF.

I have the happiness to inform you that since my last communication, four have acknowledged the Lord, by being immersed into the name of Jesus, that they may enjoy the fulfilment of God's promises in the New Covenant, ratified by the blood of Jesus, and have strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before them in the Gospel.—I may say, as a congregation, we are more active, and manifesting a deeper interest in the progress of real godliness than we were wont to do. I hope we shall endeavor more and more to glorify God among men by our walk and conversation.

BIRMINGHAM.

We have but little to record this month. In addition to our usual meetings, Brother King has delivered several out-door discourses in Smethwick, (about three miles from Birmingham) which have been well attended. Two females from that neighborhood have been baptized. He has also spoken twice in Bond-street chapel upon the revival in Ireland, and with several brethren, members of the church in Cherry-street, preached on two Lord's-day afternoons, to the people who assembled under trees before the sheet of water in the Reservoir Grounds. Since our notice last month, eight have been added to the church here.

CAMDEN HALL, LONDON—OUR BRO. MILNER.

During the past month we have been favored with a visit from our Christian Brother Milner. As soon as it was known when he would be amongst us, arrangements were made for the delivery of a series of public discourses in the Camden Hall. The subjects chosen were Protestantism and the Millennium, and we need hardly say, that they were treated of in a masterly and interesting manner. Upon the whole the congregations were very good, and all seemed deeply interested in the beautiful and important truths which were so clearly and logically enunciated. The visit of our brother had an additional interest, inasmuch as it was his marriage tour, and we feel assured that all who know him will earnestly wish that the choicest blessings may descend upon him and upon his beloved partner—that through life they may ever be attached to the verities of the living faith, and in death be cheered by the hope which is full of immortality. Our brother is comparatively young in years, but he is old in the knowledge of the truth. His addresses were characterised by clear reasoning and apt illustration, and his discourses were always available to prove the point for which he was contending. His subjects were very suggestive, and as he handled them they supplied a variety of materials for thought. He attracted with pleasing interest the attention which was paid, and though in the parts of his discourses he was evidently above the comprehension of the uninstructed, yet he never lost a hold upon the young and the old seemed equally interested. The voice of our brother was quite full enough. His manner is such as can be desired. In his exordium he was simple, and delicate. The subject he considered is clearly stated; after presenting in the most methodical manner, he stated a series of propositions, many of which were of a negative character, but not the less full of important and practical truth. While listening to his discourses, you are impressed with the fact, that his knowledge of the Scriptures is very extensive, for not only verses, but whole passages will be quoted to prove the correctness of the statement made. At the close of the lectures on a Tuesday evening I had the pleasure to hear, several questions were submitted, and in every instance he was prompt and ready in reply. Sooner was a difficulty suggested than passages were supplied to clear it up. By the replies which were made, the minds of the hearers were enlightened, and subjects which to many minds had been dark or cloudy, were shown in the light of truth to be worthy of the Father, from whom they had descended, to bless and elevate the human race. Our brother is very unpretending, and practiced in his teaching a striking originality. He never stoops to the servile degradation of imitating any one. He is himself only himself. As a preacher and teacher of the great and glorious principles of the Reformation, he takes the broadest, most comprehensive view; his convictions are expressed without the slightest bitterness, and in the defence and explanation of his views he neither irritates nor offends. His actions while speaking are very graceful; he stands well and firmly upon his feet; his body is quite erect, the position of his action consisting in the uplifting and extension of his right arm. Sometimes he noticed at the end of a sentence the word "and" instead of the falling inflection, and kindly suggest that if this were avoided, some of the sentences would tell with greater force upon the public ear. In his discourses there were many beautiful passages. He does not revel in the bold and more striking imagery of thought, though none can feel him to be insensible to the elegant and sublime. Many parts of his ministrations are so clear, light, and beautiful, that we are reminded of the line which speaks of "Zephyr with Aurora playing."

The great force of our brother's character lies in the logical power which is characterised by apt comparison and clever analysis. As a linguist he takes delight in tracing a word to its source or root; and any different definitions which time or custom may have affixed to it, will be noticed and thoroughly explained. We noticed also the exactitude with which every word was put in its right place. All the sentences were well formed, and by their compactness evinced great concentration of mind. The mental powers have been subjected to rigid discipline, and the young men of Edinburgh who have frequent opportunities of listening to such clear and literary expositions of the truth, may, by care and application, obtain a knowledge of the language, not only in some of its purest developments, but also in many of its refined and elegant combinations. In the social circle we had the pleasure of spending a few hours with our brother, and several of our brethren accepted of the opportunity of submitting to him a series of questions, and we were delighted and instructed with the ready and conclusive replies. In all his teachings and conversation we noticed, that he never departed from that which is revealed; and though several of his propositions were somewhat startling at first, it was quickly shown that they were based on the Word of Eternal Truth. He is very anti-mystical—the teachings of the Book are shown to be of a practical character. All that is sufficient for our present state is made known, and all that which relates to salvation is clearly written; but it doth not yet appear what we shall be; we must wait for the coming of the Son of Man, for when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. The members of our church parted from our brother with regret, but we are strong in the conviction, that wherever he may be, he will be fully engaged in his Master's work, and that the happiest moments of his pilgrimage will be, when he is warning sinners to flee from the wrath to come, or speaking to the edification of those who are looking forward to a city whose builder and maker is God. We do not write all we could. We wish to remember that our brother lives; we have been delighted, cheered, and instructed by his visit. He came to us in the spirit of love and truth; he remained with us to enlighten and exhort, and he and his beloved partner have left us with the blessings and benedictions of our Zion. And as our dear friends have just commenced the journey of life, we pray that the smiles of Heaven may be upon them; that they may be blessed in their basket and store; that they may ever be guided by the hand of Him who is too wise to err, and too good to be unkind; that peace, love, and joy may animate their hearts; and that they may ever feel the presence of the angel of the new and everlasting covenant; that in the church they may shine as bright and burning lights, and be the happy instruments of turning many from darkness to light, and from the power of sin and Satan unto God. And when the closing scenes of their pilgrimage shall come, may they be wafted to those peaceful and glorious spheres where, with the blood-bought throng, they shall ascribe glory and honor and power to Him who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever.

GLASGOW.

We are most happy at all times to hear of the progress of the truth, and from time to time of one and another yielding themselves up to the service of Him whose right it is to reign in the hearts of all His creatures. So we feel pleasure in communicating to your readers, that on the 19th of June, a young man who professed his faith in the Lord Jesus, was immersed into the name of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and added to the church.

LEICESTER.

The brethren meeting in Leicester have agreed to forward to the Evangelist Fund, for the furtherance of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the sum of £1, with their hearty wishes for the prosperity of the Redeemer's kingdom. We are happy to inform you, that on Lord's day, July 10th, a young female made the good confession, and was buried with her Lord by immersion, to walk, we hope, in newness of life. Accept our united Christian love. Yours in the one hope,

JAMES LEAVESLY.

Leicester, July 12, 1859.

[There are now, we believe, eight or ten brethren meeting in Leicester.—J. W.]

BUCKLY (FLINTSHIRE.)

I send you a statement of our small church. We now number ten, and have assembled every Lord's day for the last few years, to attend to the Apostles' doctrine, according to the Scriptures. Buckly is a very populous district, and well leavened with sectarianism. We commenced with two, and by the blessing of God our little flock has been gathered. We have not had a visit from an evangelist since we commenced, and should be glad of a visit from one coming this way J. HUGHES.

Windmill-lane, July, 1859.

MIDDLESBRO'.

A few disciples at this place, though only numbering three, feel it to be our duty to do what little we can for the promotion of the truth as it is in Jesus. We therefore transmit a sum of 10s. to the Evangelist Fund, hoping that by the blessing of God, we may be enabled in future to contribute quarterly to that fund. We feel very sorry that none of us will be able to be present at the Annual Meeting, but we pray that your labors may be crowned with success. There are not many of the brethren who have any knowledge of us, though there are some few who has. We had an interview with Bro. J. Inwards, at Stockton-on-Tees, which much revived us—it was a season of refreshing from the Lord. As we have not seen a brother connected with the Reformation for some years previously, Bro. I. can inform you of the great probable good that might result from an evangelist being stationed in this populous district at the present time. We hoped to have seen our Bro. Inwards again before this.

NEWTOWN, (SYDNEY, NEW SOUTH WALES.)

I am happy to inform you that we are progressing steadily. Since I last wrote two sisters have put on the Lord Jesus by confession and immersion, and there are several others of whom hopes are entertained. Bro. Griffin, in writing from the diggings, informs us of the immersion there of a Bro. Mitchell, formerly a Presbyterian.—Our meetings on Lord's evenings, when free discussion is invited, are increasing in interest and attendance.—We have been taken to task for assuming the name Disciples of Jesus, and a discussion on this matter has commenced.—Out-door preaching by us is well attended. The violent opposition against us has calmed down, and we have now quiet and attentive audiences. We have had letters of inquiry from two gentlemen in distant parts of the colony respecting our principles. We have lately received a sister by letter, written, I think, by Bro. D. King. Newtown Bay 16 or 17 persons from the Methodist were recently immersed by a Baptist minister. On the whole our prospects are encouraging. T. GOOD.

AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

We have received through a correspondent the welcome intelligence, that Hackett has returned from Greece to New York. Dr. Hackett, if we are not mistaken, is Chairman of the Final Revision Committee on the New Testament Scriptures, and that he visited Greece for the purpose of studying the language now spoken in that country, as illustrative of an original Greek. We hope that it will not be long before we see the first part of the revised New Testament.—J. W.

THE GOSPEL IN ITALY

We have received a tract bearing above title, being a reprint of letters which appeared at different times in the Bible, under the signature of "Delta." These were compiled from notes made by a writer during a tour in the years 1848 through Sardinia, Lombardy, Tuscany, the Papal States, and Naples, and were written in the hope that they might be means of exciting sympathy in favor of the many poor Italians who are now endeavoring, in the midst of much persecution, to promote the kingdom of the Redeemer in their native country.

The origin of the churches is first traced. "The movement out of which these communities have sprung, is generally supposed to have commenced about 1840. Amid the commotions of that eventful year, the Sacred Scriptures first found their way into the hands of the Italian people. They were received with eagerness, and with interest and delight. To what extent they were circulated it is not easy to say for little or no official agency was employed. As a forbidden book they passed hand, and from house to house, rapidly and secretly. In Sardinia, in Tuscany, in Lombardy, in the Papal States, and in Naples, in spite alike of the custom-houses and the priests, they made their way, and everywhere welcomed." Thus sprung up these communities, who meet for mutual prayer and reading of the Scriptures, and how they can. In providing for the government, they have wisely waited for fitness amongst the brethren for public and evangelists, and they have not waited in vain.

CHRIST'S CHURCH IDENTIFIED.—No. VIII.

"Upon this rock will I build my church."

I HAVE, in the preceding essay, given a number of tests or characteristics of Christ's church, which are in whole or in part, wanting in modern sectarian churches. I will proceed, in this number, to point out several other obvious departures from the apostolic model.

I. The offices of the church.—These, in the first churches, were ordinary and extraordinary. Those who filled the extraordinary offices, such as apostles, prophets, &c. were endowed with extraordinary, or miraculous gifts, which were continued, by the head of the church, only so long, as in his wisdom, he perceived them to be necessary, in order to the impartation and confirmation of the truth, and the propagation of Christianity. At this point extraordinary gifts ceased—and with their cessation, as a matter of necessity, extraordinary officers and offices; leaving the church in the possession of a completed and sealed system of revelation, and of all ordinary gifts—officers and offices essential to her welfare until time shall end. These officers were evangelists or preachers, bishops or elders, and deacons—these offices being obviously indicated—these and no more—by the wants of the church and of the world; the whole organism, the admirable production of him "who was meek and lowly of heart," and "whose yoke was easy, and whose burden was light"—an institution, therefore, antagonistic to all church hierarchies and clerical lordships—in which Christian love should be the most excellent gift, and "the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God" its divine, its enduring, its authoritative, its only bond of union.

But how is it, in respect to church officers and offices, in modern denominations? The Presbyterians, if they held no church court but "the session," would, perhaps, in respect to officers, approach nearest the apostolic model. The Presbyteries, however, and Synods, and General Assemblies, are as unauthorised, both in Scripture precept and example, as the proud and arrogant assumptions of the Popes of Rome. And what effrontery to call these "courts of Jesus Christ!" When did our Saviour establish or organize any courts, such as these? Never! When did the apostles? Never! I challenge the whole Presbyterian hierarchy to show me, in the New Testament, their authority for any courts of Jesus Christ but a Christian congregation! If Christianity authorizes us to recognize any hierarchy whatever, it is that of Jesus Christ and his prime ministers, the apostles. They, although they died, yet speak, and will to the end of the world—the source of the only legitimate religious authority; each properly organized congregation being the body of Christ, and independent, as it regards government, of all other congregations.

The Baptists, too, as respects their officers, approach very nearly the apostolic model. The chief departure, in this respect, is, that, whereas the apostolic churches, had a plurality of elders to one church, the Baptists have a plurality of churches to one elder! Titus was left in Crete in order to ordain elders in every city, whilst Paul and Barnabas ordained elders in every church. These references indicate the order of the first churches, in regard to elders, and prove that the Baptists have reversed Christ's order in this particular.

Well, what shall we say of our friends the Methodists, in regard to their officials? Why, beyond successful contradiction, not one of their church officers, or offices, was recognized in the apostolic church! Where do we read, in the apostolic writings, of class leaders, circuit riders, presiding elders, and bishops—not over one congregation—but over many congregations!—a clerical aristocracy arrogating to themselves more power than Christ ever delegated, even to the apostles? All these are just as certainly unauthorized by Christ, as are the officials of the Episcopalians, the Church of England, and the Romanists—popes, cardinals, archbishops, bishops, priests, presiding elders, circuit-riders, class-leaders! Who does not see that these are all of a piece—all alike without divine authority—mere human inventions in religion—and if the principles laid down in my seventh number are correct, treasonable? O! conscientiousness, whither hast thou fled! Is it possible that men can have a genuine reverence for God, who against the clearest teachings of his word, create ecclesiastical offices which Christ never created?—proud offices for high officials, never ordained by Jesus Christ? If they have been false to their trust, in regard to officials, what perversions and corruptions may we not expect from them in other departments of Christianity?

II. Baptism. — This ordinance has been the subject of wrangling for centuries. The Baptists, amid all their schisms, in regard to other questions, have steadfastly adhered to “believers’ baptism,” and that this baptism is immersion; but they have, to a great extent, lost sight of the design of baptism: whilst the innumerable hosts of Pædo-baptists, including the Romish church, if we accept a minority of modern Pædo-baptists, have believed and taught that baptism is “for the remission of sins.” Now, the following propositions can, I am morally certain, be fully sustained by the Scriptures.

1. That none but immersed believers were admitted to membership in apostolic church.

2. That baptism was administered to believers for the remission of sin.

I have neither inclination nor space to argue these questions at present. I leave to every person who desires to read the arguments on this subject, to read well to read “Theodosia, or the History of Faith,” a Baptist work, on which the Baptists style the subjects and the design of baptism; and Campbell’s work, titled, “Baptism, with its Antecedents and Consequents,” including not the subjects and actions, but also the design of baptism. Should these fail to convince the attentive reader desirous to know the truth, I should despair of advancing anything of sufficient power and conclusiveness, for the attainment of so desirable an object whilst should any be so supine, and so stultified by prejudice, as to possess no inclination for investigation, they have placed themselves beyond the reach of argument, and would not, in all probability, believe — unless a spirit should whisper in their heart — “thoughts should rise from the dead!”

But the distracting bickerings and wranglings of belligerent sects aside, it is certain that immersion is a valid baptism; and it is also certain that it commanded believing penitents to be baptized for the remission of their sins, and it is also certain, and generally admitted by learned Pædo-baptists, that there is neither example nor precept for infant sprinkling or membership. Put these things together, and what is the sum. Why, 1st, If we refuse to baptize a babe, or to suppose that the apostles baptized babes, we violate no law we commit no sin, there being no divine law enjoined in infant baptism; and, as, if we baptize a child, in the name of Jesus, without a divine command, we commit a great sin. 2nd, If we baptize for remission, we do what the obvious import of Peter’s words require. If he did not mean what he said of course, never can, in this world, know what he did mean ; and holding fast to the most obvious meaning of his words, we feel ourselves perfectly secure, unless God — as he never will — should condemn us for being foolish enough to believe that Peter meant what he said. And 3rd, If immersion is a valid baptism—as certainly it is—then, we have no use for sprinkling and pouring, having one perfect unmistakable baptism without these ; whilst, should sprinkling and pouring not be baptism—and they are founded on mere opinion—and we call that baptism, in the name of Jesus, which he has never acknowledged as baptism, we mislead, and delude, and victimize those who receive sprinkling and pouring from our hands, as baptism. Nay, worse!—I am told that many who are advocates for the validity of sprinkling and pouring, have introduced even other modes ! Some lay, very delicately, two or three damp fingers on the forehead — others wipe the forehead with two or three damp fingers—and others, after damping the fingers, pat the forehead ! And all this is baptism, is it ? O, bleeding, mangled Christianity, how art thou insulted and dishonored by a multitude of those who profess to be thy friends ! Immersion, by some of them, is said to be “ indecent, vulgar,” &c. ; but, if any are so unreasonable as to be dissatisfied with anything short of immersion, these beautifully consistent persons will administer the vulgar ordinance in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost !

I have no doubt, that the growing of the church, in the apostacy, into a hierarchy, to be governed by lordly ecclesiastics, had much to do in the introducing into the church sprinkling and pouring, as substitutes for immersion, as well as whole legions of other humanisms. Wading into rivers would wet the rich and beautiful robes of priestly grandees ; and besides, such a dabbling and splashing operation could not but be exceedingly distasteful to persons reared amid wealth and splendour, and all the gorgeous trappings of opulence and office. Whilst they could do no better, immersion would be entrusted to the inferior officers of the church ; but these not having spirituality enough to appreciate its importance, and, moreover, considering it a menial employment, would sigh for its abrogation. In the mean while, the sprinklings and pourings of water upon the rich, called clinical baptism, gained favour in public estimation, until, for the reason assigned, and perhaps others, it, to a great extent, supplanted immersion ; and the multitude, as now, and for some two or three hundreds of years past, came to think, contrary to all authentic church history, and the teachings of the Scriptures, that the apostles really practiced sprinkling and pouring as baptism !

III. The Lord's Supper. — Every church history, and every commentator that I have read, so far as I now recollect, teach that the apostolic church commemorated the Saviour's death, in the ordinance of the Lord's supper, on every Lord's day. And such is the testimony of the Fathers, up to Justin Martyr, who lived and wrote only one hundred and forty years after Christ. The Scriptures also teach the same. “ On the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread,” must mean every first day, just as “ remember the Sabbath, to keep it holy,” means remember every Sabbath. Should this not be acceded to, we are left at perfectly loose ends as to when the supper should be observed. Once a week, once a month, once a quarter, once a year, once in a lifetime, would be equally scriptural. But the first day commemorates the Saviour's resurrection ! Why commemorate his resurrection fifty-two times a year, and his death but four times, or not at all ? These hints may suffice to show the fitness of observing the Lord's supper on every Lord's day. But this practice of the apostolic church is almost wholly neglected by the sects. The Romish church converted the bread of the Lord's supper into a wafer, and immersion into sprinkling and pouring, while the priest drank the wine himself. The Protestant sects, all except the Lutherans, repudiate the wafer—some repudiate sprinkling and pouring, and some one thing, and some another; but all seem well contented to dishonor the Lord's supper by spending some forty-eight Lord's days, in a year, without its observance. A strange deterioration, if these are, indeed, the churches of Christ. Is this according to the pattern shown to them in the mount? Has denominational selfishness so swallowed them, as the great fish swallowed Jonah, that they have more regard for self-aggrandizement, than for the exaltation of our Lord Jesus, our all in all, the great Head of the church?

In the Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge, under the head of ecclesiastical polity, we learn, that all Protestants, immediately after the Reformation, with the exception of the Baptists, whilst they abjured the Papal supremacy, were united in holding that the mode of administering the church might be varied; some of them being attached to Episcopacy, and others to Presbytery. Some contended that "the whole regulation of the church pertained to the magistrate." This was Erastinism. This view met with a very general opposition. But those who were the opposers of the views of Erastus, "agreed in admitting that there was no model prescribed in the New Testament for a Christian church, as there had been in the Mosaic economy for the Jewish church, and that it was a branch of the liberty of the disciples of Christ, or one of their privileges, to choose the polity which seemed to them best adapted for extending the power and influence of religion."

"From this fundamental mistake," continues the above author, "it is needless to say what confusion and have arisen in Christendom. Every foundation grew up the whole of Papal superstition, and all the divisions amongst Protestants. Never will these divisions be removed, nor those superstitions purged away, until the great principle is universally and fully recognized, that there is no vine model of church government prescribed in the New Testament; and that the apostolic practice, under the name of Christ, is designed as a universal pattern. Did ever any man think of a different hypothesis till he found an example against him? Why did he not observe the first day Sabbath? Why did the apostolic churches are not a model for us, the descriptions of them, and the directions given to them, are unimportant to us. Why are we called upon to follow the lower of the apostles without exception or limitation? And why are the New Testament churches regarded as the earlier as patterns?"

Thus, the reader will perceive, that the reformers plunged into a state of error, if not unbounded latitudinarianism, in regard to church polity. Nor have the bitter fruits of this licentiousness been produced. We perceive that the disputably exhibited in the organization of every hierarchy now comprised in the Christian world, is a pugilistic and self-neutralized system of testantdom. And from a defective conscientiousness in regard to church polity, how easy the transition to an equally defective conscientiousness in regard to baptism, and the suppression of any other distasteful apostolic command! Indeed, it is of every day occurrence, to call certain commandments of the Bible, which have been promulgated by the apostles, unessential! Is not this indicative of an alarming lax conscientiousness? Thus, by an admixture of things temporal and divine, might an indefinite multiplicity of churches be organized, with but little regard to the apostolic pattern—mere fancy churches!—everywhere, the Scriptures being considered essential by their organizers, which might conflict with their views of expediency. When will church builders have supreme respect to the one foundation, and to the rules of church building given by the apostles? When will they honor the command, "Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon."

Should any continue to doubt as to whether, or not, the Romish church changed baptism from immersion to sprinkling and pouring, I will give them, in the close of this paper, the testimony of Luther and Calvin. "The word baptize is a Greek word. It may be rendered immersion, as when we plunge something in water, that it may be entirely covered with water; and though that custom is abolished among the generality (for even children are not immersed, but only have a little water poured on them) nevertheless, they ought to be comparatively immersed, and immediately drawn out, for the etymology of the word requires it."—Luther. "Here," (John iii. 23) "we perceive how baptism was administered among the ancients, for they immersed the whole body in water."—Calvin. We have scores of other Pædo-baptist witnesses, if desired.

THE ADAPTATION OF THE BIBLE TO THE WANTS OF MAN.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE ADELPHIAN SOCIETY OF BETHANY COLLEGE, APRIL 30TH, 1859, BY E. MILLIGAN.

YOUNG GENTLEMEN OF THE ADELPHIAN SOCIETY,—It is now a well established principle in all sound philosophy, that every effect must correspond with the nature and character of the cause which produces it. If the cause is perfect, the effect will be perfect; but if the cause is in any way or measure inadequate, then the effect will also partake of the same marks of imperfection.

For the proof of this proposition, we may appeal to every effect in the universe, human and divine. Man is imperfect; and therefore, so are all his works. I know there are many ultra views taken of the philosophy of human nature. The mind of man is a pendulum, always vibrating between extremes on this, as well as on every other subject. Manicheism produced Pelagianism; and this again reacted in the school of Augustine. But without attempting to define the precise limits of human depravity, we may safely affirm, that fallen man has never yet accomplished any one thing, which, when weighed in the Divine balances, has not been found wanting.

And hence, man has always been experimenting—always aiming at perfection and never reaching it. Sometimes advancing, and sometimes retrograding; but never reaching the goal of the Infinite. If the Scotch system of Metaphysics is better than the Grecian, it is because Reid, Stewart, Brown, and Hamilton were permitted to sit at the feet of the Great Teacher. If Iowa has improved on the educational system of Virginia, it is because she has learned wisdom from the experiments of her sister Republics.

But God makes no experiments. His works are all perfect. When he had finished the drama of creation, he looked upon its tenantry, and pronounced all "very good." There was not a blemish—not a single imperfection in heaven, earth, or sea. The morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy, when they beheld this new-born earth rise out of chaos, and roll on majestically in the very identical orbit which the great Engineer and Architect of the universe had marked out for it, when he set a compass on the face of the deep—when he weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance.

The light was divinely adapted to the eye of man—the melody of nature to his ear—the atmosphere to the vital current and pulsations of his heart—and all the tenantry of Eden contributed to the enjoyment of Adam and his lovely bride, till stretching forth her hand, she plucked, she ate

“Of that forbidden tree whose mortal taste Brought death into the world, and all our woe.”

Then it was that “Earth felt the wound; and nature from her seat

Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe
That all was lost!”

I will not now attempt to refute the vain speculations that some have entertained respecting the origin of sin, and the alledged imperfections of the Divine arrangement. It is sufficient for our present purpose, to know that God is not the author of confusion; and that the most gifted son of Adam's race, has never yet imagined anything that will compare with the universe that God has created. Even the abuse of their most exalted privileges by men and angels, is but a shade in the picture; the permission of which was, no doubt, necessary to the perfection of the Divine plan.

“Cease then, nor order imperfection name;
Our proper bliss depends on what we blame.
All nature is but art unknown to thee—
All chance, direction which thou canst not see.
All discord, harmony not understood—
All partial evil, universal good.”

This is just as true of the Bible as it is of nature. Let the Divine authenticity of the Scriptures be conceded, which, for the present, we will assume, and it follows with all the clearness and force of demonstration, that they are perfectly adapted to the end and purpose for which they were given to man. To suppose that it could be otherwise would be contrary to all the analogies of nature. It would imply that He who made the eye, cannot see—that He who organized the ear, cannot hear—that He who formed the heart of man, is ignorant of its powers and susceptibilities—that Omnipotence could not supply the wants of a fallen creature—or, that He who so loved the world as to give His only begotten Son for its redemption, could and would tantalize his offspring, by giving them stones for bread, and the bitterness of wormwood for the water of eternal life.

For what purpose, then, was the Bible given to man? This is the question. To man as he is, it involves considerations of the very highest practical importance. I say emphatically to man as he is. For there was a time when he had no Bible—when he knew none—when no cloud intervened between him and his Creator—when he spoke to him, face to face, as a friend speaks to a confidential friend—when all was light, and life, and love in Eden's holy bowers.

But sin destroyed that happy union. It separated man from the source of his being and blessedness. It severed the ties that bound him to Divinity. And had not God mercifully interposed in his behalf, man would have wandered, as an outcast, in blackness and darkness for ever. The past and present state of the heathen world, is, indeed, a painful illustration of what all men must have been without the Bible.

But God had graciously provided a remedy. For seeing the end from the beginning, and knowing that man would forfeit his birthright to all the joys of both the terrestrial and celestial Paradise, he had made the scheme of redemption a part of his original plan. It was, no doubt, perfectly arranged and adjusted in mind of Jehovah, before his creative voice first broke the silence of eternity.

Ages rolled on. Ten thousand suns lighted up the vast vault of creation—the planets revolved in their respective orbits—the morning stars sang together—and myriads of myriads of happy spirits re-echoed the praises of Jehovah from the centre to the circumference of this vast and stupendous universe. But no ray of light from the Sun of Righteousness yet illuminated these heavens. In the unnumbered pages of nature's immense volume, there was not found one syllable on the scheme of redemption. No created eye had yet penetrated its depths—no human or angelic ear had yet been charmed with its Divine harmonies. It remained a secret—a most profound secret in the Divine mind, till after the conception and development of sin—till Adam and his disconsolate bride were about to bid farewell to all the pleasures of Eden. Then it was, in that dark and gloomy hour, when the poison of death was diffused throughout the entire constitution of that once happy pair—when despair filled their hearts—when they were about to look, for the last time, on the tree of life—on the groves, and flowers, and crystal streams of Eden—and when all the galleries of heaven were filled with sympathetic spectators; then it was that Jehovah uttered that most mysterious and awfully sublime oracle, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent."

This, I presume, was the most astonishing revelation ever made to heaven, earth, or hell. It could, indeed, scarcely yet be called a revelation. It was rather an index of mercy pointing to some scheme of philanthropy in the Divine mind; which, however, no seraph yet understood; and which was, for ages after, by way of eminence, called "The Mystery."

Time glided on. A font of types was cast to illustrate this greatest of all wonders. Prophecy, too, was added for the same purpose. Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and other prophets spoke in the most eloquent strains concerning a glorious system of things, which, however, they saw but obscurely in the far distant future.

At length the Messiah appeared—God manifest in the flesh—the wonder of all wonders! He became a prophet—and for three and a half years he instructed the people in things pertaining to the kingdom of God. But finally the vail was rent—the new and living way was opened—and the Great High Priest of the Christian Institution entered once into the Holy of Holies—and there, in the presence of adoring millions, he demonstrated through the offering of his own blood, how God can be just, and yet the justifier of all who believe in Jesus.

The mystery was then revealed to all the cherubim, the seraphim, and the redeemed in heaven; and ten days after this, it was also made known by the Apostles to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, through the inspiration of that Spirit that searches all things, yea, the deep purposes of Jehovah. From Jerusalem, the Apostles went to Samaria—thence to Antioch—and thence to the uttermost parts of the earth. Everywhere they proclaimed the mystery revealed; and the condition on which all men might become citizens of Christ's kingdom and obtain an abundant entrance into his everlasting kingdom hereafter.

The Bible, then, is a perfect revelation of a perfect system of Divine philanthropy, designed to promote the present happiness, and to secure the eternal felicity of all who will believe it, receive it, and obey it. And hence, says the beloved John, in the close of his narrative, "These things are written that ye may believe; and that believing ye may have eternal life through His name." And hence, says Paul, in his letter to the Romans, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth ; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." For in it, says he, God's plan of justification by faith, has been revealed in order to produce faith. For "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God."

It is not necessary to say anything here about the mechanical, the dynamical, or any other theory of inspiration. This is not required by our conclusion. Whether we know how God operates or not, of one thing we may be always certain : that whatever He does, is done perfectly. And therefore it follows, "a priori," with all the certainty and force of demonstration, that the Holy Scriptures are divinely adapted to the nature, the capacity, and the present condition of fallen man.

By this, I do not of course intend to say, that the Bible contains a full and complete revelation of all the plans and purposes of Jehovah—nor that it contains such a revelation, even of the whole system and economy of redemption—nor that it is all perfectly intelligible to any and every one who reads it. Such a book, however perfect in itself, would not be at all suited to the present wants of our fallen race. It is not merely the amount of knowledge contained in the Bible, nor the simplicity of its language, that makes that wonderful book what it is. It is the perfect harmony between means and ends—it is the Divine adaptation of it as a system to the entire wants of our nature, that makes the Bible infinitely more perfect than any work ever composed by an uninspired man.

The Sun might have been so constituted as to impart ten times the present amount of heat and light to the solar system ; but such an increase of these imponderables would certainly not have contributed to our enjoyment. The atmosphere might have contained a much greater proportion of the element that supports life and combustion ; but this would soon have exhausted the vital energies of the animal economy.

There is a relative beauty, fitness, and adaptation in every atom, Sun, and system of the physical universe. And these elements of Divine harmony, are just as perfectly preserved and as gloriously displayed in all parts of the Bible. The same Omniscient Being that created the oxygen, the hydrogen, the nitrogen, the carbon, and the other elements of our globe ; that arranged and compounded them, in reference to each other, and to the wants and capacities of every species of organized being, has also most benevolently framed the Holy Scriptures and adapted them to the entire moral, social, and religious wants and circumstances of the whole human race.

This is not a mere theoretical inference. An analysis of the book itself, brings us to the same conclusion. Where, for the sake of illustration, will you find another volume beneath the broad heavens, that is so well adapted to the capacity of the old and young, the wise and the unwise ? The very child is often led by the simplicity of the Bible narrative, to believe its Saviour, to love its Saviour, and to rejoice on a bed of death as it would on a bed of roses ; while, at the same time, the philosopher labours in vain to comprehend the full import of its meaning. He has, peradventure, exhausted the stores of human learning—he understands all that Leibnitz, La Place, Locke, and Newton ever wrote—he has found nothing in human philosophy too profound for the genius and capacity of his mighty intellect. But he has read the Bible—he has re-read it—and a hundred times has he pondered, with equal profit, on every word of its sacred pages ; and yet he dies with the confession on his lips, that he has never exhausted its rich treasures of wisdom and knowledge—that, in fact, the great ocean of Divine truth lies before him still unexplored.

If anything more is necessary to the full and complete demonstration of our proposition, it may all be found in the historical development of Christianity. Even in the patriarchal age, those who followed the star light of the Gospel, were made holy and happy. "Enoch walked with God, and he was not ; for God took him." Abraham was constituted the father of the faithful, and honoured above all the sages and philosophers of antiquity, simply on account of his profound reverence for the Word of the Lord. The wilderness of Arabia was a dark and gloomy solitude—but the Israelite who kept his eye on the pillar of cloud by day, and on the pillar of fire by night, was in no danger of falling into snares himself, nor of enticing others to forsake the narrow way that led to the land of promise. The Tabernacle, like the New Jerusalem, received no light from the Sun, Moon, or the stars. A fourfold covering of fine linen, goats' hair, rams' skins, and badgers' skins, excluded every external ray from the inner courts of that symbolic edifice. But the priest that walked in the light of the golden candlestick, had no need of the light of nature. The seven lamps and the eye of reason and common sense, were a sufficient guide.

Still more glorious, however, was the illumination of the Sun of Righteousness. Looking down through the long vista of future ages, Isaiah beheld the wilderness and the solitary place rejoicing under the genial and renovating influence of that most glorious luminary of the moral universe. The eyes of the blind were opened—the ears of the deaf were unstopped—the lame man leaped as a hart—the tongue of the dumb began to sing—and the way of holiness became perfectly plain to the eye of the astonished Prophet.

The last object seems to have, in a very special manner, attracted his attention; and therefore, he very narrowly and carefully considered whatever he saw upon it. The passengers were all very select. There was no lion there, nor any other kind of ravenous beast; and no unclean person polluted it. But there were the pious of every rank and order. There was the true philosopher; and there was one of the very weakest intellect; one “— who never had a dozen thoughts in all his life, and never changed their course,

But told them o'er, each in its customary place

From morn till night, from youth till hoary age.

Little above the ox which grazed the field,
His reason rose: so weak his memory

That the name his mother called him by he scarce

Remembered; and his judgment so untaught,

That what at evening played along the swamp

Fantastic, clad in robe of fiery hue,
He thought the Devil in disguise, and fled

With quivering heart and winged footsteps home.

The word philosophy, he never heard,
Nor science: never heard of liberty,
Necessity, nor laws of gravitation:
And never had an unbelieving doubt."

And yet that man was one of the redeemed—he was one of the ransomed of the Lord who were returning and coming to Zion with songs and everlasting joys upon their heads; and who shall hereafter walk the golden streets of the New Jerusalem.

This glorious vision of the prophet was fully realized by the primitive church. In Jerusalem, for example, through the simple instrumentality of the Word of the Lord, and the demonstration of the Holy Spirit, three thousand persons were, on one day, translated from darkness to light, and from under the power and dominion of Satan into the kingdom of God's dear Son. No doubt was then entertained respecting the Apostle's meaning. The way of salvation was so plain, that all did understand it. The people simply heard the Word—they believed it—they obeyed it—and on the same day, they were added to the congregation of the saved.

But they did not stop there. They continued steadfast in the Apostle's teaching, and in the fellowship, and in the breaking of the loaf, and in the prayers. And great grace was upon them all.

Why, then, has not this happy state of things always continued in the church? Why has not Christianity triumphed over all opposition? Why have the kingdoms of this world not yet become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his anointed? Why has not every city on earth become a Jerusalem? And why has not every succeeding day of the reign of heaven, been a new Pentecost?

It is not because the Gospel has changed. It is not because the Bible is now less adapted to the genius, wants, and circumstances of human nature, than it was eighteen hundred years ago. But it is simply because the followers of Jesus Christ have not always, like the Primitive Christians, CONTINUED STEADFAST IN THE APOSTLES' TEACHING. Like the ancient Jews, they have committed two great evils: they have ignored the Bible—and they have substituted for it, the vain and empty dreams of human philosophy.

These are certainly strange phenomena in the history of human nature. We might reasonably suppose that the children would have learned more wisdom from the experience of their fathers: that four thousand years of darkness, superstition, misery, and crime, would have taught mankind the folly of attempting to solve the great problems of human happiness and of human destiny, without the aid of Divine Revelation: and that no one who had once beheld the full-orbed glories of the Sun of Righteousness would ever again be bewildered by the ignis fatuus of a deceitful and false philosophy.

"When the young eagle, with exulting eye,
Has learned to dare the splendor of the sky,
And leave the Alps beneath him in his course,

To bathe his wings in morn's empyreal
source,

Will his free wing from that majestic height
Descend to follow some wild meteor's light,
Which far below, with evanescent fire
Shines to delude, and dazzles to expire?

No! still through clouds he wings his upward way,
And proudly claims his heritage of day."

But the eagle has never suffered, from the pernicious influence of a false education. It has never felt the enslaving power of prejudice. This is one of the evil demons that are found only in the human heart; and it is the very last of the legion, to relinquish its dominion over the powers and susceptibilities of the soul.

The Apostles were certainly as free from its influence as are most other men. Their occupations, habits of life, and idiosyncracies of character, were all favourable to at least an ordinary degree of mental independence. But a term of three and a half years in the school of Him, who taught as man never taught, was not sufficient to free their minds from the obnoxious biases of a false education. So great, indeed, was the power of prejudice over the whole intellectual and moral constitution, that they did not, and could not understand some of the plainest and most important oracles that ever fell from the lips of their Divine Master. What, for example, could be plainer, than the language of the commission, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature?' But the demon of prejudice whispered in their ear, "This means every creature of the elect world." And when, on the day of Pentecost, Peter said to his inquiring auditors, "The promise is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even to as many as the Lord our God shall call;" the broad and comprehensive terms of this proclamation, were at once in his mind, restricted to the narrow limits of his own sectarian creed.

The Apostles had yet no idea that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs with the Jews—the mystery was not yet revealed to them in all its length, and breadth, and fulness. And therefore, it was necessary to convince Peter, by a special miracle, that God is no respecter of persons, but that in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him, before he would consent to proclaim the good news and glad tidings of life and salvation even to the family and friends of the devout Cornelius.

But, while he was speaking, "The Holy Spirit fell on all them that heard the word. And they of the circumcision who believed, were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Spirit. For they heard them speak with tongues and magnify God."

This was, of course, sufficient to satisfy Peter and the six brethren that accompanied him. But the prejudice of the multitude was not yet removed. The report was, doubtless, soon circulated far and wide, that Peter—the bold, courageous, and heroic Peter—had transcended the limits, not only of the great commission, but even of the Divine benevolence itself. And therefore, when he came up to Jerusalem, he was summoned to appear before his Jewish brethren to answer to the grave charge, "Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised and didst eat with them." But when they heard Peter's defence, "they held their peace and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life."

Henceforth, the extension of the commission was a settled question; but its comprehension was still a subject of earnest debate, and of bitter controversy. The Hebrew converts were exceedingly zealous for the traditions of their fathers—and many of them still said to the people, "Unless ye be circumcised and keep the law of Moses, ye cannot be saved." From their very infancy their minds had been thoroughly moulded in their own Rabbinical traditions. They saw everything through a false medium—and therefore, they never could enjoy the pure sun-light of heaven's own effulgence. Like their fathers, they continued to make void the law of the Lord, by associating with it the doctrines, the precepts, and the commandments of men.

The influence of Gentile prejudice was equally pernicious. If the Jewish mind was fettered by the false theory of the Scribes and Pharisees, the Gentile was equally enslaved by the tenets of Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, Epicurus, Zoroaster, and other party leaders.

It is true, indeed, that for a short time, the power of the gospel seemed to neutralize everything else. Under its potent influence some of the very worst forms of human nature were moulded into the image and likeness of Him, who became flesh and dwelt among us. Many of the Egyptian, Persian, Grecian, Roman, and other idolatrous nations, renounced their superstitions, destroyed their idols, and consecrated themselves, in body, soul, and spirit, to the services of the Lord.

But the early impressions of a false education were not yet wholly eradicated. Nothing less than a special miracle could have done this. Evil habits are a second nature—and therefore, it was an easy matter to revive old associations. Soon the old leaven began to work. The Bible was neglected. And from that hour the rights and ceremonies of Heathen Mythology, have been more or less associated with the pure Gospel in every society on earth, that claims to be the church of Jesus Christ. Rome is full of them. And even Protestantism has not yet been wholly purified from the leprous contact of Pagan and Papal abominations.

By this remark, I would not detract one iota from the honour that is due to the great and good reformers of the sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries. They have turned many to righteousness, and will, therefore, shine as a star of the first magnitude in the firmament of God's everlasting kingdom.

But if the Apostles, under the influence of plenary inspiration, did not for some years understand the full import of their own commission, surely it is not wonderful that men, educated in the lore of mystic Babylon, should fail to comprehend at once, the length and breadth, the depth and height of the truth as it is in Jesus. If with an honest heart and a good conscience, Peter could say to the people, "The promise is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off," and nevertheless, continue to regard and treat the whole Gentile world as unclean; surely it is no marvel, that Luther should declaim against the errors of Popery, while he was himself celebrating the mass—that Calvin should expose the persecutions of Rome, and at the same time cause Michael Servetus to be put to death for opposing the doctrine of the Trinity—and that Chillingworth should proclaim "The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible," as the religion of Protestants, and yet consent to fetter the minds of the rising generation, with the absurd formula of an uninspired creed.

Nay, verily; let us rather wonder that since these fathers fell asleep, so few have risen to advocate the paramount claims of Divine Revelation. It is true, that much has been done for the Bible cause within the present century. But how much remains to be done, in order to restore the Holy Scriptures to their proper place, as the only intallible and authoritative standard of Christian education, Christian faith, and Christian practice! How many parents in every community, pay no regard whatever to the religious education of their children! How many still continue to mould the minds of their infant offspring in the patent forms of Edinburgh, Westminster, or Philadelphia! How little Bible training, or even Bible reading, is now practiced in the church, in the school, or in the family circle! And even in our theological seminaries, how often is the Bible laid aside and treated as a mere book of reference, while the minds of the students are thoroughly cast and moulded in the Institutes of Calvin, the Divinity of Dwight, or the theological system of some other uninspired man! And as a consequence of all this neglect, how seldom is the Bible made the theme of conversation in any of the public, or private, or social circles of modern Christendom !

Such, then, are in brief, the reasons why the last eighteen centuries have not been one continued and uninterrupted season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. It has not been owing to any defect in heaven's appointed means—but to the general neglect of them. The Bible cannot produce a change where it is not. It must be received by the understanding, and cherished in the heart, before it can reform the life.

No one ascribes imperfection to the Sun, because it does not impart colour to the flower that blooms in the dungeon. It is sufficient evidence of its perfection, that it gives health and vitality to every thing within the sphere of its influence. This is all that we claim for the light of Divine Revelation. And this much we have proved, a priori and a posteriori.

But the historical argument may be indefinitely extended. Every successive period of the Christian era, furnishes some new proof, that the Bible is divinely adapted to the wants and genius of human nature. Even during the world's midnight, when darkness covered the earth, and gross darkness the people, the few who followed the star of Bethlehem, safely navigated the sea of life, and found a calm and sure repose in the heaven of eternal rest.

As we pass from the eleventh to the sixteenth century, the light gradually increases. And since the beginning of the German Reformation, facts have so accumulated, that the historical evidence of this period alone now amounts almost to demonstration. Indeed, the present map of the world is enough to satisfy any one who honestly seeks for the truth. What is it, for example, that has so far elevated Protestant England over Catholic Spain and priest-ridden Italy ? Why are the United States so far superior to Mexico and the Republic of South America, in all that adorns, refines, and purifies human nature ? The primary cause of all this can be found only in the Bible. You cannot find it in the fertile soils of these countries. You cannot find it in their balmy atmosphere. Nor, can you find it, even in their civil and political institutions.

But you can find it in the relative use that the people have made of that Divine Magna Charta in which God has revealed to us all things that pertain unto life and godliness.

I know, this is only an approximation towards the point at which we aim. But if the natural philosopher can justly infer, that a ball rolled on a plane surface would for ever move in a straight line, were it not opposed by some external forces ; which forces, however, he can never remove ; then may not the Christian philosopher conclude with equal certainty, that if all things that now oppose the truth were taken out of the way, and the Bible were permitted to assert its whole Divine influence on the human soul, it would, with the blessing of God and the energy of the Holy Spirit, in a very short time, reunite all the scattered fragments of the Protestant world, and cause the moral deserts of the earth to rejoice and blossom as the rose ?

Such, indeed, is the attractive power of the Living Oracles, that all the obstacles of a false education, and the inventions of modern priestcraft, are often not sufficient to keep apart the purest and most enlightened members of sectarian churches. Ever and anon, the artificial bonds of these associations are burst asunder, and like drops of heavenly dew, their kindred spirits mingle into one. This has often happened within the last twenty years—and such events will become more frequent just in the ratio of our progress in Biblical education. If such is the plastic nature of the infant mind, that it may, during the process of its development, be easily cast into the mould of Mahometanism, Brahmanism, Buddhism, Catholicism, or any of the numerous forms of Protestantism ; it would, indeed, be remarkable, if a system framed by the finger of God, and divinely adapted to all the wants, capacities, and circumstances of the human soul, should fail to unite in the bonds of Christian affection, all who have been properly educated in its provisions, and who honestly seek to know the truth as it has been revealed by the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven.

I have now, by a long and circuitous route, reached the object, if not the subject, of my address. The practical bearing of all that I have said, is to demonstrate the great importance, or re-ther the absolute necessity of a more general, thorough, and systematic course of BIBLE TRAINING.

By this, I do not mean merely, that we need more preaching, more teaching, or more exhortation. All these are, of course, necessary; but none of them will supply the want of Bible training. It is one thing to impart knowledge, and a very different matter to train, discipline, or educate the human mind. Many a youth, ten years of age, now knows more about the Christian system than did Abraham, Moses, Isaiah, David, or even John the Baptist. But it would be very difficult to find a youth in the nineteenth century, who had received a better religious education than any one of these ancient worthies.

The mind, then, must be developed, and thoroughly moulded in the Living Oracles. We would not, of course, exclude all other books and sources of information; but we would regard and treat them all as subordinate to the Bible. The Book of Life has too long been laid on the shelf as a mere work of reference. We would take it down from its neglected position—we would wipe away the accumulated dust of days and weeks, of months and years. We would substitute it for the novel, and every other form of corrupt literature in the family circle—for all human systems and bodies of Divinity in the theological seminary—and in every school, academy, college, and university, we would make it a subject of as profound study and as rigid examination, as the Logic of Aristotle, the Geometry of Euclid, or the Fluxions of Newton.

Let this mode of instruction be generally adopted in every department of education—let the minds and hearts of the rising generation be thoroughly moulded in the institute of heaven's own appointment; and soon the religious aspect of society will be very greatly changed—soon—very soon, "The wolf will dwell with the lamb, and the leopard will lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatling together; and a little child will lead them. And the cow and the bear will feed: their young ones lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the suckling child will play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child will put his hand on the cockatrice's den. For then the knowledge of the Lord will cover the whole earth, as the waters cover the sea."

My dear young friends,—You have the premises before you. And now, in view of these important facts and principles, I submit to you individually, to say what is your duty to yourselves, to your country, and to your God. You are all looking forward to some calling that will be at once both honourable and useful. Some of you will soon engage in the active pursuits and business of life. In a few weeks, we shall be separated; perhaps never to meet again, until we meet around the great white throne.

Let me, then, remind you, with all the solemnity of a final farewell, that just in proportion as you study the Holy Bible yourselves, and induce others to study it, just in that proportion will you succeed in all your attempts to promote the glory of God and the well-being of humanity. But remember that faith without works is dead, being alone—that theory without practice, is like the body without the soul—and that it is only the man who hears these things, and who does them, that builds on a sure foundation, and that erects for himself a monument that will stand "—amidst the war of elements,

The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds."

POSITIVE AND MORAL OBEDIENCE.

We have seen it our duty, as we have felt it our interest, to take the difference between the moral and the positive obedience of our religion, as it appears in professors of the gospel.

One without the other is not best. To see the ruler of a congregation exact in his attendance on the ordinances of public worship with unsubdued passions, ill-regulated affections, and a heart surcharged with the love of the world, is not lovely, and strictly speaking, it is profane.

Also to hear a brother boasting of being right in baptism, when his opponent knows him to be wrong in piety and general benevolence to the poor, is disgusting and irreligious. It is Pharisaic and insufferable.

Again—to behold a person professing to be religious, apologize for his non-attendance on the ordinances of God's house, by saying that he is, perhaps, as good as those who do—is shocking. It is to admit that God is the author and proprietor of our religion, and at the same time to obliterate the land-marks by which it is bounded and distinguished from the world which is not of God, but lieth in the wicked one.

The rule of the Redeemer is this :—“Those (the weightier matters of the law—justice, mercy, and the love of God) you ought to have done, and not left the other (the positive ordinances) undone.”

How admirable and perfect is our teacher!

There is this admirable and marked distinction between positive and moral institutions—the former are for a man's own benefit, the latter are for the benefit of others. By the one he is blessed, by the other he is made a blessing. The person who kept the Sabbath under the law was blessed, but he who kept the Sabbath, and did good, was blessed and made a blessing. So now, he who eats the supper on the first day of the week is blessed, but he who does this, and on the same day remembers the poor, the widow, and the fatherless, is both blessed and made a blessing.

Positive institutions have no foundation in nature, but in the will of God only. Moral laws are enforced by the double argument both of nature and the divine authority. The former is neglected at the man's own peril, the latter at the peril of society. Neglect of the positive institutions of religion proves that a man is defective in religious principles—abandonment of its moral obligations demonstrates that he is defective both in religion and morals. Or that he is unsound in character.

One of the grand mistakes into which the people of our Redeemer's time had fallen, seems to have been this; that they had substituted the positive obedience of tithes, &c. for the religious obedience of justice, mercy, and the love of God. They hoped by strict attendance on the one to atone for their neglect of the other.

A very remarkable instance of this blind adoration of positive ordinances occurred but lately among us, who name ourselves Christians. About thirty persons very abruptly, and in the worst feelings imaginable, broke off from a parent church, and immediately afterwards invited the world, by public advertisement, to come to their place of worship and witness the ancient order of things. Now the ancient order of things ought to be revered and attended to, but not at the forfeiture of brotherly kindness and the moral charities, and virtues, and graces of the gospel of Christ. To invite the world to see our order, when we are at the very moment denying our charity to our brethren, is profane.

Many seem now to eat the supper, &c. on the first day of the week, as a sort of quietus to their undiscerning consciences. Many sit at the table of the Lord, who, although they have it in their power to do good, do nevertheless make themselves remarkable for not one good thing. They are utterly without acts of benevolence and deeds of love and charity. This much will they have to say at last—“Lord, have we not ate and drank at thy table?”

Nothing, then, will do for any of us, but that the Lord cross us and crush us in our health, wealth, reputation, and happiness; and so, by chastising us here, save us hereafter. “Whom I love, I rebuke and chastise” (Rev.)

AN EXPOSITION OF THE EPISTLE OF JAMES.

CHAPTER I.

JAMES, a servant of God, and Christ, to all Jewish Christians, wherever dispersed, greeting:

Consider it, my brethren, as matter rather of joy than of grief, that you are exercised with various trials; as by these you learn submission to the Divine will. When your hearts are truly formed by this holy exercise, you have attained the perfection of religion. Through human power indeed this holy temper is not to be attained. It is fervent prayer to God that will draw his assistance on the pious endeavours of his servants. But your prayers must be founded in faith. The unsteady Christian must never expect his petitions to reach the throne of God. Our holy religion furnishes proper consolation to every station of life. Are we in a low condition? Let us consider to what a heavenly state we are exalted. Are we reduced from better circumstances? God hath providentially removed us from a multitude of temptations, which have oppressed us, and has, at worst, only taken from us that in course we must presently give up. Bear the trials then of this world with pious resignation, and look forward to that reward which awaits your perseverance.

Nor let any man pretend to excuse himself by saying, God throws temptations in his way. It is impious to suppose that a pure Being can be the author of sin. Every man's sins are certainly on his own head. He suffers his lusts to entice him. Hence sin is produced—hence death came into the world—and hence man's lost condition. Do not, then, my brethren, fall into so pernicious an error, but consider God unchangeable in his nature, as the author only of good. Through his free grace he created us. Through his free grace he hath redeemed us. Under a sense, therefore, of God's goodness to us, let us behave kindly to each other. Let us be humble-minded, open to conviction, and particularly careful not to mix heat and animosity with our religious differences. The passionate advocate never advances the cause of religion. Lay aside, therefore, every degree of bitterness. That Holy Gospel which is to save your souls can be received only in a spirit of meekness. Remember, that religion does not consist in hearing the truth, but in practicing it. Everything else is self-deceit. The gospel is the great rule of life and manners; and he who does not use it as such, is like a man who looks merely in a glass for curiosity, but leaves it instantly, without examining what defects in his appearance he should rectify. He only can receive any advantage from the gospel, who examines it so as to govern himself by its precepts. Nor must he consider his religion as sincere if it lead him into uncharitable and bitter language, instead of those benevolent actions, and that heavenly conversation, in which religion so much consists.

CHAPTER II.

Besides the animosities which I fear may prevail among you, I must take notice of another thing which is exceedingly wrong; and that is your partiality to people in higher stations. If dress influence you on one hand, or mean apparel on the other, you certainly guide your decisions by a very unchristian rule. Consider, my brethren, how your Almighty Father acts. Doth he make any difference between the poor and the rich? Are they not all equal heirs of his promises? Yet these poor you have despised, notwithstanding the rich are they who chiefly oppress you, and profane that Holy Name which you revere. That most excellent rule of your religion, to love your neighbour as yourself, teaches you a different practice, and strongly opposes all this unjust partiality. For there is such a connection between all the duties of religion, that he who lives in the known breach of one would break any of the rest if he were under the same temptation. The general precept of loving our neighbour, equally enjoins every duty to him. He, therefore, who is guilty of one offence against his neighbour, would as readily be guilty of another. But let me hope that you will regulate your actions, not by Jewish prejudices, which makes exceptions to persons, but by that equal law of Christianity which prescribes universal love. The unmerciful and malicious man, you know, by the whole tenor of the gospel, is laying up for himself future mischief; while mercy to man will certainly meet a return of mercy from God. Nay, further; be assured that without works of charity, even the great principle of faith is of no avail. Can faith alone, do you suppose, save you? See how it appears in common life. A person in distress presents himself to you. You tell him you are fully convinced of his unhappy condition, and heartily wish him relief. But if your belief of distress carry you no further than good wishes, is it of any advantage to him? Just in the same way, faith, unaccompanied by good works, signifies nothing; and it is an undoubted truth, that there is no way of showing the soundness of your faith, but by the purity of your lives. Nor is this any new doctrine. Faith, under the Jewish religion, had just the same tendency as under the Christian. If the Jew merely believed in God, he did no more than the devils do, who believe and tremble. Such a faith, unaccompanied by works, was dead. Was not Abraham's faith evidenced by works when he offered up Isaac on the altar? Was it not this mode of faith which showed his sincerity? Was it not through this he was justified? And was it not this which gained him the honorable title of the "friend of God?" You see, then, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only. The case of Rahab was the same. If she had professed her faith only in God, it had been nothing; but she showed the sincerity of it by her works—by receiving and dismissing the spies. Thus, as the body without the soul is dead, so the Jewish faith formerly, and the Christian faith now, are dead also, unless actuated by the enlivening spirit which draws faith into action.

CHAPTER III.

If, then, the profession of faith alone be not sufficient to make a Christian, you may be assured it is much less so to make a teacher. Let a man be careful, therefore, in taking upon himself this office. By misleading others he contracts double guilt. We have all our failings, but the religious Christian is so far from abusing the use of speech by indiscreet teaching, that he is careful even in his common conversation. A strict care over his words, he knows, is one of the best preservatives against sin. He who can govern his tongue, may be said to govern his life; just as the bit guides the horse, and the helm the ship. Though the tongue is a small instrument, its power is great. How mischievous a flame is often raised by a spark! Such a spark is the tongue. It is kindled in hell, and sets fire to the world. Full of deadly poison, it is more pernicious than serpents, more furious than the fiercest wild beast. How shocking is it to consider, that that tongue which was given us to bless God, is employed in cursing our fellow-creatures. Such contradictions appear in no part of creation but in man. We never see the fountain produce sweet water and bitter, nor the tree bear different kinds of fruit. Whoever, therefore, among you, pretends to real wisdom, let him show it in a restrained, gentle, and holy conversation, assuring himself that where strife and emulation prevail, there may be boasting of wisdom, but it is certainly of that kind which springs from worldly and sensual motives. Its fruit is mischief and confusion. Whereas, heavenly wisdom is pure and gentle, and open to conviction, and leads to all that holiness which possesses the mind of every peaceable man.

CHAPTER IV.

And here, my brethren, let me remind you of that calamitous state to which your nation is now reduced by your seditions and quarrels. Those bad passions which mislead your tongues, mislead also your actions. Your whole lives are given up to temporal views, which lead you to violence and mischief; and though you still preserve an outward form of worship, yet your petitions being wholly void of true devotion, are unacceptable to God. You are apostates from the truth! Know you not that he who is the friend of the world is the enemy of God? In vain do ye search the Scriptures. The spirit of truth can never dwell in envious hearts. The grace of God resists the proud, but flows in full measure upon the humble. Lay aside, then, all worldly-mindedness, resist the devil, turn truly to God, humble yourselves before him, wash away your sins by repentance, and God will open to you the gates of mercy.

And now, my brethren in Christ, let me next address myself to you. Though you have accepted the grace of God, yet be not harsh in condemning those who are not so happy. This is making yourselves judges of God's laws, instead of being humble observers of them. Do you pretend to issue that sentence, which can come only from the great Lawgiver himself? Look nearer home. I find even among you too much of this worldly spirit. You depend, in your worldly schemes, too much on yourselves, and on your prudence, not considering the uncertainty of all human things, which points out to you the necessity of depending on God. This is a kind of confidence, my brethren, which springs from an evil root ; and in you, who know better, it is certainly so much worse.

CHAPTER V.

You will soon be spectators of that misery and distress which is coming upon the powerful leaders of the Jews. What will be the end of all their wealth ? They have hoarded it up as an increase of their distress at this time. Their frauds and injustice will then rise up against them. The cry of their iniquities will reach to heaven, and of those pleasurable lives, which have been spent as in a Heathen riot on a day of sacrifice. But, above all, for their having put to death the Messiah, are they chiefly punished with this dreadful calamity.

Be you, however, my brethren, persecuted and distressed as you are, patient and resigned ; waiting for that happy time which will finish all your afflictions. See with what labour the husbandman toils through the year, in expectation of his harvest. And shall not you live in patient hope of that happiness which is to last through all eternity ? Strengthen your faith, then, with the great view of the glory of God. Lay aside all resentment against your persecutors, (which in every light is irrational) and leave them in the hands of Almighty justice. Take the prophets as examples of suffering. Read the account of the holy sufferer, Job. There see the goodness of the Lord in all the distresses of his servants, and how graciously he reaches out his hand to sustain them. As I exhort you thus to lay aside all persecuting thoughts, let me exhort you also to lay aside the common Jewish practice of swearing. Swearing in common conversation, either by God, or any of his creatures, is utterly forbidden by Christianity.

Finally, my brethren, turn every circumstance of life to your spiritual advantage. Are any in distress ? Let them pray to God. Are they happy ? Let them praise him. * Are they under God's correcting hand for their sins ? Let them send for the elders of the church, who, receiving their confession and resolutions of obedience, will pray over them ; and the prayers of the faithful shall raise them again to health, and their sins shall be forgiven. Prayer is our most effectual intercourse with God. On the prayers of Elijah, who was a mere man like us, the heavens were shut up, and rain fell not for more than three years. On his praying again, rain fell, and the earth produced fruit. Among all the works of charity, that of saving a soul from death, and covering up, as it were, the iniquities of a sinner, is the most pleasing to God.

SYNOPTICAL EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.—No. III.

Romans ii. 1-24.

It will very much assist your pupils in studying the Epistle to the Romans, to mark well the various peculiarities of Paul's style ; and especially, to note the very elliptical character of his writings. They have learned, from the study of grammar, that whatever is sufficiently plain to be understood by the reader, may be omitted by the writer. And hence, even the tyro in the study of language, is often heard to say that a certain word is governed by another word understood.

Now, there are logical as well as grammatical ellipses. And as the Romans were among the most highly educated of Paul's contemporaries, it is not wonderful that this letter should abound in such omissions. We have found several in the first chapter ; and it is very evident that another occurs at the beginning of the second. The proper antecedent of the conjunction "therefore," (δὲ) is suppressed, according to the general law of ellipsis. The argument against the Gentile world is so very conclusive, that all are compelled to acquiesce in it. Every man enlightened in the moral government of God, and especially the Jew, would at once exclaim, Paul, thou reasonest well. All such characters as you have described must be legally condemned. And hence, if any such are saved, it must, indeed, be, as you say, by grace.

* The persons here mentioned are such as (1 Cor. ii. 30) had drawn upon themselves God's displeasure for their sins. These were visitations known in the early ages of the church. We read that death, in some cases was inflicted ; and Paul sometimes threatens his backsliding converts, that he will visit them with a rod. Such cases, however, must not be drawn into modern example. The elders of the church may still, and ought still to pray with sick people ; but we have no authority to suppose the prayer of faith will restore them to health. I know no greater source of fanaticism, than the application of apostolic powers to modern times.

From their admission, then, tacitly given, Paul very adroitly turns from the Gentile to the Jew; and, in the course of the second chapter, clearly proves that the latter is legally just as much exposed to the wrath of God as the former.

But the transition is made gradually, and with the most consummate wisdom. Our author reasons first from the particular to the universal, and then from the universal to the particular. The first sixteen verses of the second chapter, are interposed between the facts and arguments which relate directly and specifically to the Gentile and to the Jew; and are occupied with the consideration of the same general principles of the Divine government.

In the first place, Paul affirms that the judgment of God is always according to truth; that it is, according to the real state of the case. No change of time, place, or circumstances, can ever effect the decision of Him whose throne is established in justice and in judgment. In human courts there is often room for the exercise of a thousand partialities. The evidence is sometimes defective—and the fundamental principles of justice are but partially understood. But God's own nature is the constitution of the moral universe. His will is the executive power. And hence, there is no place for any species of injustice in the Divine administration. The judgment of God, whenever exercised in the case of either Jew or Gentile, must, therefore, always be according to truth.

This is the fundamental thought of the entire section. Every thing else is subordinate. Every thing else would have been unnecessary, and the transition might have been made at once to the Jew, had not the prejudices of his early education, cherished and fostered by the tradition of the fathers, stood in the way. But as it was, the Jew was liable to misinterpret the dealings of God with the seed of Abraham. They had been elected for a particular purpose. To them God had always been long-suffering. And hence there was danger that the Jew might misconstrue the forbearance of God into a license to go on in the indulgence of sin.

To this point, then, the Apostle first turned his attention. He pronounces this to be an abuse of the goodness of God, which forms no exception to the truth of his first proposition. He avers that the forbearance and long-suffering of God, whenever and however exercised towards any people, are designed merely for their good—to lead them to repentance; and consequently, that all who neglect or despise the exercise of God's mercy, are only treasuring up for themselves wrath against the day of wrath—when the period of God's forbearance and of man's probation shall be ended—and when all men, both Jew and Gentile, shall be judged according to their works. "To those who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honour, and immortality, he will render eternal life. But unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, he will render indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish. These judgments he will then execute upon every soul of man that doeth evil—of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile, for there is no respect of persons with God."

To all this, however, the Jews had another objection. Like some theological predestinarians of the nineteenth century, many of them seem to have attached more importance to a speculative knowledge of the law than to the obedience which it requires; more to right thinking than to right acting. The very possession of the law, therefore; the mere hearing of its precepts, seems to have been pleaded as a ground of exemption from future punishment.

But on this hypothesis, Paul argues that the Gentiles might also sin with impunity. For though they have not the law of Moses, written on tables of stone, they have nevertheless the law of nature partially revealed, and written by the finger of God on the fleshy tables of their hearts. This is evident from their partial conformity even to the revealed law of Moses—for they do by nature some of those very things which the law requires. It may also be inferred by the dictates of their own consciences, as well as from their more deliberate judgments in which they mutually accuse and excuse one another, according as they do or do not transgress their own acknowledged standard of what is right and proper.

If, then, the mere hearing of the law revealed in the Pentateuch, were sufficient to justify the Jews on this hypothesis, it would follow that the Gentiles might also be justified by their knowledge of the law of God, as it is revealed in the book of nature. But this would prove too much. The question respecting the justification of the Gentiles has already been decided. It has been proved and conceded that they are all guilty before God, and that their not acting in harmony with their knowledge of what is right, is, in fact, the ground of their condemnation. And since it follows on the eternal principles of justice and impartiality by which God will judge the universe, that every Jew who has not perfectly conformed his whole life to the requirements of the written law, is also legally condemned to suffer the full measure of its incurred penalties. Nay, more; as it is a fundamental principle of the Divine government, that where much is given much will also be required—that all men will be judged according to the light which they have enjoyed—that those who have sinned without a written law shall be destroyed or punished without a written law—and that those who have sinned under the light and in the enjoyment of a written law, shall be tried and condemned, unless saved by the gospel, according to the tenor and precepts of the same law; it clearly and unequivocally follows, that so far from the mere hearing of the law being a ground of justification, it will only render more the intolerable, the final condemnation of all who disregard it.

These general principles of the Divine administration being disposed of, it only remains to inquire, by way of application to the Jews, whether they have or have not transgressed the law which God delivered to them through ranks of messengers, by the hand of Moses. It is a mere question of fact, and one which is very easily disposed of. In sustaining this part of his general proposition, Paul simply appeals in the first place to their own consciousness; and secondly, to the testimony of their own inspired writers. "Thou," says he, "that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that preacheest, a man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? Thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege? Thou that makest thy boast of God, through breaking the law dishonorest thou God?" Of this you are certainly guilty, for it is written, "The name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you" (Isa. lii. 5, and Ezekiel xxxvi. 20-22.)

Such, then, my dear brother, is Paul's manner of reasoning with, and with respect to the Jews. His argument is not yet finished. But lest I should weary you and your scholars with too long a lesson in logical analysis, we will pause here for the present, and look back at some matters of both theoretical and practical importance.

First, then, allow me to call your attention more particularly to the omniscience and omnipotence of God, as these attributes of the Divine nature are to be exercised in the final judgment. We can never sufficiently admire the creative power of Jehovah, by which not only worlds were made and systems arranged, but also by which every one of the millions of animalculæ that sport in a single drop of water was furnished with organs perfectly adapted to all the relations and circumstances of its being. Nor can we cease to wonder, that while God governs and regulates Suns, Moons, and stars, he at the same time clothes the lily, paints the rose, feeds the ravens, and numbers the very hairs of our heads.

But the scenes of the final judgment furnish us with a chapter on the power, and the wisdom, and the justice of God, that is no less interesting and overwhelming. It is not merely every bold and daring act of rebellion and extreme wickedness that will be brought into judgment. Nay, verily. When the great white throne shall appear in the heavens, and the books shall be opened, then will be found registered in the account of every man whose sins have not been blotted out by the blood of our Redeemer, every idle and foolish word that he has ever uttered — every secret thought and purpose of his heart — with every extenuating and aggravating circumstance of his nature, capacity, education, and external relations. The sentence will in every case be in exact and perfect harmony with the truth. The hypocrite will be unmasked — all the deep secret workings of the human heart will be revealed, and humanity will stand before the throne in the full open blaze of eternal justice, as transparent as the cloudless atmosphere of a Winter's morning.

"O! how tremendous is the thought!

Deep may it be impressed,
And may the spirit deeply grave
The truth in every breast!"

The long-suffering of God to guilty man, and the obligations which it imposes, is another subject which deserves our most profound consideration. If God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have eternal life, then why do not all men seek life through him? If God has spared the world, and furnishes us with all things pertaining to life and godliness, in order that all men might have time and opportunity to repent, then why do not all repent? What madness and folly to despise and to abuse the long-suffering and forbearance of God, in gratifying the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life, while treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath! What consternation and remorse will fill the hearts of the finally impenitent, when the vials of the wrath of the Lamb shall burst upon their guilty consciences! Oh! that all men would kiss the Son, lest they perish from the way when his wrath is kindled but a little!

It is farther evident from the premises considered, that God deals with all men, not according to their social or ecclesiastical privileges, but according to their real character—that it is a paramount duty of every man to glorify God, by continually seeking and striving after honour, glory, and immortality—that that system of religion cannot be true, whether founded in the decrees of God or in His benevolence, which has any tendency to make men feel safe, secure, or even indifferent, while they are living in a state of sin or rebellion—that the degrees of men's responsibilities, as well as of their future rewards and punishments, are very different — that all men will be judged according to the opportunities which they have enjoyed—that the Heathen are all legally responsible, and yet without the constraining grace and motives of the gospel—and consequently, that it is extremely doubtful whether any one of them will ever be saved.

On all these, and many other subordinate topics, I would like to say much. But my sheet is full, and our present lesson is sufficiently protracted. I must, therefore, leave the farther consideration of these interesting themes to you and your pupils, and bid you adieu for another moon.

REMARKS ON THE SECOND CHAPTER OF DANIEL

I WISH to submit a few remarks on the second chapter of Daniel. The Second Adventists say, as you are aware, that the kingdom of heaven has not yet been set up. They make the following points on Daniel ii.

1st. The legs of the image represent the division of the iron kingdom into Eastern and Western Rome.

2nd. The ten toes represent the same things that the ten horns do on the fourth beast in seventh chapter—that is, ten kings.

3rd. The territory occupied by the ancient Romans is now occupied by ten kings.

4th. "These kings," verse forty-fourth, mean the kings of modern Europe.

Hence they tell us Christ is coming soon, in the "days" of the present rulers of Europe, to set up his kingdom. On the above assumptions I remark first, it is absurd to say that the legs of the image represent division. The legs do not naturally represent division in the human body; they cannot in symbolic language. Supposing Rome had not been divided, then, if the legs represent division, the image would have had but one leg. But when was Rome divided? They tell us, in the days of Constantine, and it is doubtless true. But Rome was represented centuries before the days of Constantine by the legs of that image. Therefore, according to these grave expounders, Rome was represented in a divided state centuries before it was divided in fact. I have never yet seen an Adventist who could fairly meet that argument. If it was not a matter of so grave import, it would be amusing to hear them talk about the ten toes. How they ever ascertained that the image had ten toes, is more than I can imagine, unless they counted their own, and then guessed that the image had as many; for certain it is that Daniel is as silent as the grave, in relation to the number of toes. Now I challenge the whole fraternity to produce a single instance from God's book, wherein a toe represents the same thing that a horn does. A horn naturally represents power, but who can say that of a toe? This manner of interpreting the language of symbols, reduces the glorious imagery of the Bible to the most childish nonsense. I have yet to learn that there is a particle of evidence in all the Bible, to show that the toes of the image and the horns of the fourth beast, are identical in meaning.

Now what are the facts in relation to the horns of the beast? After this I saw in the night, visions; and behold a fourth beast, and it had ten horns; I considered the horns, and behold there came up another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots. Then the image must have had ten toes, and then another little toe came up, before whom three of the first toes were plucked up. What nonsense! This prophecy never can be fulfilled according to the interpretation given by the Adventists;—for, according to their own showing, nothing but the toes is now in existence. Daniel said the stone would smite the image on the feet. It cannot smite the image on the feet, for we are living in the period of the toes. The period of the feet has passed into eternity. An explanation cannot be true which would be impossible to be fulfilled. It is manifest that Constantine lived in the period of the feet. It is further manifest that in the days of Constantine the little horn (the Papacy) commenced. Again, it is evident that the three horns were plucked up about two hundred years before the period of the toes commenced. How absurd, then, to contend that they represent the same things! I will close with one argument to sustain the position that this prophecy has been fulfilled, so far as the setting up of the kingdom is concerned. No government was represented in that image until it became universal. Thou, O king, art a king of kings—whosoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven hath he given into their hands, and hath made thee ruler over them all—thou art this head of gold (Dan. ii. 37-38.) Therefore, when a government ceased to be universal, it ceased to be represented by that image. Rome has ceased to be universal, and therefore it has ceased to be so represented.

THE KINGSHIP OR LORDSHIP OF JESUS OF NAZARETH.

THIS would be a theme for a volume, and the most splendid theme for the most splendid volume ever written or read by mortal man. I was rather startled the other day, on hearing the question propounded, "By what authority, Sir, do you affirm that Jesus of Nazareth is now Lord—THE CREATED LORD AND KING OF THE WHOLE UNIVERSE—TERRESTRIAL, and INFERNAL?"

The whole Christian church, so called, in its perpetual internal antagonisms about church orthodoxies, church politics and policies, seems to have lost sight of itself, and of its exalted and glorified head and founder. "Total depravity," "unconditional election," "effectual calling," "justification by faith alone," "sanctification by the Spirit alone," "final perseverance," "future judgment," and their negatives on the other side, have kept the pulpit and the press toiling with unutterable groanings—one half of it “dead in trespasses and sins,” and the other half “dying in doubt and darkness.”

Is this an exaggerated, or is it a truthful, literal matter-of-fact statement of the actualities and realities of the so-called Christian world?

Religion, never having died, according to law, we are somewhat perplexed to understand how it could have revived according to law! But this only by the way.

I sit down to answer the question—“By what authority, Mr. Editor, do you affirm that Jesus of Nazareth is now the divinely-created or constituted Lord of the whole universe?” Head over all the principalities, lordships, governors, potentates—celestial, terrestrial, and infernal!

Would not one of his own oracles be sufficient? Did he not affirm, after he had died, was buried, and had risen again, and had ascended up “far above all the heavens,” known, or knowable, on the part of mortal man—I say, did he not himself affirm—most solemnly affirm, that all “exousia”—all power—all authority in heaven and on earth was given to him? Carefully read these words, Pasa exousia en ouranoo kai epi gees—edothce moi, literally translated, “All the nations”—or, according to the commonly received Greek-text, “Go, therefore, in pursuance of this authority”—“immersing them into the name” (not in the name) of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit—then—“teach them to observe,” or to keep, “all things whatsoever I have commanded you” (Matt. xxviii. 19-20.)

“Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever I have commanded you, and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen.”

In the face of these most explicit oracles, which every novice in Greek, as well as the most celebrated professors, grammarians, lexicographers, in all the schools and colleges in Christendom affirm to be the only true grammatical import of this commission given by the crowned Lord himself, to his Apostles.

In answer to the question that has called forth these remarks and statements, we give, for our authority, the Lord Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit speaking in the person of the Twelve Apostles.

Hear Paul to the Philippians. “God has highly exalted him and given to him a name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of persons in heaven, in earth, and under the earth;” and again, “to him every tongue must confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father” (chap. ii. 8-11.) “He, therefore, thought it not robbery to be equal with God,” while taking upon himself the form of a servant, and becoming obedient even to the death of the cross. Hence, his triumphant exaltation to universal empire and dominion.

Peter, to whom he gave the keys of his kingdom, and the honour of proclaiming in the city of Jerusalem to a world’s convention, that he was exalted to the throne of the universe, said: David, the king, the poet, the prophet, and the oracle of God, announced, in spirit his coronation, saying, “The Lord said to my Lord,” or Jehovah said to my Jehovah, “sit thou on my right hand till I make thy foes thy footstool: I will send the sceptre of thy power out of Zion, rule thou in the midst of thine enemies.”

And did not Peter with his keys, on Pentecost, announce, saying—“Let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God has made that same Jesus whom you have crucified, both Lord and Christ—tantamount to—the anointed Lord? This is most explicit, and so palpable as to be appreciated by every candid discriminating reader.

If, then, all authority in the universe, is now in the hands of the Lord Jesus Christ—all legislative, all judicial, all executive power in all its realms—is in the hands and under the direction, control, and government of Emmanuel—of the Son of Mary maternally, and the Son of God paternally—is not this the greatest conceivable honor and glory ever bestowed on any portion of God’s creation? Hence, we sing according to inspiration:—

“Nearest the throne, the first in song,
Man shall his hallelujahs raise,
While wondering angels round him throng
And swell the chorus of his praise.”

To be a Christian is, therefore, the highest style and dignity of man. Let us, then, give all diligence to make our calling and election sure. A. C.

GRACE, FAITH, REPENTANCE, BAPTISM, REGENERATION.

THESE five words, evangelically apprehended in their proper import and comprehension, as used in the Christian Scriptures, would do more than any five volumes of the theologians of this century, which I have ever read, to disabuse the present Christian profession from the perplexing and paralyzing influences of the scholastic dogmata weekly emanating from thousands of pulpits in Protestant Christendom, and issuing from the denominational presses in every direction through our own immense territory.

The Jews that were carried captive into Babylon never recovered from that calamity. Their language became a mongrel, or a mixed dialect. So it has virtually happened to what is popularly called, "the Christian world." Since the Greek and Roman hierarchies arrived at majority, and assumed to be the "godfathers" of Christ's church—in the East and in the West—a new vocabulary, didactic and ecclesiastic, has been introduced, and so expanded as to be obliged to call to its aid theological dictionaries, and diverse glossaries, for its safe keeping and orthodox interpretation.

But even this expedient has, upon the whole, proved to be a failure. Indeed, the parties themselves that overture these measures, frequently become less catholic and more sectarian than before they made one move in that direction.

The sin of schism in the Christian church of the present day is the capital sin of the age against the Lord's anointed; if not personally against himself, against his mission, his teachings, his gospel, his intercessory prayer, recorded by the disciple whom he loved.—John, chap. 17. The legitimate conclusion from the whole drama of Christianity, as reported from the coronation of Jesus of Nazareth as Autocrat, or Supreme Governor of the whole universe, to the conclusion of the Apocalypse, is, that the whole world is now, and ever has been, since the apostacy of Adam, in a preternatural or unnatural state—"dead in trespasses and in sins," and through the incarnation, the substitution, and the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus Christ, is now placed under a remedial dispensation, wholly of grace.

But such has been the diabolical policy of the great adversary, that he has perverted, corrupted, and mystified the style of the Gospel and introduced false gospels, and through his strategy has turned away the ears of multitudes from the apostolic teachings, to human science and "philosophy falsely so-called." In illustration of this, and in proof of it, we shall adduce a few terms of large, perhaps of the largest circulation, in the pulpits of almost all sects, and in our voluminous offerings of what is called the evangelical press on these topics.

Let us commence with the first of the five terms on our banner—the word GRACE.

To this term has been prefixed throughout Protestant Christendom in the schools of the orthodoxies, the words—"Sovereign," "Free," "Special," "Unmerited," "Irresistible." Not one of these five is ever found in the Christian Scriptures, prefixed or suffixed to the word Grace! These speculative terms, and the ideas associated with them, have culminated and have been consummated in Calvinism and Arminianism, in all their modifications and manifestations. And yet no mortal man was ever sanctified or saved by assenting to any one of them; and I presume to say, never will be.

There are indeed degrees of Grace—great, greater, and greatest. But sovereignty, speciality, and freedom are inseparably incorporated in each and every Grace, from the least to the greatest. Every good act that is not sovereign, special, and free, in its incipency, progress, development, and consummation, is not of Grace, but of some of the forms and spirit of human selfishness.

It has been well and truthfully said, by some of our very best and most sagacious and discriminating writers on the internal evidences of the Christian religion, that friendship has no place amongst the Christian virtues, being only a decent form of selfishness. To this view, we presume, no well educated and developed mind will take exception. This view, indeed, derogates nothing from the value and importance, and even the excellencies of friendship. Still it cannot stand in rank and file with philanthropy. And certain it is that it is not placed in the category of the fruits of the Spirit by the great Apostle to the Gentiles; for these are:—"Love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, fidelity, meekness, and temperance," "against which there is no law."

There is always a shade of selfishness in the purest friendship, "And there is, too, occasionally, a friend that sticketh closer than a brother." Still, however valuable it may be in many cases, it comes not into the class of the fruits of the Spirit, nor does it ever stand in Holy Writ in rank and file with them.

This, however, derogates nothing from the intrinsic value of friendship in a secular, temporal, or worldly sense, in our mutual relations to our country, our body politic, and in our purely temporal obligations growing out of common aims, interests, and pursuits. These are our political duties, interests, and honour. Every duty, interest, honour, and form of benevolence and common sympathy are essential to the enjoyment of ourselves and one another, and when fully developed, culminate in a happy and prosperous community.

But our special theme now on hand is Grace; and to develop this Grace we are constrained to fix our attention upon the ordinances of Grace immediately instituted by the Lord Jesus himself, during the forty days he spent on earth, anterior to his ascension into heaven.

Grace, like every other institution, has its own means of development and enjoyment. Hence, the means of each and every Grace, promised and vouchsafed to man, are a portion of that Grace itself.

The means and the ends are equally the Grace of God. The latter never can be enjoyed without the former. Did any man ever believe in the Lord Jesus Christ who never heard of him? Did any man ever love another whom he has never seen, and of whom he has never heard? Faith, it is decreed, must come by hearing; hence, they who never heard Jesus, nor heard of him, can have no faith nor hope in him.

To illustrate this to our most youthful readers, we shall take the initiatory institution in the Christian kingdom, or dispensation of Grace. It is not baptism alone. The grace of faith, the grace of repentance, the grace of confession, necessarily by divine ordination, precede the grace of baptism.

I do not mean a proxy faith, a proxy repentance, a proxy confession, after the fashion of the by-law established churches of Russia, of Rome, of England, of Scotland; nor by the ecclesiastical canons of Cis-Atlantic Episcopacy, Presbytery, Independency, Congregationalism, or Methodism. These, one and all, are unauthorized endorsers. Their currency is human, not Divine. Their patent is not from heaven. Not one of such notes of credit can ever be honoured in heaven, because not endorsed by the Lord Jesus Christ.

We have not yet finally disposed of the first of the five terms in our heading; but in order to its evangelical development, we shall take a prefatory view of its four associates. They are one and all conspicuous elements of the evangelical, and not of the legal dispensation. We do not, of course, mean to say that these words cannot be found in the Law, or in the Prophets. "Repentance," indeed, is found only once in the whole Bible! Of course I shall be understood as using this word in contrast with the Christian Bible or New Constitution. Nor, indeed, in the law of Moses is there one command or one injunction to repent. In fact, amongst all the Jewish prophets, but one of them is reported as using this word. Ezekiel once or twice said "Repent and turn from your idols." This is its Bible currency, according to the Common Version.

Repentance is, therefore, virtually a precept or an ordinance of Grace. Our readers, we presume to have long since learned that we have two words in the Greek Testament frequently confounded in the pulpits, and in the offerings of the press. Metamelomai is found only five times in the New Testament, indicative of a change of mind, feeling, or purpose. It is never found in connection with the preaching or teaching of the Gospel. Its meaning is well developed in the case of Judas. He repented and went and hung himself. "God granted to the believing Gentiles repentance (metanoia) unto life." They were, therefore, saved by Grace.

Neither faith nor repentance has any inherent merit, any more than the hand of the beggar has in receiving the alms gratuitously bestowed upon him. And what merit is there in baptism? No one baptizes himself. The subject is as passive in his baptismal burial and resurrection, as he is in the interment of his body after death.

We are, therefore, in all our positions, unassailed and unassailable on the part of our Baptist friends. "Their leaders, I fear, cause them to err" (Isaiah iii. 12.)

But to concentrate our attention on the five terms proposed:—Grace, Faith, Repentance, Baptism, Regeneration. The first term, Grace, comprehends them all. In other words Faith is a grace, Repentance is a grace, Baptism is a grace, and Regeneration is also a grace. Therefore our whole salvation is of Grace. There is no human merit in Faith, in Repentance, in Baptism, in Regeneration. They are one and all Divinely bestowed upon man. God has wisely, benevolently, mercifully, and graciously ordained them all as means and instrumentalities of our reconciliation to himself and to one another. They are each and every one necessary to our reconciliation, pardon, justification, sanctification, adoption, and ultimate glorification. We enjoy physical health and life by breathing, eating, drinking, sleeping, and exercising all our vital organs. Each and every one of these is essential in its own place.

"SONS OF GOD:" AN ADDRESS

DELIVERED ON LORD'S DAY EVENING, APRIL 10, 1859, IN GROTE-STREET, ADELAIDE, BY W. H. BURFORD, ELDER.

ADELAIDE, South Australia, May 11, 1859.

Dear Brother,—We are unknown to each other in the flesh, but since it has been my happiness to be united with the Christian Disciples in Adelaide, I have constantly and thankfully read the Harbinger; and you did me the honor some time ago to republish therein a Lecture delivered by me on "Bazaars," and the various sinful methods employed by professing Christians, to raise money for religious purposes. I have not hitherto sent anything in the shape of written contributions, partly because of the great distance which separates us, and partly because you do not seem to lack correspondents either in Essays or in News. Our beloved Brother Campbell (with whom and his writings I was wholly unacquainted till within these three years) is in himself a host, and through the mercy of God, has been qualified to be as an apostle in this most needed reformation among the sects. It is as a very humble coadjutor in the good work that I esteem it a peculiar honor to be engaged in this part of the world. I have sent you the accompanying Address only on this account, leaving it to your discretion to judge whether it would be likely to contribute to your constant endeavour to tear away the veil which sectaries have drawn over the truth of the Gospel, that its simplicity, fitness, beauty, and power, may be perceived with the greatest facility by all whose minds are unsophisticated, and whose hearts are open and sincere towards the Lord Jesus, as their Teacher and their King.—I am, dear brother, your's in the Gospel,

W. H. BURFORD.

"To as many as received him He gave power to become sons of God, even to those who believe on his name: who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John i. 12, 13.) The first thought that presents itself, on reading this passage, is, What is meant by receiving Jesus? In order to a right understanding of this phrase, we prefer referring you to several instances which are given in the sacred record, of individual and other cases, in which divine testimony is borne to their having "received Jesus."

We deem this method preferable to an endeavour to illustrate the subject by a disquisition or essay, because in these various cases you will be made acquainted with the circumstances which led, the motives which prompted, and the evidence which constrained them thus to "receive Jesus." The first instance is that of John the In-merger and the harbinger of Jesus. On the divine testimony that the Messiah should be manifested during his ministry, and on the evidence supplied by the anointing of the Spirit of God, by which Jesus was personally marked, John "received Jesus." Andrew, who heard the testimony which John gave, "Behold the Lamb of God!" concerning Jesus as he walked, and was one of those who followed Jesus and abode with him during that day, when he said to his own brother, Simon, "We have found the Messiah," (which, interpreted, is the Anointed) gave evidence that he "received Jesus." Philip, who when he saw Nathaniel said, "We have found him of whom Moses in the Law and the Prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph," gave enlightened evidence that he had "received Jesus." Peter, when he replied to the question of Jesus, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," shewed that he had "received Jesus." Paul, when arrested on his way to Damascus, the Lord Jesus appearing before him, and he prayed, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" there and then "received Jesus." The Ethiopian eunuch, when he confessed to Philip, "I believe that Jesus is the Son of God," "received Jesus." The three thousand on the Pentecostal day, when listening to the testimony of Peter, they were convinced that they had crucified him whom God had made both Lord and Christ, and cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" "received Jesus." Lydia, when having heard Paul speaking the things concerning Jesus, she had her heart opened thereby, so that she attended to those things, "received Jesus." The Corinthians, of whom it is said that many of them, hearing the Apostle Paul concerning Jesus believed, "received Jesus." And multitudes of the Jews at Jerusalem, when they witnessed the teaching of the Apostles, and the signs and wonders wrought by them, "received Jesus," and were "added to the Lord, both men and women." By these various examples you may clearly perceive how Jesus was received, what is meant by receiving him, and that there is nothing in the way to prevent any sinner from thus receiving Jesus, by believing what God has declared and witnessed concerning him, and so accepting in the very person of the Lord Jesus Christ, the truth that He is the Son of God and the Saviour of the world.

Now to as many as thus receive him, he gives power to become the sons of God. You perceive that the bestowment of the power or privilege is in the present tense. To those who received him, he gave the power; but the sonship itself is placed in the future tense—"to become." The belief of the testimony concerning Jesus, therefore, does not alone and by itself constitute the man a "son of God;" for after they have received the Lord Jesus, the privilege, or power, or right, is given them "to become sons of God." They are not installed into the relationship of sons of God by believing only, but they are installed into a state of privilege, in which they have the power or right to enter into that relationship. It becomes then our duty to inquire what is necessary, in order to the believer becoming a son of God? In John iii. 5 Jesus declared, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." He also told the Jews, "If the Son make you free, you shall be free indeed." These declarations of our Lord are in perfect keeping with the entire course of his teaching. They are also in perfect harmony with the declaration of the Apostle John, in the passage on which our remarks are founded. The teaching also of all the Apostles in their Epistles, will be found to be in complete accordance with the language of both the Lord Jesus and the Apostle John. The words of Jesus are a guide to us in understanding the language of the Apostle. He says, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." Now sonship to a king implies and includes in that relationship, a participation in all the blessings and privileges of the kingdom. And sonship to God implies and includes all the blessings and privileges of the kingdom of God. Here is, then, something to be done by him who has received the Lord Jesus by believing on him, before he can enjoy the assurance that he has become a son of God. He must be born of water and of the Spirit. The first, "born of water," must be his own act, in obedience to the command of the Lord Jesus—his last command given immediately before he was received up into heaven, "Go ye into all the world, and proclaim the gospel to every creature: he who believeth and is immersed shall be saved."

The last, "born of the Spirit," is the act of God, who has promised that he will give his Holy Spirit to all who thus believe and obey the Lord Jesus.

Now to be born, is to emerge from a state of concealment. Hence we say of the fruit of the womb, "A child is born into the world"—that is, it has emerged from a state of concealment—from the darkness in which it was enveloped, and has entered into the light of day. So is it when a believer in Jesus is "born of water." Being immersed he is buried in the water as in the element of death, and from under it he emerges, as from a state of concealment and death, into a new state of being.

If you consult the 6th chapter of Paul's Letter to the Romans, you will see that this is his explanation of the nature and design of the institution of immersion; and the important uses he makes of this view of the subject, are in entire accordance therewith. Precisely the same is it with respect to being "born of the Spirit." Man in his sins is declared by the Holy Spirit to be in a state of darkness and death. Paul said to the Ephesians, "You hath God made alive, who were dead in trespasses and sins;" and again, "God, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." To the Colossians the same Apostle said, "They were delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son." Jesus said, they who live in sin and unbelief, "walk in darkness and stumble, not knowing whither they go;" whilst those who receive and have obeyed him, walk in the light, and shall be the children of light. So, then, he who is born of the Spirit, emerges from this state of concealment—from the darkness and death of a state of sin and condemnation, into the light of the heavenly kingdom—the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, as it appears and has been made manifest in the face of Jesus Christ. Who does not see the beauty and the force—the wonderful appropriateness of this Gospel Institution in conferring upon sinful, condemned, and perishing men "sonship to God," through receiving and obeying the Lord Jesus?

From what has been said it necessarily follows, that a believer who has not availed himself of his privilege to become a son of God, by being born of water and of the Spirit, can never have the assurance of salvation in his soul as a perpetual source of light, and joy, and holy confidence in God. To suppose otherwise, would be to suppose the possession of the privileges and enjoyments of sonship to God, while yet they have never become sons. In worldly societies and in the things of this world, men are not so foolish as to be thus presumptuous. Oh, the fearful risk of setting light by the Saviour's declarations, "Ye must be born again, of water and of the Spirit, or ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God;" and "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved!" Men cause great bewilderment by confounding two things, which, in the gospel of our Lord and the writings of the apostles, are distinctly marked and separated, viz:—"Begotten of the Spirit," and "born of the Spirit." In order to a clear understanding of this distinction, it is of course necessary to pay close attention to the Divine Record. In the language of our text we see an immediate connection with the foregoing passage, "He came unto his own, and his own received him not." Here the Apostle was speaking of the Jews, who had ever been a privileged people, and recognized as the people of God. But Jesus came to commence a new dispensation, of which that under Moses was a type, and new institutions pertaining to a spiritual kingdom, declared to be the kingdom of God, in contradistinction to the kingdom of Israel. He therefore shews that those who received the Lord Jesus by believing in him, and had the privilege conferred upon them to become the sons of God, were not thus favoured because of their connection with Abraham: for, in that character, they were born of the will of man, and after the desires of the flesh; but in their character of believers in Jesus, they were born, or begotten, according to the will of God.

The Apostle James expresses it thus: "Of his own will begat he us by the word of truth:" and the Apostle Peter,

"being (or having been) born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever." Here the contrast is presented between that relationship of God which was fleshly, and that which was spiritual—between the will of man and the will of God. The same distinction holds good in the case of both Jews and Gentiles under the gospel. Not by virtue of fleshly relationship to believing parents can their children be entitled "to become sons of God," by being made to undergo the act of baptism in an infantile, unconscious state. This is an awful delusion, and wholly subverts and overturns the institution of the gospel: while destruction is sure to those who make in such an act their confidence. It is only those who have received the Lord Jesus by believing in him, that have power given them to become sons of God, by their being immersed into the names of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. In every case, you perceive, they must be begotten by the word of the Spirit, in order to be in a proper state to become Sons of God. The employment of the expressions "born of God" and "born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God," is evidently conventional, including and implying the fact, that "of his own will they were begotten of God by the word of truth." The word of Jesus is the seed by which the children of God are begotten, and the absurdity of the expression, "born of seed," unless taken in its conventional or elliptical sense, is too manifest to need another sentence to expose it.

In these remarks upon the distinction between "begotten of the Spirit" and "born of the Spirit," we are fully supported by the order of thought and expression of the Apostle Paul. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." By believing the sinner is invested with righteousness, and with the power and privilege to make confession of the Lord Jesus unto salvation. Salvation is, then, assured to him when, by his immersion into Christ's death, he makes confession of him. Then it is that he enters into the kingdom of his Lord as one of the sons (or daughters) of the Lord God Almighty. The Lord Jesus himself did not enter into that state, which was preparatory to his own kingdom, but by immersion. Hence, he said, in reply to the scruples of John, "Suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness."

In that dispensation of repentance which John came to establish prior to the coming reign of the Messiah, Jesus, by his immersion, recognized the appointment and will of God. All the prior life of our Lord was preparatory to this act, by which he entered upon his ministry, and which continued during the remaining portion of the dispensation of repentance or reformation. Now the promise of the indwelling presence and power of the Spirit, is made expressly to those who are born of water by their immersion therein into the death of Christ.

Peter said, in reply to the Jews, "Reform, and be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, for the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit:" and in his epistle he says, "Seeing you have purified your souls by obeying the truth through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that you love one another with a pure heart fervently." The Apostle Paul says to the Romans, "Know you not that so many of us as were immersed into Jesus Christ, were immersed into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by immersion into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." In that condition, "newness of life," the Holy Spirit abides in the soul, to counsel, guide, help, comfort, sanctify, and sustain until the redemption of the body, which is the purchased possession of the Lord. Some may say, and they do say, "It is nowhere told us that he that believeth and is not baptized, shall be condemned!" To this the Holy Spirit replies in his word, that to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ necessarily includes obedience to his command. We know from the lips of Jesus, that "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Do not dare, we beseech you, to tempt the Holy Spirit; but bless God for the favour he has shown, and be obedient, that you may thereby purify your souls in obeying the truth, to unfeigned love of the brethren, who, like yourselves, shall have walked in all the commandments and ordinances of Jesus blameless. The great and glorious blessing, then, of the gospel institution—the being born of water and of the Spirit, is the assurance and enjoyment of salvation now—a present salvation—a knowledge of your heirship to all the promises given unto us in Christ Jesus, and to eternal life, because you have become the “sons of God” in his own appointed way. Truly, “If the Son make you free you shall be free indeed.”

[If Bro. Burford proclaims the truth as it is in Jesus, as clearly and efficiently as he advocates it by his pen, then we may hope to hear good news from Adelaide still more frequently than we have hitherto done. Our readers, we can confidently say, will be pleased to see further communications from Bro. Burford. That he may be eminently blessed as a proclaimer of the truth, and enabled to teach his fellow disciples more fully the great things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus, is our earnest expectation and desire.]—J. ## THE SABBATH DAY AND THE LORD'S DAY.

[It is quite clear, from the character of some of our correspondent's letters, that there are amongst us young disciples who do not comprehend the difference between the Jewish Sabbath and the Lord's Day. The following Essay will enable them to perceive the design of the two institutions, and although previously printed in this country, will not on that account be the less acceptable to our readers.]

THE subject of our present address is the Sabbath day and the Lord's day. Either Christians are bound to observe the Sabbath day, or they are not. If they are, let us see what the nature of that observance is, which was prescribed for the Sabbath day. The law reads thus: “Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days shall you labour and do all your work: the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord your God: in it you shall not do any work, you, nor your son, nor your daughter, nor your man servant, nor your maid servant, nor your cattle, nor the stranger that is within your gates. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it.” You will observe that, in this command, God positively prohibits all manner of work or labour on this day. Son, daughter, servant, cattle, stranger, are commanded to be exempted from all manner of work. In examining the particular precepts originating from this law, recorded in the Old Testament, we find the following specifications:—

1. “You shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations on the Sabbath day” (Ex. xxxv. 3.)

2. “Abide you every man in his place (house or tent); let no man go out of his place (house or tent) on the Sabbath day” (Ex. xvi. 29.)

3. “He gives you on the sixth day the bread of two days. Bake that which you will bake this day, and seethe what you will seethe, and that which remains over, lay up for you to be kept until the morning” (Ex. xvi. 29-23.)

4. “Bear no burden on the Sabbath day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem; neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the Sabbath day” (Jer. xvii. 21-22.)

5. “Not doing your own ways, nor finding your own pleasure, nor speaking your own words” (Isa. lviii. 13.)

6. “From evening unto evening shall you celebrate your Sabbath” (Lev. xxiii. 32.)

7. “Whoever does any work on the Sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death. Every man who defiles it shall surely be put to death” (Ex. xxxi. 14-15.)

“And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the Sabbath day. And they that found him gathering sticks brought him to Moses and Aaron, and to all the congregation. And they put him in ward, because it was not declared what should be done to him. And the Lord said unto Moses, The man shall be surely put to death; all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp. And all the congregation brought him without the camp, and stoned him with stones, and he died, as the Lord commanded Moses” (Num. xv. 32-36.)

The above items are a few of many that might be selected out of the Old Testament on this subject. We believe them to be a fair specimen of the law given by Moses, as explained and enforced upon the nation of Israel.

Now the question is, are we under this law? If we are, we pay little or no respect to it. For who is there that does not habitually violate the rest enjoined on this day? Those who make the most ado about Sabbath breakers are themselves, according to the above law, worthy of death. They kindle fire in their houses. They go out of their houses, and travel on their cattle miles. Their sons and their daughters do some kind of work. They bring in burdens of water, wood, and prepare food. They celebrate it not from evening to evening, but from morning to evening they violate it. They speak their own words, and do many things worthy of death. Why, then, is not the penalty enforced? Assuredly their observance of the law is mere mockery. It is an insult on the Lawgiver.

We know that some of the clergy have given, if not sold them, indulgences to violate it. They have told them that certain "works of necessity and mercy" are allowable. But who told them so? They tell them they may prepare food, bring in fuel and water. But God forbade those under this law to do so. So far was he from countenancing such "works of necessity," that he wrought three miracles to prevent the necessity of doing a "work of necessity." He sent two days' portion of manna from heaven on the sixth day—he sent none on the seventh—he preserved that gathered on the sixth from putrefaction until the close of the seventh—all of which were special miracles for the space of forty years. If he wrought three miracles to prevent an Israelite from crossing his threshold to gather up a little manna for his daily food, how dare any give a dispensation, in his name, to do that which is tenfold more laborious!

Because the Saviour of the world put to silence those who accused him of breaking the Sabbath, by appealing to their own conduct in relieving animals in distress, this doctrine of "works of necessity and mercy," has been represented as of divine origin. What a perversion! An argumentum ad hominem converted into a general maxim! But such a perversion shows consummate inattention to the laws of Israel. While Israel kept the law there never would occur an opportunity for a work of necessity or of mercy, such as these lawgivers tolerate. For while they kept the law, they should be blessed in their basket, stores, fields, houses, children, flocks, herds—no house would take fire—no ox would fall into a pit, &c. And if they transgressed the law, they should be cursed in all these respects, and no tolerance of a violation of the law was granted as a means of mitigating the curse.

Again—let me ask, Was there ever a law published relaxing that rigid observance of rest enjoined upon the Sabbath? Was there a law published, saying, You must, or you may observe the Sabbath with less care, with less respect—you may now speak with your own words, kindle fire in your houses, and prepare victuals, &c.? I say, Was there ever such a law published? No, indeed—either the law remains in all its force, to the utmost extent of its literal requirements, or it is passed away with the Jewish ceremonies. If it yet exist, let us observe it according to law. And if it does not exist, let us abandon a mock observance of another day for it.

"But," say some, "it was changed from the seventh to the first day." Where? when? and by whom? No man can tell. No, it never was changed, nor could it be, unless creation was to be gone through again: for the reason assigned must be changed before the observance, or respect to the reason, can be changed! It is all old wives' fables to talk of the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day. If it be changed, it was that august personage changed it who changes times and laws ex officio—I think his name is DOCTOR ANTI-CHRIST.

But was not the Sabbath given to the Jews only? And again, Was it not a shadow or type? This deserves attention.

The preface to the law, of which it was a part, says, "I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage; therefore, remember the Sabbath day," &c. The preface to this law, as the inscription or address upon a letter, ascertains whose property it was. It was the property of the Jews. But Moses tells them this, not leaving it to an inference, (Deut. v. 15) "Remember that you were a servant in the land of Egypt, and the Lord your God brought you out thence, through a mighty hand, and by a stretched arm; therefore, the Lord your God commanded you to keep the Sabbath day." Exekiel says the same—or, rather, the Lord by the prophet says, chap. xx. 12, "Moreover, also, I gave them my Sabbath, to be a sign between me and them." Yes, said the Lord by Moses, "The Sabbath is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever" (Ex. xxxi. 17.) It is worthy of note in this place, that of the sins in the long black catalogue of sins specified against the Gentiles, in all the New Testament, the sin of Sabbath-breaking is never once preferred against them! We conclude, then, that the Sabbath day was as exclusively the property of the Jews as circumcision.

But was it not a shadow and a type? Let us hear Paul. "Let no man judge you (condemn you for not observing) in meats and drinks, (for eating and drinking) or in respect of the holy day, or of a new Moon, or of the Sabbath, which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ." Or, according to Macknight, "the body is Christ's body." Paul, then, says it was a shadow. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, 4th chapter, he makes it and Canaan "types of that rest which remained for the people of God." The Sabbath, then, was a shadow—a type given to the Jews only.

Since beginning this article, we noticed, for the first time, a very correct note of Dr. Macknight's, the celebrated translator of the apostolic epistles, which expresses our view of this matter. With many, we know, his views will be received with more readiness of mind than ours. He was, strange as it may appear, a dignitary in a Presbyterian church; yet he expresses himself in the following manner on Col. ii. 16. "The whole of the law of Moses being abrogated by Christ, (Col. ii. 14) Christians are under no obligations to observe any of the Jewish holy days, nor even the seventh day, Sabbath. Wherefore, if any teacher made the observance of the seventh day a necessary duty, the Colossians were to resist him. But though the brethren, in the first age, paid no regard to the Jewish seventh day, Sabbath, they set apart the first day of the week for public worship, and for commemorating the death and resurrection of their master, by eating his supper on that day; also, for private exercises of devotion. This they did, either by the precept or by the example of the apostles, and not by virtue of any injunction in the law of Moses. Besides, they did not sanctify the first day of the week in the Jewish manner, by the total abstinence from bodily labour of every kind. That practice was condemned by the council of Laodocia as judaizing. Lec. Suiceri Thea. Eccl. voce Sabbaton."

The Sabbath was, by the Lord of the Sabbath, set aside, as well as every other part of the law of Moses. The learned Macknight is with us also in this instance. His words on Col. ii. 14, are: "It is evident that the law of Moses, in all its parts, is now abolished. Consequently, that Christians are under no obligation to obey even the moral precepts of that law, on account of their being delivered by Moses to the Jews. For if the obligations of the moral precepts of his laws are still continued, mankind are still under its curse." I would just observe, on this item, that the Lord Jesus Christ observed the last Sabbath that was obligatory on any of the human race, by laying in the grave from evening to evening. In the silence of death and the grave, he celebrated it literally, "not going out of his place," until the Sabbath was past. Then, very early in the morning, when the Sabbath was past, the Jewish religion being consummated, he rises and becomes the beginning of the new creation.

Christians, by apostolic example, which to them is the same as precept, are, in honour of the commencement of the new creation, constrained by Christ's authority and grace to meet on the first day of the week, to show forth his death and to commemorate his resurrection. When they assemble they are to be instructed, and to admonish one another; they are to learn his statutes, and "to continue steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine, in breaking bread, in fellowship, and in prayers, praising God." Such was the practice of the primitive church, as the epistles demonstrate. The first day of the week is not regarded to the Lord when these things are not done. For if professors of Christianity were to keep in their houses from morning to evening, and celebrate this day as the Jews did the Sabbath, instead of honouring they are dishonouring Christ. No two days are more unlike in their import and design, than the Sabbath and the first day. The former commemorated the consummation of the old creation, the cessation of creation work; the latter commemorates the beginning of the new creation. The former was to Israel, a memorial that they were once slaves in Egypt — the latter assures us that the year of release has come. The former looked back, with mournful aspect, to the toils and sorrows entailed upon the human body, from an evil incident to the old creation — the latter looks forward, with an eye beaming with hope, to perpetual exemption from toil, and hope, and sorrow. The Sabbath was a day of awful self-denial and profound religious gloom — the resurrection day is a day of triumph, of holy joy, and religious festivity. The Jew, on a Sabbath morn, from his casement surveyed the smokeless chimneys and the bolted doors of the silent tribes of Israel. A solemn stillness holds the streets of the city and the hamlet, and not a vagrant foot disturbs the grassy field. The flowers breathe forth their fragrance to the gentle breeze—no hand plucks the blooming rose—no ear is charmed with the mellifluous notes of the tenants of the groves. The banks of the limpid streams are not frequented by the noisy youths, nor does their clamour mingle with the murmurs of the vocal rills. Striking emblems of the silent rest allotted to the tenants of the grave. The Christian welcomes the dawn of the triumphant morn. The new heavens and the new earth open to his view. The incorruptible, the immortal bodies of the saints, rising from the ashes of the grave, in all the vigour and beauty of immortal youth, fills his soul with unutterable admiration of the wondrous victory of the all-conquering chief. While he surveys his mortal frame, and feels the sentence of death in every part of his earthly house, his soul forgets the infirmities of its partner, and soars on the pinions of faith and hope to the resurrection morn; it is lost in the contemplation of millions of every tribe and tongue, clothed in the indescribable beauties of immortality. While overwhelmed in the ecstatic admiration of the glorious bodies around him, his eye ultimately fixes on the FIRST BORN of many brethren. While he adores him at the head of the innumerable host of ransomed immortals, his memory musters up the recollections of Gethsemane, Pilate and his judgment seat, Mount Calvary, and the sepulchre in the garden. To the assembly of the saints with eagerness he hastens, and anxious to participate in the triumph of his resurrection, his soul is feasted with the abundance of God's house, and with the communion of those whom he hopes to embrace in his immortal arms on the day of resurrection to eternal life.

Christians, what a difference between the Jewish Sabbath, and this day of triumph! They have much to learn of the glory of Christianity, who think that going to a synagogue, and hearing a harangue, and returning to their firesides, is suitable to the design, or expressive of the import of this joyful and triumphant day. On this day, Messiah entered Jerusalem as Son of David, as King of Judah. On this day he rose from the dead. On this day, after his resurrection, he generally met with his disciples in their assemblies. On this day, he sent the Holy Spirit down from heaven, and erected the first Christian church. "On this day the disciples came together to break bread." On this day the Christians joined together in the fellowship of the saints, or in making contributions for the saints. And on this day, the Spirit finished its work of revelation on the Isle of Patmos, in giving to John the beloved, the last secrets of the divine plan ever to be uttered in human language while time endures. If no authoritative precedent enforced the assembly of saints on this day, and the observance of the order of the Lord's house, the very circumstance of such a coincidence of glorious wonders would point it out as the Lord's day; and love to him, the most powerful principle that ever impelled to action, would constrain all saints not to forsake the assembling of themselves on this day; but to meet, to animate, and to be animated; to remember, to admire, to adore, to hymn in songs divine, the glorious and mighty King. Christians, could you say, No!

THE SECOND ADVENT.

ALL Christians are agreed that the Lord Jesus will come again, but all are not agreed as to what he will do when he comes. The cause of this disagreement does not arise from any inexplicitness in the sure word of prophecy, but from assuming certain things to be contained therein which are without proof. What we propose, then, in this paper, is simply to note first several of the principal of these assumptions, and second, to point out the chief objects of the Saviour's coming, as indicated in Scripture statement. In this way we shall have before us at once both the negative and positive aspects of the case. We shall attempt to shew what the Lord will not come to do, and also what he will come to effect.

1. The Lord will not come to establish the kingdom of God on earth. This is already done. Prior to his first advent his harbinger proclaimed its approach, and Jesus and his Apostles followed with the same proclamation—"Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." The Lord told those whom he addressed when on earth, that there were among them some who should not be dead till the kingdom had come. Those who expect the establishment of the kingdom at the second advent, overlook the explicitly stated fact, that the Sovereign is not represented as coming to the earth to receive the kingdom, but to heaven. When a king is to be crowned, he repairs to the capital: so it was when the Lord Jesus entered heaven, that God highly exalted him, and gave him the name which is above every name, and that his ambassadors were able to say, we see him crowned with glory and honor. These facts accord alike with ancient prophecy and the Saviour's own express teaching. Daniel "saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, (not to earth, but) to the Ancient of Days, and they brought him near before him; and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, and nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." This is in precise accordance with the Messiah's parable to the Jews, who, on his approach to Jerusalem, imagined that the kingdom of God should immediately appear—that is, that it should be visibly apparent, like earthly monarchies in general, and that without any such sufferings intervening as the Messiah had to undergo before entering into his glory. He therefore spoke to them the parable of a nobleman going into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and having received it, thereafter to return to reckon with his subjects.

2. The Lord will not come to convert the world. God's plan of mercy is one. His purpose is to justify both Jew and Gentile through faith, not through sight. The promise made to Abraham, as heir of the world, that in his seed—the Messiah—all kindreds of the earth should be blessed, is being accomplished in the personal conversion of men to God through the Gospel. Hence, Peter's word to the Jews, "Ye are the children of the prophets and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first God having raised up up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you in turning away every one of you from his iniquities."

3. The Lord will not come to introduce the Millennium. The twentieth chapter of Revelation is the only portion of the word where the phrase, "a thousand years," generally spoken of as "the Millennium," occurs. Now one has only to read the passage to see that it is not the descending Messiah, but an angel from heaven who introduces it by the binding of Satan. Further, it is not less manifest that the earth is not the theatre of the Millennium. The chapter describes what transpires in the separate state; first, in the binding of Satan, so that he practices no more—that is, no new or further deception on the nations, but not that they are freed from his old deceptions. And second, in the life and reign of the souls of those who had been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus. It is no part of the testimony either here or elsewhere, that the Lord Jesus will come and remain on the earth for a thousand years. The conception is an unproved and unprovable opinion.

What then will the Lord come the second time to accomplish? We reply,

1. The Lord will come to gather the nations to judgment. Said Jesus, "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats; and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on the right hand, Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world;" and "Then shall he say unto them on the left hand, Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal."

2. The Lord will come to raise the dead. This gathering of "all nations" implies the resurrection of the dead, for many nations have now no existence on earth. Therefore the words of the Saviour, "The hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of Man and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Hence, also, the apostolic declarations, "There shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." "This we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not precede those who are asleep; for the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first—(i.e. before we are changed.) Then we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

3. The Lord will come to reward and glorify his saints. The judgment to come, so far as the saints are concerned, is to award them the prize of their high calling. Now called, chosen, and faithful, they then receive the reward of their life-long fidelity. Thus we read, "Beloved, now are we the children of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him—that we shall see him as he is." "Our life is hid with Christ in God; when Christ our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." Hence the language of the aged veteran, "I have fought the good fight—I have finished the course—I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all those also who love his appearing."

4. The Lord will come to punish the wicked. Their state, like that of the saved, is previously determined; that is to say, it is in this life that a man is either lost or saved. "He that believeth on the Son is not condemned—but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he has not believed on the only begotten Son of God." Nevertheless the reward or punishment shall be determined on that day when all shall appear—when all shall be exposed before the judgment seat of Christ—the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, according to the gospel—who will render to every man according to his deeds: to those who do not obey the truth, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, when Jesus shall come to yield vengeance on all who know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ—who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired among all the believing.

5. The Lord will come to complete the revelation of the mystery of God. It is only through Jesus that we know God as we now do. Through him it is that we know God as Creator, as Lawgiver, and as Father; and it is through him that God shall be known in the fulness of the yet higher revelation as Sovereign and Judge. To this end Jesus is already highly exalted, regnant over the universe, Sovereign of the whole. Thus it also is that he assumes in the Apocalypse the supremest titles of deity and royalty—that he announces himself as the First and the Last, the Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the Ending; He who is, and who was, and who shall come, the Almighty; the King of kings, and Lord of lords. Much as we already know of God through the Father-revealing Son, we yet have to confess with the Apostle, that "Great is the mystery of godliness." But what we know not now we shall know hereafter. At present we have enough for faith and promise — we have all that hope can anticipate. If we cannot now determine all that is desirable to be known of God, we have this promise, that he in his own times will, at the appearing of Jesus Christ, shew who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto. Our anticipations, therefore, of the second advent constitute that blessed hope, even the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. When God thus appears, the revelation shall be complete — the mystery shall be finished. Therefore,

6. The Lord will come to destroy the present order of things, and to create and introduce the new heavens and the new earth. This earth, the foundation of which he laid in the beginning, shall perish; and these heavens, which are the works of his hands, he shall fold up like a vesture, and they shall be changed. We are told that both are kept in store against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men — that however little prior indication of that dread event there now exists, yet "the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works which are therein, shall be burnt up. Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conduct and God-likeness of character." T. H. M.

CORRESPONDENCE

LETTERS FROM VICTORIA.

BEECHWORTH, June 13, 1859.

I intended to have written you a long letter as to how the cause of our dear Redeemer is progressing amongst us, noticing a few interesting events transpiring in this young country, which might be of some little service to the brethren in the mother land; but my time is too limited, at present, to do more than write a few lines.

I beg to enclose you a draft for £10, as a small donation to the Bible Union, a work above all others that can engage the attention of man. I feel this work to be the most important one. No words can adequately express the value of knowing God's revealed will to man aright. It is indeed the only true riches. They will endure for ever, and the work is therefore the highest aim of the people of God. I hope, if the Lord spares me, to enjoy the happiness of giving my mite once a quarter, to aid and forward the good work.

Since I last wrote you, a young man from Glasgow, Bro. John Mitchell, has made the good confession, putting on the Lord Jesus Christ in his own appointed way. He is a young man of great amiability, and I hope that he will continue to adorn the doctrine of Jesus Christ. We feel that the cause of truth is not progressing as we wish here. The love of gold on the one hand, and careless indifference of professed Christians lulled asleep by their false teachers on the other, are causes why the precious truth taught by Jesus and his Apostles is treated little better than old fables. But although few in number, we continue steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine, in fellowship, in breaking of bread, and in prayers.

JAMES INGRAM.

HINDMARSH, June 1, 1859.

By the Columbian, which sails to-day, we forward to you brief Items of News.

Last evening two disciples were immersed on the good confession, and during last week two were immersed, and added to the church assembling in Hindmarsh. We have reason to thank God and take courage, for surely the preaching of Christ is not in vain.

Mrs. Warren and family are in the enjoyment of good health, and myself improving. We desire to be remembered to the brethren, especially Bros. Hine, T. Wallis, Powers, Meekly, A. Darby, and their partners. It would be a gratification, indeed, to see you; but if we meet not in the flesh, we hope to do so in that great congregation which shall never break up.

NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS, CRITICISMS, &amp;c.

JOHN HOWARD HINTON ON PREACHING.

A SERMON on preaching, delivered in Bloomsbury chapel, London, and recently printed, states most clearly some of those important truths which we have from time to time brought before our readers. The preacher has the well-deserved respect of the Baptists, and is entitled, on such a theme, to much influence. Let us first hear from the Rev. J. H. Hinton what preaching is not, and what it is.

"In truth, there are two things which preaching is commonly supposed to be, which we are inclined to say it is not. On the one hand, preaching is not an ecclesiastical act, presupposing office; neither, on the other, is it a formal act, implying order. Both these views are, as is well known, extensively held. It is tenaciously maintained by some, that to preach is a clerical prerogative, which no layman has a right to assume, or can properly exercise; while by others it is supposed that the act of preaching must constitute a portion of a regular service, a more familiar address amounting only to a few words of exhortation. We repudiate equally both these notions. Throwing aside the conventional meanings which ages of ecclesiastical usage have generated, and reverting to the sole authority in matters of this class, the import of the scriptural term, we shall be led to a widely different idea.

"The original preacher, κήρυξ, was a herald, charged with negotiation, or a common crier—a public officer whose business it was to proclaim, or to make publicly known, matters which he had in commission. Thus to preach, κηρύσσειν, was either to negotiate or to make proclamation. From this latter use of the term was gradually derived a meaning of congruous but reduced import—to announce, or orally to diffuse intelligence. In its sacred association, to preach is orally to disseminate religious knowledge, whether with or without a clerical office, whether in a formal or a familiar manner, whether in public or in private channels, whether to groups or to individuals. Preaching, in a word, is a name for any oral mode of making known evangelical truth; and as descriptive of a divine institution, it denotes an appointed service of religious instruction."

After setting forth that "the institution of preaching required only what could easily be done," and that "every one who heard the glad-tidings could repeat them," and that "this was the simple service required," he well adds—

"Let it be observed, however, that it is only of preaching as Christ instituted it that these things can be affirmed. The scope of this divine institution has been miserably contracted, and its influence fearfully diminished, by the professional character which it has, in the course of ages, acquired. The evils of this modification are two-fold; on the one hand a multitude of persons preach the gospel who are not fitted for it, and on the other, a far greater multitude do not preach the gospel who are. The former are the members of the clerical profession, among whom, speaking generally, the existence of experimental piety is theoretically very improbable, and practically very rare; the latter are the sincere Christians of every name, and of every grade, a body who unequivocally constitute 'God's clergy,' and to whom, without an exception, both the prerogative and the obligation of preaching the gospel belong.

"It is only as carried out on God's plan that the institution of preaching can be what God intended it to be, either in magnitude or in effect. Under cover of a professional ministry, however numerous, or however liberally supported, by far the greater number of voices that should be employed, and these by far the most eloquent, are dumb; while those who speak, either speak of that which they neither feel nor understand, or are separated from their auditors by a line of demarcation, which it was undoubtedly the design of Christ continually to overstep, if not entirely to obliterate. With so deleterious a modification of it, the fault ought not to be cast upon its author, if the practical result of the institution of preaching has been less than might have been expected from it; and it cannot be doubted that a reformation in this respect will precede large evangelical triumphs."

The sermon closes with a valuable note which, though we may not be quite ready to commit ourselves to every line, shall be given with but little omission.

"And first as to the meaning of the word κηρύσσειν. It is undoubtedly true, that in its primary meaning there is involved an idea of office; according to the lexicographers, however, this idea of office does not continue to attach itself to the derived uses of the term. The several elements comprehended in the primary meaning are thus successively brought out by Schleusner in his Lexicon. 1, To cry aloud. 2, To announce by public authority. 3, To diffuse information. 4, To advise in the name of another. 5, To teach. The reader who has Schleusner's Lexicon at hand will find much satisfaction in examining the examples adduced. I think, therefore, that I have not gone beyond authority in assigning to the word κηρύσσειν, to preach, the simple meaning of orally making known.

"Next, as to the supposed institution by Christ of an order of ministers. I have said in the text enough to show that I fully recognize the offices which the Lord has instituted in and for his church. It is for those who think he has instituted any other office to bring forward proof of their opinion. On this point reference will doubtless be made to Ephesians iv. 11-12: 'And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers: for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ.' Upon this passage I remark — First, that it evidently describes a provision for the edification of the church, not for the conversion of the world; and secondly, that the provision described consisted entirely of the outpouring of supernatural gifts, which gave to it a temporary character — a character so temporary, that in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus, in which we look for indications of the permanent organization of the church, no reference is made to either of them. That the passage does relate to the supernatural gifts is evident, from 1 Cor. xii. 28: 'And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues.' But the terms and the connection of this passage are decisive of its import.

"Unless further evidence be adduced on this subject, I maintain my position, that Christ did not institute an order of ministers, but committed the preaching of the gospel equally to all his disciples.

"If, after this reference to the supreme authority, I may without impropriety refer to reasons of a general kind, I would respectfully ask, why there should be in the world an order of ministers? For the care and edification of the church there are required men at once of peculiar qualifications, and invested to a certain extent with the authority of Christ; but nothing of this kind is required for the world, since the diffusion of religious knowledge is that to which every convert is competent, and in which all converts ought to be engaged. An order of ministers, therefore, may justly be regarded as a mere superfluity, at once a human invention, and not without marks of human folly.

"Of this ecclesiastical conception it may not, perhaps, be difficult to trace the origin. A pastor implies a flock, and no man can be regarded as holding the pastoral office unless in connection with a people of whom he has charge. The office of the ministry, however, may be held in a general and abstract manner, not having respect to any particular charge, but conferring, as is supposed, power and authority to administer the word and sacraments of the gospel in any and every place. That the office of the ministry thus abstractly conceived of has been of great ecclesiastical convenience, both in and out of religious establishments, I do not doubt; but, as it is devoid of the authority of Christ on the one hand, so, on the other, its direct tendency and effect are to supersede Christ's own appointment—the office of the pastorate.

"It may be said, perhaps, that the office of the ministry is favourable to the diffusion of the gospel, since a person invested with it preaches with a certain prestige and influence which predispose people to hear him. Alas! how totally I differ from this view, and how little I can expect any one to agree with me who holds it. I will avow the fact, however, let it go for what it may, that I regard the influence of the ministerial office as one of the greatest impediments to the successful preaching of the gospel. In so far as its influence is really felt by the hearers, it must inevitably supersede by the human the divine, and transform the Word of God into the word of man; while it gives to the preacher a merely professional standing, and exposes him to suspicions of interested motives, which are disastrously adverse to his design. The gospel is much more likely to prevail when preached by a parent to his child, or by a man to his neighbour.

"I would be allowed to ask finally, whether there can be an order of ministers without more or less restricting that universal agency on which our Lord evidently relied. It is obvious that a professional ministry, as it is now extant, coexists with a vast amount of individual inaction among the disciples of Jesus. It is the plea which is used to justify that inaction, and I believe it to be the sole parent of that inaction itself. Had there never been a professional ministry, there had never been an idle church."

WORDS OF THE GOOD SHEPHERD ABOUT SHEEP.

(THE SUBSTANCE OF NOTES EXCHANGED THEREUPON.)

Dear Brother, — You do not admit that a sinner must be quickened by the Holy Spirit before he can believe, while I understand that he is so dead that until thus quickened he cannot believe, and that God will quicken all those whom he has chosen and given to his Son. What do you understand from the texts, "Who hath ears to hear, let him hear" (Mat. xiii. 9) — "Ye believe not because ye are not my sheep?" (John x. 26.) — Your's, &c.

My dear Brother, — The first text implies that some have not hearing ears, but it certainly does not intimate that those persons never had such. You must remember that men sometimes turn "a deaf ear" to their fellow men, or to some particular truth, and that then they may be said to have no ear to that person or for that truth, which does not imply that they were never able to hear, understand, and obey the truth in question. Now in regard to persons who had no ear for the words of the Saviour, he himself, as does also the Apostle Paul, informs us that they once had ears to hear and eyes to see, but that they made them gross, or closed them, lest they should be converted. "Their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed, lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them" (Acts xxviii. 27.) The same statement is made by the Lord, and recorded Mat. xiii. 15. We are there informed that those who had no ear to hear, were persons who did not like to be converted, and who closed their ears and eyes, lest that which they did not like should come upon them. They would not hear, lest they should be healed." "Ye believe not, because ye are not my sheep." The word gar, translated because in this text, occurs about one thousand times, and is in five instances translated because. In Mat. iii. 28 it is translated therefore, and the context shews that in that instance it could not have been rendered because. John x. 26, translated thus would read, "Ye believe not, therefore ye are not my sheep." The Lord upbraided men with their unbelief, which he would not have done had they been unable to believe. "He that believeth not is condemned already, because he has not believed" (John iii. 18.) Not because they were sinners, but, because they did not believe — language the Lord never could have used, had their unbelief resulted from inability.

Your's in Christian love,

Dear Brother, — Before telling you my view of your remarks on the two texts, I must ask you to consider — Eph. ii. 1, "And you hath He quickened who were dead" — John vi. 37, "All that the Father giveth me shall come unto me" — John x. 16, "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I must bring." — Your's truly,

Dear Brother, — The following I submit in answer to your inquiry concerning the three texts.

I. — EPH. ii. 1 affirms that sinners are quickened by God. The text, however, gives no information as to how He quickens. The truth is, they are not quickened that they may believe, but by that which they believe. Here we have positive testimony. "Every one that hath heard and learned of the Father, cometh unto me" (John vi. 46.) Thus God draws sinners to Jesus by the truth which they learn. Again, "Being born (begotten) BY the word of God" — "And this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you" (1 Peter i. 23-25.) "By his own will begat he us by the word of truth" (John i. 18.) — "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten (or quickened) of God" (John v. 1) — not as some would like to put it, "Whosoever is quickened of God believeth."

II. — JOHN vi. 37, "All that the Father giveth me shall come unto me." A great truth, but the text does not state who they are that the Father giveth. The Father giveth to Jesus all believers, and all who do believe come unto him. Coming is not believing, but that surrender to his leadership which results from believing in him with all the heart. This a careful reader would see by the context. "All that the Father giveth me shall come unto me" (verse 37) — "This is my Father's will, that of all which he has given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it (or them) up at the last day" (verse 39) — "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and BELIEVETH ON HIM, shall have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day" (verse 40.) Thus, those whom the Father giveth to the Son, are those whom he wills to have raised at the last day, and those whom he wills to have raised at the last day are those who believe on the Son.

III. — JOHN X. 16, "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I must bring." The Gentile believers, contemplated prospectively — not then actually his sheep, but so in the divine intention, as, when Abraham had no child God said to him, "I have made thee a father." Upon which Paul's comment is, that "God calleth those things which BE NOT, as though they were" (Rom. iv.) — that is to say, when he has determined or promised that they shall be.

We conclude, then, upon the five texts — That there are those who have no ear to hear; not, however, because they never had one, but, according to the Lord and Paul, because they have made their ears gross; or closed them — that consequently they do not so learn the word of truth, as to be haggotten or quickened by it — do not learn of the Father, (though his lessons are repeated in their hearing) and therefore are not drawn to the Son — that having closed their ears and shut their eyes, "lest they should be converted," they believe not on Jesus, and "therefore" are not his sheep — that as the Father has given only believers to the Son, they are not his, and do not come to him.

Your's truly,

METHODISM ON TRIAL.

OVER zealous Wesleyans having recently boasted of the claims of Methodism to apostolic origin, that claim has been brought into court by means of the Wrexham Advertiser, from the columns of which we give, slightly abridged, the evidence of Dr. Adam Clark.

"So we hear the court crier call out with stentorian voice, 'Dr. Adam Clark,' and presently the good, old, pious, learned 'D.D., LL.D., F.S.A., &c. presents himself in the witness box; and after the usual — 'the evidence you shall give,' &c. proceeds as follows: — I have lived more than three score years and ten — I have travelled a good deal, both by sea and land — I have conversed with and seen many people, in and from many different countries — I have studied the principal religious systems in the world — I have read much, thought much, and reasoned much; and the result is, I am persuaded of the simple, unadulterated truth of no book but the Bible; and of the true excellence of no system of religion but that contained in the Holy Scriptures, and especially Christianity, which is referred to in the Old Testament, and fully revealed in the New. And while I think well of, and wish well to, all religious sects and parties, and especially to all those who love our Lord Jesus in sincerity; yet, from a long and thorough knowledge of the subject, I am led, most conscientiously, to conclude, that Christianity itself, as existing among those called Wesleyan Methodists, is the purest, the safest, that which is most to God's glory, and the benefit of man; and that, both as to the creed there professed, the form of discipline there established, and the consequent moral practice there vindicated. And I believe, that among them is to be found the best form and body of divinity that has ever existed in the church of Christ, from the promulgation of Christianity to the present day. To him who would say, 'Doctor Clark, are you not a bigot?' Without hesitation I would answer, 'No, I am not; for, by the grace of God I am a Methodist!' — ADAM CLARK. — Liverpool, July 26th, 1832.

"Sensation in court. Methodism will be acquitted. The opposing counsel slowly rises, and takes a calm survey of Dr. Adam Clark, and after a look at his brief, commences his cross-examination.

"Dr. Clark, you have stated in your examination, that you are upwards of seventy years of age? That you have travelled much by sea and land? That you have seen and conversed with many people from different countries? You have been a great student of the different religious systems of the world? You have read much, thought much, and reasoned much; you must be a great man, Doctor? (The Dr. elevates himself and strokes his venerable looking head.) Now, Doctor, as a result of your immense knowledge, you are persuaded of the truth of the Bible and of Christianity?—Yes. What is Christianity?—Dr. C. It is a system of religion referred to in the Old Testament, and fully revealed in the New. Fully, you say?—Yes. I must request the jury to note that fact as stated by the Doctor, "fully revealed by the New." Now, Doctor Clark, I am surprised that a man of your high attainments, should come here to recommend Methodism, when to your knowledge its church polity is a thing of the last century; and that it is governed entirely by human laws, enacted by an irresponsible conference. How can you identify THIS with a religion "fully revealed" eighteen centuries ago? (The Dr. is silent.) From my brief I learn that a desire to flee from the wrath to come—to be saved from their sins, is sufficient to gain admission into the Wesleyan church: is the same qualification a sufficient passport into the church, which is "fully revealed" in the New Testament?—Dr. C. God permitted none to be added to it, but those who were saved from their sins and prejudices. The church of Christ was made up of saints: sinners were not permitted to incorporate themselves with it. (See Com. Acts ii. 47.) Is there no difference between the desire and the attainment of salvation? (The Dr. looks perplexed.) By a reference to the actual rules of admission into the Wesleyan church, as drawn up by John and Charles Wesley, I find no mention of baptism as a condition of membership—was it so in the Christian church, which you admit was "fully revealed?" Dr. C.—No! Those who were then saved, were added to the church—those who were redeemed from their sins; and baptized into the faith of Jesus Christ. (Acts x. 47.) St. Peter requires that they shall receive baptism by water, that they might become members of the Christian church. Jesus Christ had his water baptism as well as John, and even he, who gave the baptism of the Holy Ghost, required the administration of water baptism also. Therefore, the baptism of the Spirit did not supersede the baptism by water; nor, indeed, can it; as baptism, as well as the supper of our Lord, were intended not only to be means of grace, but standing, irrefragable proofs of the truth of Christianity. Could you furnish us with a concise account of a model church?—Dr. C.: In the Acts of the Apostles, we find the true model after which every church should be built. As far as any church can show that it has followed this model, so far it is holy and apostolic. (Intro. Acts.) But, Doctor, can you point to a particular church and its practices?—Dr. C.: Yes. (Com. Acts v. 11.) At Jerusalem, it has been properly observed, that we have in this place a native specimen of a New Testament church:—1, Called by the gospel. 2, Grafted into Christ by baptism. 3, Animated by love. 4, United by all kinds of fellowship. 5, And disciplined by the exemplary punishment of hypocrites. So, Doctor, you can find in the model church, members were grafted into Christ by baptism?—Dr. C.: Yes. (Principle 26.) By baptism once administered, every person may be initiated into the visible church. Now, Sir, after admitting all this with respect to baptism and the model church, how can you conscientiously come forward and identify the Wesleyan church with the Christian church, when it diverges in its commencement—in its initiation? (The Doctor is silent, but the Methodist counsel rises and states that they practice infant baptism. The opposing counsel proceeds.) My learned friend states that they practice infant baptism—well, does this practice agree with the model church? Are my learned friends infants—1, Called by the gospel. 2, Grafted into Christ by baptism. 3, Animated by love. 4, United by all kinds of fellowship. 5, And disciplined by the exemplary punishment of hypocrites. According to Dr. Clark's own description? (A great sensation in court.) No, I am prepared with evidence to prove—1, That they sprinkle any infants brought to them, regardless of their parentage. 2, That those infants have no status in the Methodist church. 3, That they never partake of the Lord's supper, which is the birth-right of every Christian. 4, That the Methodist church does not exercise any surveillance over them. 5, That as they grow up they are never disciplined or excommunicated in consequence of sin. 6, And that when one of these becomes a candidate for membership in the Wesleyan connection in after years, no reference is made to his infant sprinkling. More than all, 7, That Wesleyan Methodism never inquires into the fact of their baptism, or non-baptism, therefore regards it of no moment—in fact, it forms no part of Methodism; and so far, the Wesleyan church is as distinct from the model church at Jerusalem as Mahomedanism. (A pause, during which the jury talk awhile; the Methodist counsel is very fidgety, and the Doctor rises to leave the witness box.) Stop, Dr. Clark, I have not done with you yet; the first distinguishing characteristic of the model church at Jerusalem was "called by the gospel;" what does this imply?—Dr. C.: It implies the gospel message preached, properly heard, attentively considered, conscientiously believed. Then is this fact an operation before or after baptism? Dr. C. (Intro. Romans).—That is the first act of the Christian life, to which every Christian is obliged. To be baptized, implied their taking upon them the public profession of Christianity, and believing on Christ Jesus as their Saviour and Sovereign; for as they were baptized in his name, they professed thereby to be his disciples and followers. (Acts x. 48. Com.)

"I hope my learned friend opposite will prove that these infants he speaks of were 'called by the gospel,' or had this faith to which every Christian is obliged. After he has done that, to the satisfaction of the jury, he can proceed to show us how these infants are baptized into the faith of Jesus Christ and grafted into Christ by baptism." Then he will have an opportunity of showing how very much the Wesleyan church resembles (?) the model church at Jerusalem in its two first characteristics. Meanwhile, as Dr. Clark is upwards of seventy years of age, and I have yet to cross-examine him on the practice of the model church—as to mode of baptism, administration of the Lord's supper, collections for the poor, names and qualifications of officers, authority of conferences, &c.—I will, with consent of judge and jury, adjourn the court.

BAPTISM: THE LAW OF THE BOOK ABOUT IT.

Now ready, an out-spoken pamphlet upon the above subject, price 8d. by S. J. CHEW, minister of Bond-street chapel, Birmingham. In this publication we have plain speaking—the truth just as the author sees it—nothing held back from fear of man. His plan is that of quoting text by text the apostolic sayings on baptism, following each with remarks clear, convincing, and unanswerable, supplementing the whole with a cloud of witnesses, whose testimony ought to silence opposition, and concluding with the refutation of objections. As samples, part of the author's remarks on Acts ii. 38 and 1 Cor. x. 1-2, are given:—

"Do you teach that baptism is for the remission of sins?" I have sometimes said to a brother Baptist preacher. "Oh no!" has been the reply, "I don't believe in that, I could not do that." Now it's evident Peter both believed and taught it; and I strongly suspect that those people who were then baptized would believe it too.

Let us overhear one of these in conversation with a modern Baptist—the parenthesis of 1800 must be forgiven me.

Baptist: "Well, friend, I'm glad to know that you have been baptized. How did you get on with the telling your experience?"

Convert: "I've been baptized, it's true, but I don't know what you mean by telling my experience. Will you explain?"

Baptist: "I mean your Christian experience, that is always required at the church meeting before the minister baptizes any one."

Convert: "I'm still in darkness. There were meetings of the church afterward, for we 'continued steadfast in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayers—but I attended no church meetings before I was baptized, and as to Christian experience I thought all that must come after I became a Christian."

Baptist : " But, my dear friend, I hope you were a Christian before you were baptized."

Convert : " This is what I was before : my heart felt sad about my sins, and I saw that Jesus of Nazareth who was crucified was the Son of God. I felt my need of him, and I was ready to yield myself to his control. In this state of mind I asked the Apostles what I was to do ; they replied that I must be baptized unto Christ—unto his name—and that coming to him with a true heart thus, I should be accepted, and be numbered with the family of God. And I now consider that I then put on Christ."

Baptist : " Well, but—seriously—did you not believe before baptism that your sins were forgiven ? And did not Peter, or some other of the Apostles, put that question to you ?"

Convert : " I did not indeed think that my sins were forgiven, but I did believe that in baptism they would be. And as to what the Apostles said to me, they showed no disposition to put me back ; they seemed pleased with my confession of Jesus Christ the Lord ; and Peter told us very plainly to repent and be baptized ' FOR the remission of sins.' "

Baptist : " Let me warn you, my brother, for I see you are standing on dangerous ground. You'll be a thorough Puseyite soon, and will in the end go over to Rome, if you don't mind. Now pray don't fancy that baptism is for the remission of sins."

Convert : What you mean by Puseyite, I know not ; and what reason you have for thinking I'm going to Rome, I cannot tell. I'm a plain man, and can understand plain words ; I thought Peter was inspired of God to speak, and I remember well his words : ' Repent and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, FOR THE REMISSION OF SINS, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.' Do you consider that you know more about this than Peter did ?"

Baptist : " Well, good day : I find my time is gone. We may possibly have some other opportunity. Good day." And so ends the dialogue.

I meet a friend, and I say to him, " Please to tell me, in the very words of Scripture, what is the design of the Lord's Supper ?" His reply shew forth the Lord's design. I then say, " Please to tell me the very words of Scripture, what is the design of baptism." He says but this— " For the remission of sins ?"

But there is danger of much of this act. Granted, there is a danger of making a profession of faith ; and multitudes of Christians do make a vast deal of it, as an act of their duty, and do not trust for salvation to their deeds, their honesty, their piety ; but they put faith where it ought to be, and their duty ought to be, and their piety ought to be as much about their faith as about their duty. If a friend promised me a hundred pounds, on condition of my believing, what a wrong statement should I show if I talked about my own believing ! I should rather speak of the kind of friend who generously gives me a hundred pounds ? So let us take heed of the Lord our God, who made salvation possible to us on conditions most favourable and let us take heed, lest, while we profess faith, repentance, confession, as the instituted means on our part for the remission of sins, we forget that these are IN NO WAY A MERITORIOUS OR PROCURING CAUSE, but that this is to be found in the truth and substitution of the Son of God alone. Strange conduct in the uneducated patient, that he goes to the doctor and demands a fee of him, and then takes the medicine he prescribes, and is a stranger still that he who is cured of the deadly disease of sin should boast before God, as though he had paid him, " PAY ME THE DEBT I OWE !"

Elsewhere remission of sins is pronounced unto those who, though they name, believe in Him (Acts 18:27). Here it is connected with the condition to repentance and to our conclusion, therefore, is, and repentance, and baptism appointed orders for our obtaining remission. We give not any chief place among the things in order of time it comes, and than useless when this arrangement is disturbed.

"Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea. And were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea" (1 Cor. x. 1-2.)

The advocates of sprinkling may have taken hold of this passage, because a cloud is mentioned here, and because a cloud is generally a sprinkler. But in the cloud here referred to sprinkle the children of Israel?

"And the angel of God which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel; and it was a cloud and darkness to them, but it gave light by night to these: so that the one came not near the other all the night" (Ex. xiv. 19-20.) Whosoever will take the trouble, then, to consider the narrative, must see that if this cloud were one of rain to any, it must have been so to the Egyptians only, for to the Israelites "it gave light by night:" to them it was a light cloud and not a watery one.

"And all passed through the sea." Return to the narrative again. "And Moses stretched out his hand over the sea: and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong East wind all that night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left" (Exodus xiv. 21-22.) What reason, then, is there for supposing that any of these Israelites were touched by the waters of the sea? The cloud was a bright one that "gave light" unto them: the ground on which they trod was "dry:" and the sea was "a wall" on each side their path. But as they were surrounded on all sides by the cloud and by the sea, the allusion must be to an immersion rather than a sprinkle. The Rabbinical representation of the cloud is: "It encompassed the camp of the Israelites, as a wall encompasses a city," and the words of Moses are, "Thy cloud standeth over them" (Num. xix. 14.)

These words teach, that at the passing through the sea, the Israelites were initiated into the dispensation of Moses; henceforth he was to be their leader: they were baptized into him (eis) to be guided by him, and to obey him. And so far as the allusion is to Christian immersion, it sets forth this, that when the believer is baptized he enters the kingdom of the Redeemer — takes the vow of allegiance unto him — "puts on" Christ — and delivers himself up to his bidding, to be led on by him unto the better land.

EVIL SPEAKING.

"THIS crime is a conjugation of evils, and is productive of infinite mischief; it undermines peace, and saps the foundation of friendship; it destroys families, and rends in pieces the very heart and vital parts of charity; it makes an evil man party, and witness, and judge, and executioner of the innocent, who is hurt, though he deserveth it not." — Bishop Taylor.

"Were slander to find fewer approvers, the kingdom of Jesus Christ would soon be purged of that scandal. Slander is pleasing; and a vice which pleases, soon becomes a desirable talent. We animate evil speaking by our applauses; and as there is no person but wishes to be applauded, there are few likewise, who do not study it, and endeavour to make a merit of slandering with skill." — Massillon.

"How odious are those, who by indulging in an idle prying curiosity, that delights in understanding and meddling with other men's matters, acquire a wonderful knack of drawing out to the last inch, the whole length of line, which the tattlers are fed to uncoil. But what are such doing? Is it not plain, that by cherishing sin in others, they sin themselves; and that by being accessory to the guilt of others, they increase their own? A deadly evil, which God hates, and against which he has denounced the heaviest curses, enters their houses and assails their persons, and they welcome its approach with a smile, and throw open their breasts to its baneful influence. Is it thus they give proof of their reverence to God and their love to man? * * It is worthy to remark, that if none could be found wicked or weak enough to give heed to the evil reports of tale-bearers, they might soon become bankrupt in their iniquitous calling. Customers failing, they must abandon their trade." — Shuttleworth.

REPORT OF GENERAL MEETING,

HELD AT BIRMINGHAM AUGUST 8, 9, AND 10, 1859.

IN accordance with the Resolution of 1858 the Annual Meeting was held at Birmingham, and though the business of the Conference did not commence until Tuesday evening, the 9th, there were interesting preparatory meetings held on the previous Lord's day and on Monday evening, the former in the Music Hall, and the latter in the room of meeting in Cherry-street. On the Lord's day the weather was unfavorable, but there were a goodly number assembled in the Music Hall, for the purpose of listening to gospel discourses from our brothers, T. H. MILNER, of Edinburgh, and D. KING, of Birmingham. On Monday evening, a very interesting and solemn prayer meeting was held, for the purpose of invoking the Divine blessing upon the deliberations of the Conference. Many of the brethren and sisters from London and other places were present, and they speak of it as a meeting long to be remembered. On Tuesday evening the brethren and representatives of several of the churches assembled. The chair was taken by our Brother TICKLE, of Liverpool, and prayer was offered by our respected and beloved Brother J. WALLIS. JABEZ INWARDS and WALTER LUDBROOK were appointed Secretaries.—DAVID KING, one of our beloved evangelists, proposed, and Bro. LUDBROOK seconded, a resolution to the effect, "That the Conference be governed by the same Rules as were read and adopted last year." The Secretary then read the Schedule of the Churches, which contained the following interesting and encouraging statistics:—

* Returns not to hand.—† Not a public meeting-place.

Communications were then read from various churches.

The Report of the Evangelist Committee at Nottingham was next read by Bro. WALLIS, from which it appeared, that including the balance in hand last year, £357 18s. 5½d. had been received, and £278 15s. expended.

Throughout the whole of the Conference the greatest cordiality prevailed, and the following resolutions were passed :—

1. That the thanks of the brethren are due, and are hereby given, to the Nottingham Committee, for their valuable services during the past year.

2. That Brethren J. Hine, J. Wallis, T. Wallis, W. Powers, and H. Meekley, be requested to act as the Evangelist Committee for the ensuing year.

3. That only the amount received and expended be inserted in the Report of the Meeting, and that the Financial Statement be printed and forwarded to the churches or brethren who have contributed.

4. In response to the repeated solicitations of the churches in Scotland for Evangelists, and with reference to Bro. Rotherham's willingness to proceed thither, this meeting approve his intention, and commend him to the Divine favor; and with this Resolution intimate the purpose of brethren in Scotland to supply his wants.

5. That Bro. Evans be recommended to labour in Swansea and neighbourhood, according to the desire of brethren there.

6. That the application of the Birmingham church for a continuance of Bro. King's labours in Birmingham be acceded to, and that Bro. King be requested to make Birmingham the centre of his operations during the ensuing year, with the understanding that he will, as far as consistent with his duty to Birmingham, extend his labours to other eligible places.

7. That in response to the application from Castlewellan, Bro. Brown, of Whitehaven, having stated his conviction that Bro. Geo. Sinclair is willing and able to go, and would be efficient in meeting the wants of the brethren there, and his suitability to proclaim the truth in that locality, that Bro. Sinclair be requested to go as soon as can be arranged, and sustained as long as may be found desirable.

8. That the application from Leicester be handed to Bro. King, in the hope that he and others may be able to supply some help to the church in that important town during the next year.

9. Reports having been circulated in this country, that some of the Churches of Disciples in America admit unbaptized persons to the Lord's table, it is requested that enquiry be made to ascertain the truth of the matter, by the Chairman of this meeting, to Bro. Alexander Campbell, and that the reply be published in The British Millennial Harbinger.

10. This meeting deplores that an institution so abhorrent to the enlightened sentiment of the civilized world, not to say of Christian principle, as American slavery, should have the support of any bearing the Christian name.

11. That in reply to the communication from Piltown, Bro. Ludbrook be requested to refer the brethren to a resolution passed at the Annual Conference in London in 1851, to the effect that the co-operation meeting disclaim all power to settle disputes between brethren or churches.

12. That the list of the churches be printed and circulated by post.

13. In consideration that many of the churches are greatly inconvenienced and crippled in their efforts through insufficient meeting-house accommodation, it is urgently suggested—First, To brethren of means, to consider whether they might not furnish help by the building or purchase of suitable property, with the view of renting it to the church; and second, To churches inconvenienced in this respect, to consider whether Building Societies do not afford such facilities for the procuring of ample accommodation, as to make it dutiful to take early advantage of them for this important purpose.

14. That this meeting regrets that several of the churches have not returned the schedules, and hope in future every church will do so, that the statistics may be as complete as possible.

15. That in view of the many encouraging applications for evangelists laid before the meeting, it is earnestly recommended to the churches to make continued prayer, that the Lord of the harvest would raise up laborers, and that young brethren of zeal and talent seriously and assiduously addict themselves, by study and effort, to gospel work, that their profiting may appear to all, and that they may come to be workmen that need not to be ashamed; and also, that for this purpose, more attention be given to village or district preaching, by combined arrangement under the direction of the leading brethren of the churches.

16. Inasmuch as much good has resulted from the publications of the brethren, and considering also that in the absence of evangelists, the churches be exhorted to a more liberal and systematic use of tracts, &c.; and that in connection with this recommendation, Bros. King, Rotherham, and Milner be requested to prepare a dozen or more four-page or larger tracts for loan and other distribution.

17. That this Conference tenders its thanks to the authorities of Bond-street

Chapel and School Room, for their kindness in granting the use of those buildings for meetings on Wednesday.

18. That the Annual Meeting in 1860 be held at Birmingham.

19. That Bro. Inwards be requested, so far as his other engagements allow, to co-operate with the other evangelists in proclaiming the Gospel.

On Wednesday afternoon, at five o'clock, a social tea meeting was held in the school-room in connection with Bro. Chew's chapel, the place being quite full, and all the arrangements excellent. In the evening a public meeting was held in the adjoining chapel, which was numerous and respectably attended. Bro. David KING premised, Bro. McDUGALE read in an impressive manner the 72nd Psalm, and prayer was offered by Bro. WALLIS. After a few pointed and practical remarks from the Chairman, Bro. TICKLE was the first speaker. He remarked upon the blessings of revelation and the love of God. All things in the natural world were governed by law and system, and was it unreasonable to suppose that when God spoke to man in relation to salvation, he would do so according to law? The Gospel was a pure and perfect system, and all that was necessary for man to know about eternal things had been clearly revealed. The interventions of men had made desolations in the churches. We had a desire to return to the simple truth of the faith which was once delivered to the saints.

Bro. ROTHERHAM delivered a very clear and telling address, in which he pointed out the nature of Primitive Christianity, by replying to the three following questions—1, What was the Gospel?—2, What was the church?—and 3, What was the spirit of the Gospel of Christ? Upon all of these points he spoke with energy and effect.

Bro. MILNER, of Edinburgh, in his usual earnest and impressive manner, combated and answered a series of objections which sceptics and others frequently advanced in opposition to the truth. He then spoke in a solemn manner to the unconverted, and concluded a most excellent address by imploring the servants of the living God to be up and doing; the enemy was powerful, prejudices were great, it was the time for action, and there was not a moment for delay.

Bro. J. INWARDS was then called upon to deliver the concluding address, our Bro. CHEW engaged in prayer, and thus ended an interesting meeting, in which the great truths of our common salvation had been earnestly enforced and faithfully proclaimed.

On Thursday evening a meeting was announced at the back of the Town Hall, when a goodly number of persons assembled. A portion of the Word was read by Bro. McDUGALE, and addresses were delivered by Bros. TICKLE and KEMP. Whilst the last-named brother was speaking, it was ascertained that Dr. Brindley had announced his intention to preach on the same spot, and this being known our friends removed to another place, where a very impressive discourse was delivered by our Bro. MILNER: after which we repaired to the hall in Cherry-street, where we held a social farewell meeting. Our good brother, William TURNER, presided, and we sang and prayed in the name of the Lord. — Bro. KING spoke of the Conference which had been held, and of the good feeling which had prevailed. He had, however, noticed one thing, and that was, the brethren who had assembled were getting older, and this had never been so impressed upon his mind before; and he was reminded that we were all marching towards the tomb. — This statement was received by the meeting with mingled feelings of sorrow and hope; many eyes were dimmed with tears; we thought of those whom we love, of their grey hairs, and of the hour upon which age had inscribed its marks; and we felt that several of them were ripening for glory, and that when they cease to take their places at the Annual Conference, it will be but to join the happy and glorified above. This solemn sentence was the key-note to the meeting, and many who were present will never forget it. — Bro. FRASER, and other Birmingham brethren, spoke in a very appropriate manner. Then a good man prayed; he was a working-man, and from his thanksgiving and supplication we felt what a precious and soul-blessing reality is the Gospel of God, and how its truths can illuminate the minds of our artizans, so that while engaged in their daily avocations, they can hold sweet communion with their Heavenly Father. Another hymn was then sung, after which our brethren, FROST, HAY, KEMP, TICKLE, and MILNER spoke: their hearts were full, a deep feeling of Christian sympathy pervaded all their sentiments, and the love of God which was manifested through Jesus, the Christ, seemed to kindle its holy fire in every heart; and in that never to be forgotten meeting, we thought we had a foretaste of that holy union and fullness of joy which are reserved for us in the kingdom of heaven. We felt the holy flow of brotherly love, and our earnest desire was that the light of the glorious Gospel might enter every heart, that all might possess a hope which is full of immortality. Our Bro. KING then prayed, especially for those of our brethren who were deprived to a considerable extent of the blessings of meeting with the church of God. Then we had an original and practical speech from our esteemed Bro. CHEW, a parting hymn was sung, our Brother LUDBROOK offered up an earnest and impressive prayer, and the benediction was pronounced. Thus ended one of the best meetings we ever attended.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

The letters this year greatly exceeded in number and length those of former years. A portion only can be given.

BIRMINGHAM.

Dear Brethren in the Lord, — It has pleased our Heavenly Father to permit us to meet once more on the earth, in order that we may, by the light of His Word, take sweet counsel together in things pertaining to the extension of the kingdom of His dear Son. We praise his name that we are enabled to welcome so many of you from all parts of the United Kingdom; and we trust that our assembling together may be for the comfort and upbuilding of all, and may conduce to the progress of God's purposes in Christ Jesus our Lord.

We desire sincerely to thank you and the brethren generally for your kindness manifested towards us in sustaining in this town, during the past year, a brother eminently qualified for the work to which he has devoted his life, as well as meeting the expenses consequent on the effort made. Your reward will be found in the everlasting kingdom, in souls redeemed and glorified. The cause he has so ably and successfully advocated to all others, and our brother appreciates its importance. That he has acquired by drinking revealed by the Spirit of God, a careful digest of the various Word, he has freely imparted; he can truly say, I have nothing. We believe in our being displaced, and an amateur knowledge substituted, which, by the Divine blessing, will assist in the import which all the disciples of the are called.

With untiring zeal and with no offence, he has not failed to reprove his brethren when they have in season, and out of season, preached the gospel of salvation, converted, persuading them to eternal life, and submit to the the Messiah.

Our dear brother's qualifications for the work are well known to all—we need not dwell on that. He takes the opportunity now afforded to publicly express our hearty thanks towards him for his uniform and every member, and we pray he may be spared for many years in the hope for the labour of love.

The immediate result of his visit is, that including the few brethren himself and Bro. Rotherham, we now number seventy-nine who are knit together in the love and affection. A spirit of inquiry is aroused, which is affecting the untruth generally; one determined to be guided by the will of God, and forsake everything found in accordance with the kingdom; and we feel convinced that stagnation which prevailed in the past, has, in its place, given place to an enlarged vine purposes in the present.

On this subject we can enter into detail verbally while you are present; we shall, therefore, proceed to a consideration of our prospects for the future.

Before doing so, we may say much to be thankful for in the past. In all probability our success has been much greater, and larger, if we had occupied a more spacious and better ventilated place. Although centrally placed, many have been unable to attend the Church of England Young Men's Association, previous to our occupying the room over the one we now assemble; from the door, and at the side to some that services conducted here on the Lord's day is connected with that church. Enough of us is known for people to be aware we have, in religious matters, no lot or part in a human institution; they, therefore, pass by on the other side. Others have found their way to the Methodist chapel opposite—so that in this respect we have laboured under great disadvantages. We hope to remedy this inconvenience, and to find a place for our meeting which shall be more inviting to the public, and which may be found with greater facility.

There are many important cities and towns where it is desirable that a movement similar to that carried out in Manchester and Birmingham should be commenced; we are painfully aware how few are the labourers in the Lord's vineyard who have given themselves to the work of an evangelist; notwithstanding this, we would urge a prolongation of Brother King's stay here, for the following among other reasons:

We hope for considerable additions to our numbers, and the fuller development of the talent we already possess; and consequent on this, a thorough organization of the church on the model once for all, by the Holy Spirit in the apostles' times, delivered to the saints.

We have already glanced at our progress, but we believe that the work has only commenced here—that the way has been merely prepared for an incalculable amount of good. There is an immense population within easy railway distance; to whom, with the exception of Smethwick, about three miles distant, the plan of salvation has not been fully declared. We should be glad to see other towns in these Midland Counties of England co-operating with us.

We know of no one who could, with a greater prospect of success, go on with the work; our brother having, by his courtesy and self-control, enlisted the kindly feelings of the public towards himself and the movement.

We therefore ask your approval of our wishes, and his concurrence that he should still labour here, and hope that he does not feel inclined to leave behind him the harvest, the seed of which he has so largely contributed to sow.

Turning now to the spread of the truth generally, we suggest that the great first principles we advocate, might be more widely made known, if the churches already organized would awake to the privileges and requirements of the important and responsible position they occupy. The members universally are God's proclaimers—the gospel a glorious simplicity. A little steady and prayerful consideration of the revealed will of God, would enable all, from the youngest to the oldest, to carry to the houses and chimney corners of neighbours and friends, the living truth in which we rejoice.

Material assistance at small expense might be derived from the press, which will always be an important auxiliary in the spread of the gospel. We think that a short tract should be prepared embodying, in an inviting form, the first principles of Christianity. This should be distributed by the brethren to the world, all over the kingdom. They should be exhorted also to throw off an unwillingness that prevails in relation to their appearing before the people as publishers of the good news. Small as are our numbers compared with surrounding so-called Christian churches, there must be much latent talent in the body, and every means should be adopted to call it forth; if there was greater earnestness, a large addition to the saved would be the consequence.

One suggestion we make which can be readily adopted. Meetings for the purpose of exhortation, prayer, and praise, should be held weekly in rotation, at the dwellings of the brethren; here a facility of speech might be acquired, talent developed, a more intimate acquaintance cultivated, and the hearts of sincere followers of Jesus would be effectually stirred up to love and good works.

When we look at the difficulties in our path, they appear immense; but our trust is in the Lord, our weapons the sword of the Spirit and the shield of faith, our armour the armour of righteousness. It is not our work, it is the Lord's; he has provided us with all things necessary for carrying on the warfare. If we will only use the means, he has promised strength. Continued prayer should be made for the success of those who are engaged in the cause of our Redeemer. If these and similar efforts are made, we believe that our hearts will be gratified by seeing a wholesome, because scriptural revival in these islands, which will go on until he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe.

JOHN JOHNSTONE.
T. S. LEMPRIERE.
EDMD. FRASER.

CARLISLE.

We are about removing into a chapel now occupied by the Methodists, and we think that if an evangelist could be spared to labour in Carlisle, much good might be done. There are several small churches not many miles distant.

J. IRVING,
W. BROWN.

CASTLEWELLAN.

I enclose, by request of the brethren, £2 for the Evangelist Fund. I am also desired to say, that the brethren think the present time favorable for one or more evangelists to visit the North of Ireland. I doubt not that deep impressions have been made on the minds of many, and that when the excitement is over, they may be willing to hear the truth. I have witnessed many very extravagant things at some of the meetings; yet notwithstanding there is a great amount of seriousness, and many are awakened to a sense of their guilt. I think that if an effort were at present made in Belfast or Castlewellan, or in both places, great good might result. This must be for the Committee to consider. I intend to leave for Australia next week.

FRASERBURGH.

We have had Bro. Alexander Beattie labouring for the last three weeks, and have felt refreshed and strengthened; two enquirers have been baptized since he came amongst us. This is partly the reason why we have not done more for the evangelists with yourselves, or in England and Ireland. Still we consider we have further to go than home. Praying the Lord to guide and direct you to glorify himself and be a blessing to others,

G. BRUCE.

GLASGOW.

Dear Brethren,—We have your annual circular, which was submitted to the brethren here, and has been filled up and returned. With respect to the objects of the meeting, about to be held in Birmingham, they have our deepest sympathies, and we hope by the blessing of God, your deliberations will be productive of much good to the cause we all wish to see prosper, viz.: the still wider dissemination of the truth in its influence and power. But we deeply regret, that though there has been a great desire among the brethren here that one or two of our number should have been present, and though there has also been corresponding with this, a strong feeling on the part of some to be present, yet circumstances render it out of our power at present. We humbly propose, that Scotland, and even we would say Glasgow, should have a share of the consideration of the brethren met in Birmingham, as a field of operation in the way of evangelization. We have waited long for help in this good work, and hope that the time is not now far distant, when we shall have the pleasure of having one or two able brethren to labour among us.

WILLIAM LINX,
JOHN BROWN,
JOHN CLARK.

GRANGEMOUTH.

Labour for the ingathering of souls to Jesus, and feed those who are gathered in, and let all our characters be living epistles of Christ, which all may read. I would repeat, "Work while it is day," and whenever you have an opportunity. May all your deliberations be blessed, so that sinners may be saved, and the saved united, as John xvii. 21. This is the prayer of your aged brother in the Lord,

ROBERT LAIRD.

HUDDERSFIELD.

Dearly beloved Brethren,—Meeting as you do in Birmingham, we think it proper to express the high gratification which we feel at the prosperity of the Lord's work there;—for whether we reflect upon the opening which Divine Providence at the first presented—or the unwearied exertions of our brethren who have laboured—or the amount of good which has resulted, both directly and indirectly, we think there is abundant cause for gratitude and praise in our heavenly Father, who has so signally granted his blessing.

We would also express our conviction, that the cause in Birmingham demands the continued and generous assistance of the churches.

We have already forwarded the schedule stating our numerical position—by which you will perceive that we have decreased by two during the past year;—while, however, we mourn over our slight decrease, we have much pleasure in saying that we enjoy great peace and harmony as a church, while we are not without the indications of the Divine blessing.

While speaking of ourselves, we remark that among the things which at present prevent our usefulness and increase, is the want of a comfortable and convenient place of worship.

We had for a number of years occupied a comfortable place upon the first day of the week, (but which was otherwise used on week days) but in that place we had no convenience for school operations, although we much desired it; we have, however, been compelled to leave that place, and the one in which we now assemble is ineligible and inconvenient. We have tried in vain to procure a comfortable and convenient meeting place upon rental—but to obtain a suitable one is impossible;—we have therefore resolved, if possible, to erect a place for ourselves—with the confident hope that by more advantageously presenting the Divine word and ordinances, and by the instruction of the young in a Sunday school, together with other operations, (which are at present impracticable) we may glorify God by extending his cause.

Whether we can succeed in the erection of a meeting place is somewhat uncertain, as our pecuniary means are very limited; we therefore take this opportunity of seeking the sympathy and assistance of our brethren, to enable us to accomplish the work—while we assure them that our gratitude will abound to them, as well as to our Divine Father.

During the past year we have only been able to make one small contribution to the Evangelist Fund: we had intended to do more in that way,—but having the foregoing object before us, we judged it proper to reserve our small resources towards its attainment; it will, however, afford us great pleasure to contribute hereafter when we are able.

LEICESTER.

Bro. Thos. Leavesley and myself were necessitated to remove from Mountsorrel to Leicester, some six months ago, on account of employment, since which time we have succeeded in gathering together a few scattered members in Leicester, who meet on the first day of the week to commemorate the death of Christ, in our dwelling-house. About eight regularly attend. I am happy to inform you that these few appear to be in earnest, and desirous that a numerous church should be gathered in this town. With this view they urgently request that you would take Leicester into your consideration. We consider the prospect very favorable, as there is great dissatisfaction with the present state of affairs, and a conviction that reformation is needed, as well as a belief that unity of faith is essential to the conversion of sinners. The population is about 70,000, and we consider it a fine field for evangelical labor. We want help, and we appeal for it to those who care for the spiritual welfare of others. Can you, will you come over and help us? Send us an evangelist whose soul is in his work; if you could only spare one for a few months or weeks, it would gladden our hearts.

JAMES LEAVESLEY.

MANCHESTER.

We gladly avail ourselves of the opportunity of addressing you on this interesting occasion; and trust that your deliberations will be directed by that wisdom which cometh down from above, and which alone is profitable to direct you in the important affairs for which you are assembled, viz.: the spread of truth, the salvation of sinners, the prosperity of the church of Christ, and the glory of God.

As a Christian community, we have abundant cause of thankfulness, when we review the year that is past. Our meetings for worship, on the mornings of the Lord's day, have been (generally) pretty well attended; about two thirds of our members being usually present. We do not, however, boast of this proportion; it might be greater than it is, and undoubtedly would be so, did all our members imbibe the spirit of the primitive Christians. In common with most of our churches, we have to deplore the defection of a few, who formerly bid fair for the kingdom: on the other hand, we have reason to thank God, for the additions which have been made to our numbers; making a clear increase, during the year, of 25 precious souls, for whom the Saviour died. Comparatively small as this number may appear, we are nevertheless disposed to take courage, to renew our efforts, and to lay ourselves out for usefulness in the cause of that dear Redeemer, whose we trust we are, and whom we profess to serve.

It is a source of gratification to ourselves, and may possibly interest you, when we inform you, that more than one third of our members are married couples; and that several of their sons and their daughters are also united with us. Exclusive of such, we have also a considerable number of youthful converts, male and female; to several of whom we are looking forward as likely to become useful members of the ecclesia of the living God. We have a wide field of operation before us, and around us on every hand; but which, for want of efficient laborers, we are unable to cultivate. O that the Lord of the harvest would raise up amongst us more laborers, to reap the fields which are already white!

That we may not be tedious, we conclude, by praying for the Divine blessing on all your deliberations.

MERTHYR TYDFIL.

Beloved Brethren,—At the Annual Meeting of the Welsh brethren at Merthyr Tydfil, on the 6th June last, a very urgent request was presented by brethren in Swansea and Merthyr for evangelistic assistance in those populous districts; and as it essential that the evangelist should be able to proclaim the Gospel in the English language, and the funds collected by the Welsh churches being inadequate to meet the expenses of Welsh speaking brethren called to assist in the formation of new churches, or help weak ones, it was resolved:—1, To apply to the English brethren for the sustenance of an efficient evangelist in Swansea and Merthyr. 2, That having learnt with joy, that Bro. Evans, of Llanidloes, was willing to devote himself to the work, and most brethren brethren present being acquainted with his capabilities and zeal in the Redeemer's cause, they heartily recommend him to the notice of the English brethren.—The meeting was cheered with the intelligence that during the year two churches had been formed on New Testament principles in Bangor and Portmadoc. Hoping that you also may have reason to rejoice that the glorious cause of truth is gaining ground, and many souls added to the saved; and praying that the wisdom which cometh from above may guide your deliberations,

SAML. OWEN.

The church here was formed in the beginning of March last, till when, five or six of us attended meetings at Criccieth; about twenty joined us from the Scots Bap-

SWANSEA.

The population of Swansea wards of 45,000, and the manifested towards us seem able; yet there is not that spirit on our labors which we wish. We believe this want attributable to the absence of evangelist. We strongly desired Evans to come and labor believing that he is adapted good in our midst; and if Broham's or Bro. King's future will allow of their occasional Swansea, and strengthening hands, we think would be a means to ensure success.

SOUTH BRIGHTON (VICTORIA.)

The disciples in this place, through the good providence of our Father in heaven, have been enabled to erect a meeting-house sufficiently large for their present wants. This unpretending structure is built of wood, and will hold about 70.—It was opened for worship on the 1st of May, 1859, and brethren from Beaumaris, East Brighton, Melbourne, and Prahran came to testify by their presence their hearty sympathy with the South Brighton friends. Our morning worship, after the approved apostolic model, was very refreshing.—About forty broke bread. We had a tolerable number of visitors, who witnessed the order of the Lord's people.—In the afternoon three addresses were delivered. Bro. Coles spoke on "Sin, its consequences and remedy;" Bro. Burt on the passage, "O! taste and see that the Lord is gracious;" and Bro. Service on "The unsearchable riches of Christ."—In the evening, Bros. Service and Burt again addressed the meeting.—The building was well filled morning, afternoon and evening.

MELBOURNE (VICTORIA.)

Our half-yearly tea-meeting was held in this place on Wednesday evening current. The day being wet, it was not so numerously attended as it would have been had the day been favorable; on the whole, however, it was considered good. Bro. Abercrombie, from Geelong, and Bro. Kier, from South Brighton, addressed the meeting; as did also Bros. Kid Coles, and Wilder, of Prahran; M'Gregor, (chairman) Thomson, and Service. The evening was ably and profitably spent, and pray that good results may follow. Churches at Brighton and Prahran have been doing well for some time.

BIBLE REVISION : ITS IMPERATIVE NECESSITY.

PERMEATED IN A SERIES OF DIFFERENT PAPERS, IN WHICH THE DISCREPANCIES AND ERRORS OF THE AUTHORISED VERSION ARE POINTED OUT.

I.—MANUSCRIPTS OF THE SACRED SCRIPTURES.

THE original scriptures of the Old Testament were written in Hebrew ; those of the New Testament in Greek. Some chapters, however, in Daniel and Ezra, and a verse in Jeremiah, were written in Chaldaic ; and the Gospel by Matthew is supposed by some scholars to have been first written in Syriac, and afterwards in Greek. The art of printing was discovered in Europe in the fifteenth century, and one of the first books printed was the Bible. Previously, the sacred scriptures were transmitted entirely by manuscript. Many very ancient manuscripts are still in existence. Although there is abundant evidence that extraordinary care was exercised in copying from one manuscript to another, it is not surprising that occasional errors in words or letters would occur. Some manuscripts are regarded as much more valuable and reliable than others. No single one is supposed to be entirely free from faults. The errors in one are detected by the agreement of others in a different reading.

Since our common English version was made, many ancient manuscripts have been discovered, not at the time known to exist, and some of them are acknowledged to be of the most valuable and reliable character. By these, scholars have been enabled to correct, in a number of cases, the text, both of the Hebrew and Greek, used by the translators of the Common Version. The correction of the text, of course, requires corresponding changes in the translation.

Upon this point the Bible Union has proceeded with the utmost caution. They have employed the most eminent Hebrew scholars now living — Dr. Rödiger in Europe, and Dr. Conant in America — to secure the most careful and reliable correction of the Hebrew text, as the translation of the Old Testament progresses ; and in the New Testament, they depend for the same purpose upon the Final Committee, to which these two scholars also belong. The sole object of the Union is, to ascertain precisely what God has communicated to man, and to make this known by faithful and accurate translation.

It is a subject for devout thankfulness, that, as stated by Dr. Horne, "The very worst manuscript extant, would not pervert one article of our faith, or destroy one moral precept." At the same time, it is true that the greatest accuracy to which the original text has been brought by the collation of additional manuscripts, only throws more light upon the articles of a Christian's faith, and upon the precepts by which his conduct ought to be guided. This is now true to the learned. A faithful and accurate translation of the corrected text, will make it equally true to all the readers of the Bible.

Man is entitled to know just what God has revealed, and it is the duty of the servants of God to make it known.

II.—STATE OF LEARNING WHEN THE ENGLISH VERSION WAS MADE.

From the year 1600 to 1611, the date of the Common Version, Great Britain was not celebrated for any great advances in the science of biblical philology and criticism. Almost all the great improvements in this department since the era of the Reformation, have been made at a comparatively late period. All the great commentators upon the English Bible have written since 1611, and the most important researches regarding the original text have been made within the last half century; and during the same period philological and grammatical principles that should govern translation, have undergone a degree of investigation and critical examination, which have brought the science of biblical philology to a maturity before unknown. It would be easy to prove that the revisers employed by King James were not, with rare exceptions, distinguished scholars, even for the day in which they lived; but, if they had been, they did not enjoy the advantages now possessed, and therefore were not in the condition of scholars of the present day, to make a thorough and accurate translation, especially where questions are involved, requiring profound and extended research.

It is not too much to say, that, in these respects, the Bible Union stands on the highest ground. All the advantages which learning can supply, have been secured for the preparation of a revision, which, we believe, will be worthy of the enlightened age in which we live, and will be to all succeeding ages a monument of faithfulness to God's revealed truth.

We do not disparage the revisers employed by King James, by asserting that they do not accomplish so much as scholars at the present day. They had not the manuscripts, they had not the books, they had not the collected results of the researches of philologists, biblical students, and commentators. Nothing less than a miracle could have enabled them to do in their age, what can now be done. We intend no reproach, therefore, when we make such comparisons. Nearly as great advances have been made since their time in all that is requisite to make a complete translation, as in the improvement of the mechanical arts, and it is not more reasonable to reject the steam-ship, the railroad, and the electric telegraph, in temporal matters, than to refuse the aid of modern scholarship in improving the translation of the Word of God. The men who made the present version would not have been guilty of such an absurdity. They endeavoured to improve the versions then in use, so as to produce a better, and we ought to imitate their wise example.

III.—RESPECT FOR THE COMMON VERSION.

The American Bible Union has always treated the common English version with great respect and veneration. Its extraordinary merits as a translation, and the general simplicity and idiomatic purity of its style, are cordially admitted and acknowledged. The following general rules for the guidance of the Final Committee in the revision of the English New Testament, sufficiently attest the regard which the Union entertains for the book which is so dear to the hearts of its members:—"The exact meaning of the Greek text, as expressed to those who understood the Scriptures in that tongue, when they were first written, must be translated by corresponding words, phrases, and sentences, so far as they can be found in the English language, with the least possible obscurity or indefiniteness. The English version, as published by the American Bible Society, in their colated octavo edition of 1854, shall be the basis of the revision, and only such alterations from it shall be made, as the exact meaning and force of expression of the inspired text, and the present state of the English language require."

The Union recommends to its agents not to disparage the common version. The faults which need correction must, of course, be explained, in order to convince the friends of truth of the necessity of revision; but the greatest tenderness and affection should be manifested in exposing the defects of a translation in the main so worthy of commendation.

To venerate a version to such a degree as to approve its faults, or to prefer known errors to the pure Word of God, the Bible Union regards as superstition. The Church of Rome has thus exalted a human translation, the Latin Vulgate, and placed it above the inspired originals. The common version should be loved for its faithfulness to the original, and only so far as it is faithful. A right hand, or a right eye, should be removed, if it interfere between the soul of man and the pure word of the Lord. Would God be pleased, if we preferred the word of man to His word, and called it by His name? Certainly not.

Let us, then, retain all that is excellent in the common version, and so far as it does not communicate to men the will of Jehovah, correct its faults and make it, in all respects, faithful to the truth.

IV.—PULPIT REVISIONS OF THE COMMON VERSION.

One of King James' revisers listened to a sermon, the greater part of which was occupied in presenting three reasons why the text should be differently translated. He afterwards told the preacher that the revisers had examined those three reasons, and had found thirteen better reasons why it should not be differently translated. A very large proportion of the time of many preachers is spent in correcting the version from which they preach. This is often rendered necessary by the known and acknowledged defects of the translation. Would it not be better to remove those defects from the version, and save the time thus spent before many audiences every Lord's day? These known and acknowledged errors give countenance to numerous attempts in the pulpit to make changes, which are no real improvements.

It seems a plain, simple, and reasonable mode of proceeding, if the version which we use and circulate does not always convey the mind of the Spirit, to correct its known inaccuracies and defects, and give to the people the pure Word of God. To retain what we know to be erroneous, and then to attempt constantly to correct it in the pulpit and lecture-room, produces the worst of consequences. It weakens the faith of the people in the sincerity of Christians, who point out and acknowledge errors, and do not aid to correct them. It throws doubt and obscurity over passages which are properly translated. It affords a field for weak and ignorant criticism. Young ministers especially, with a view to reputation for scholarship, delight to parade their learning before the churches by correcting the common version in their public ministrations, and this has particularly been remarked of those who openly oppose all efforts for its improvement. Indeed, some have acknowledged that, if the version be thoroughly and faithfully corrected, their occupation in this respect would be gone.

Let us do all that we can do, to secure a faithful translation of God's word, and the result will be a thousandfold greater increase of biblical intelligence, than if hundreds of thousands of such preachers should occupy the pulpits of the land from generation to generation, in correcting the version as it now stands.

The real questions at issue in such a case are these :

Shall the inaccuracies of the common version be corrected by incompetent, or by competent revisers ?

Shall it be corrected weekly in our sanctuaries, or once for all in the study ?

Shall it be corrected to the hearer of the word, and not to the reader ?

Shall it be corrected in a manner that brings reproach upon the book and upon Christians, or so as to commend the one and justify the other ?

All acknowledge the faults. No one seems to dispute that they should be corrected, and the truth told. The point of difference is between this loose, irregular, imperfect, and frequently erroneous pulpit revision, and the thorough, faithful, scholarly, and accurate revision aimed at and prosecuted by the American Bible Union.

V.—CHANGE OF MEANING OF WORDS IN THE COMMON VERSION.

The common English version was first issued in 1611. About two hundred and fifty years have since elapsed, and the English language has undergone great changes. Many words are not now ordinarily understood in the sense in which they were used when this version was made. Out of hundreds of examples, we select the following :—

CONVERSATION, used eighteen times in this version, in no one of these cases signifies the talking of persons with each other, in which sense it is now generally understood.

PREVENT, used seventeen times, in no case signifies to hinder, or obstruct, as we now understand and use the word.

Every passage in which such a word occurs, is misunderstood by the ordinary reader. These two examples alone comprise thirty-five passages of divine revelation so misunderstood.

Paul is made to say, "OUR CONVERSATION IS IN HEAVEN," when the original asserts, Our citizenship is in heaven.

As the version now stands, David declares to God, "MY PRAYER SHALL PREVENT THEE." "I PREVENTED THE DAWNING OF THE MORNING."

How perfectly unreasonable and unintelligible are such expressions! On the other hand, how simple and appropriate is the meaning of the original :—

My prayer shall come before thee. I anticipated the dawning of the morning.

CARRIAGE. The meaning of this word has also completely changed since the version was made. It once signified the thing carried. It now means a vehicle of conveyance.

PASSION. The word formerly meant suffering. Now we use it in an entirely different sense.

LIST, LISTED. These words once signified wishing: now they are used in a variety of other senses, but not in this.

TALE once meant number. It now means a story, or narration.

ALL TO. This phrase formerly meant entirely, or completely. It is now generally read and understood as two separate words, each in its ordinary acceptation.

DAMNATION. The word once meant simply condemnation, in such passages as "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself" (1 Cor. xi. 29.) Common readers now apply it to the eternal condemnation of the wicked.

QUICK, QUICKEN. These words were formerly common in the English language in the sense of living, make alive. They are now generally used to express the idea of haste, and not of life.

Such are examples of words that have undergone a complete change of meaning in the course of two centuries and a half. By keeping them in the version which we use and circulate, we sanction that as God's word, which inspiration did not communicate, and does not approve.

VI.—OBSOLETE WORDS IN THE COMMON VERSION.

Many words used in our Common Version have gone out of use, and their meaning is unknown to the ordinary reader.

WIST occurs thirteen times in the sacred volume.

WOT and WOTTETH occur eleven times.

These two examples comprise twenty-four cases, in which the meaning of the holy oracles are not understood by the most of those who read them. Every one, however, is familiar with the word know, which expresses the meaning of the original.

Which is easiest to be understood,—

"WE DO YOU TO WIT," as in the Common Version, or "We make known to you," as in the revision.

DAYSMAN was once in common use. We now employ the terms judge, or umpire, or arbiter, to express the meaning.

TROW was once a common word, but has gone out of use. I think is the proper term, whose meaning is clear to all readers.

KINE is not now generally understood. We employ the term cattle, and cows, to express the meaning.

LEASING was once used, where we now use lying, and falsehood.

EARING was an old Saxon word signifying ploughing. It has become entirely obsolete.

SOD and SODDEN formerly expressed the idea of boiling. SEETHE, SEETHING signified likewise to boil. They are no longer used.

These words, SOD and SEETHE, occur nineteen times in the version, and, of course, pervert or obscure the meaning of nineteen passages of Scripture to the common reader.

Take, for instance, the brief passage: JACOB SOD POTTAGE. How few readers understand what Jacob was doing! No one, however, would be left a moment in doubt, if the phrase was translated, Jacob was boiling pottage.

ESCHEW is very rarely used. Shun, or avoid would be far more readily understood.

WENCH is a term not now applied in ordinary language to a servant maid.

BRUIT is understood by very few. The term rumor, or report is far more intelligible.

Such words as PURTENANCE, RAVIN, TACHES, CHODE, MUNITION, WAX for become, or grow, DURETH, MINISH, GARNER, STRICKEN for advanced, CRACKNELS, BESTED, BRAY, ALBEIT, ASTONIED, MAGNIFICAL, and many other words could readily be changed for terms familiar to every one who reads God's Holy Book.

The question is: Why should the Common Version not be corrected in these particulars, so that it may be intelligible? Why should the meaning of the Holy Spirit be obscured, or perverted?

VII.—WORDS IN THE COMMON VERSION MISTRANSLATED.

The number of words and phrases in the Common Version that do not express the meaning of the original, have never been accurately computed. Dr. Conquest lately published a Bible with twenty thousand emendations. Some of these alleged amendments undoubtedly are changes which do not introduce much improvement, and others may be regarded as doubtful, but the great body of them are those which commentators and other scholars have proved to be needed to express the meaning of the Hebrew and Greek. Any one who has examined the revision of Job by Dr. Conant, and carefully compared it with the Common Version, must be convinced that the errors of the Common Version are far more numerous than is indicated by the work of Dr. Conquest. A few examples will show their character:

Matthew vi. 25.—"TAKE NO THOUGHT for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink." This inculcates an improvidence about temporal matters, which would bring confusion and distress into every household. The meaning of the original is,—Be not anxious, &c.

2 Peter i. 1.—"The righteousness of GOD AND OUR SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST." This by no means does justice to the original, which most clearly sets forth the divinity of our Lord and Saviour. The righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ.

There are five such passages in the New Testament, where the divinity of Christ is similarly expressed in the original, but concealed in our version.

In the 4th and 5th chapters of Revelations, "BEASTS" are placed around the throne of God as the representatives of the redeemed. The original word means simply living creatures, as in Ezekiel. There are two words in Greek, THEER, a ravenous beast, a monster, and ZOON, a living creature. In the New Testament the one is emblematical of persecution and blasphemy, as in Rev. xiii. 1; the other, of the eternal life imparted by Christ to His people—Rev. v. 11 and 12. Both are translated in King James' Version "BEASTS."

Matthew v. 25.—"OFFEND."—This word frequently occurs in the New Testament. The original word never means to cause offence, but to cause to fall, entrap, or allure to sin, &c.

Acts vii. 45.—"JESUS" is put for Joshua.

Matthew xxiii. 24.—A typographical error, substituting "AT" for out, gives the idea of an attempt to swallow, instead of that which the original furnishes, "straining out."

In the wrong translation of words, the Old Testament is even more faulty than the New, but it would occupy too much space to adduce examples. They have been pointed out by every eminent biblical critic who has written upon the English translation. They affect almost every important doctrine of Scripture, sometimes perverting the teachings of the Holy Spirit, and at others obscuring the idea intended to be conveyed. Are not we, and our children, entitled to know what God has communicated? "He that hath My word, let him speak My word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? said Jehovah."

VIII. — WORDS ADDED TO THE SCRIPTURES IN THE COMMON VERSION.

Italic letters used in the Common Version to denote the words and phrases, which have been added by the translators to complete what they supposed to be the sense. Many of these are mere human additions to the words of inspiration. A few examples will make this plain.

In the 19th Psalm, David, contemplating the glory of God in the material heavens, exclaims:—"Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge." But lest this might impart an erroneous impression, he adds, "No speech! No language! Their voice is not heard! but their line hath gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world." As Addison says:

"What though nor real voice nor sound
Amidst their radiant orbs be found;
In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice,
For ever singing as they shine
The hand that made us, is divine."

But in the Common Version this idea is completely changed by the addition of italic words, making the Psalmist say: "There is NO SPEECH NOR LANGUAGE, where THEIR VOICE IS NOT HEARD."

In Matthew xx. 23, our Lord says:—"To sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but for whom it is prepared of my Father."—The meaning here is plain. Christ gives it only to those for whom it is prepared by the Father. This meaning is completely changed by the words inserted in italic, which make the passage read: "IT IS NOT MINE TO GIVE, BUT it shall be given to them FOR WHOM IT IS PREPARED OF MY FATHER."

By these words it is represented that Christ has not the power to give, thus contradicting his declaration that all power is given to Him in heaven and earth.

In many passages the word man is inserted, limiting or destroying the sense of the original, which is none, or no one. In John x. 29, our Saviour says of His sheep, "No one is able to pluck them out of My Father's hand." Our version makes it, "No man is able." So in Hebrews x. 12, the word man is inserted, where it is not in the original. The sense of the passage is much injured here, and in various other places, by such an insertion. The manhood of Christ is not here referred to, but his priesthood.

2 Cor. iii. 3, "Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men, manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ," is changed by inserting the useless and perverting words, "For as much as ye are."

There are thousands of such cases in the Common Version, especially in the Old Testament, where words are added by the translators, which a correct version would reject, not only as unnecessary, but as almost invariably marring the meaning or force of the original. Does not this look like adding to the Word of God? (Rev. xxii. 18.)

IX.—DIVISION OF THE SACRED SCRIPTURES INTO CHAPTERS AND VERSES.

The division of the Scriptures into chapters and verses is of comparatively modern origin, being generally referred to the thirteenth and the fifteenth centuries of the Christian era. Dr. Horne says — "The very great advantage it affords for facilitating references to particular passages, has caused it to be retained, though much to the injury of its interpretation, as many passages are now severed that ought to be united, and vice versa."

It is often subversive of the sense, and far more frequently breaks in upon the necessary connection of historical facts or arguments. A few instances out of great numbers which might be collected, will demonstrate this.

Joshua, chapters 5 and 6, are so separated, that very few persons observe, that the Captain of the Lord's host continues his conversation with Joshua, and that the first verse of the 6th chapter is a parenthesis.

Ezra vii. 12 and 13.—The close of one verse, and the beginning of the next, if not separated, would read, "Perfect peace, and at such a time I make a decree." It now stands thus, "Perfect peace and at such a time." — "I make a decree." Thus nonsense is made of what otherwise would appear to be connected reasoning. Artaxerxes made a decree in a season of perfect peace, which, he intimates, would not have been so proper at a period of civil commotion or war.

1 Cor. 12th, 13th, and 14th chapters.—The separation of these three chapters prevents many readers from following the reasoning of the Apostle. He says, "Covet the best gifts, and yet show I unto you a more excellent way. Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am, &c." — "And now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity. Follow after charity, and desire spiritual gifts." By interposing two artificial divisions, and commencing a new chapter with "Though I speak," and another with "Follow after charity," the connection is entirely broken, and the ordinary reader is precluded from understanding the argument.

Every student of the Bible will recall numerous instances of this character. Indeed, it is so common, that those who would know the truth, are obliged generally, as they read, to disregard these divisions into chapters and verses.

The plan adopted by the American Bible Union, to publish the Sacred Scriptures in paragraph forms, avoids the difficulties, and retains the advantages of the chapter and verse system. The Scriptures are read in their connection, while the marks for the chapter and verse, according to the common division, being placed in the margin, enable the reader to refer them conveniently without breaking the train of thought.

Everything that is possible, ought to be done, to present the thought to the mind of the reader, as it was communicated by the Holy Spirit. Whatever of human invention breaks the argument, or obscures the sense, should be avoided. Some of the rarest beauties of thought and expression are entirely destroyed by the present system of breaking up a letter from an apostle into chapters and verses, which he never imagined and could not have approved. Take, for example, the Letter of Paul, the Apostle, to the Philipians. How beautiful and touching, read as a letter ! How broken and disfigured, cut up into chapters and verses !

X.—PUNCTUATION OF THE BIBLE.

The punctuation of the Bible is modern. Taylor, the celebrated editor of Calmet's Dictionary, says : " It is still much to be wished that in this respect the Scriptures were carefully revised."

Dr. Horne asserts, as clearly proved, " That there was no regular or accustomed system of punctuation in use, in the fourth century. The majority of the points or stops now in use, are unquestionably of modern date."

" At the invention of printing, the editors placed the points arbitrarily, probably (Michalis thinks) without bestowing the necessary attention ; and Stevens in particular, it is well known, waived the points in every edition."

In Luke xxii. 46, it is stated that our Saviour, in the Garden of Gethsemane, came to His disciples, and " found them sleeping for sorrow, and said unto them, ' Why sleep ye ? Rise and pray,' " &c. " And while he yet spake, lo, Judas, one of the twelve, came," &c.

In Matthew xxvi. 45, the same event is related, in the same connection ; but, in the English version, the question is changed into a command to do the very thing to which He objected. " SLEEP ON NOW AND TAKE YOUR REST," &c. " RISE, LET US BE GOING," &c. " And while he thus spake, lo, Judas, one of the twelve, came."

By changing what is evidently an interrogation into a command, the translators make our Lord give two opposite commands at the same time. " Sleep on now," " Rise ;" " Take your rest," " Let us be going." All these discrepancies would be avoided by making the first a question : Sleep ye on now and take your rest ? or, Do ye now sleep and take your rest ?

The same discrepancy occurs in Mark xiv. 41 and 42.

In John xii. 27, our Saviour says :— " Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say ? Father save me from this hour ? But for this cause came I unto this hour."

This is consistent. He is talking to His disciples, and inquires regarding the anguish which is about to overwhelm Him. " What shall I say ? Shall I say, ' Father, save me from this hour ?' But I cannot say that, because ' for this cause came I unto this hour.' "

In the Common Version, by changing what is evidently an inquiry into a prayer, the Lord is made to ask for that which, He says, would be inconsistent with the whole object of His life.

Many inaccuracies in punctuation have been pointed out by commentators, but it occupies so large a space to explain any one of the cases, and to show the reasons which render the correction necessary, that we forbear to bring forward any more. It is but justice, however, to say that the changes needed in this department are fewer than might reasonably have been expected, considering that no thorough revision has been made for so long a period of time, during which scholars and theologians have had opportunity to collate Scripture with Scripture, and discover the corrections needed in one place by comparison with others.

XI.—UNGRAMMATICAL FORMS IN THE COMMON VERSION.

The Bible ought to be the hand-book for the family and the school. Its sacred pages will abundantly repay the most frequent perusal. In addition to the spiritual blessings communicated through them, they are adapted to constitute the most available means for literary and general improvement. Dr. Conant inquires :

" Why has God given this marvellous book to the intelligent mind, unless it be that He designed that it should form the literature of His people, upon which they should feed, to the formation and sustenance of their intellectual strength ? Not merely that it should be the armory of their spiritual power, though, of course, that is most important of all. There is no such book in the language of men. There is nothing written that is so elevating, so refining, so well qualified to strengthen our natures in all that is associated equally with intellectual as with moral greatness. How, in fact, could it be otherwise, seeing that it was dictated by the Spirit of God? And if this be true—if the Bible be the best educational instrument for our families, for our children, ought it not to be intelligible? Ought it not to be clear? Ought not all its beauties to stand out in Divine perfectness? Ought we to allow anything to cloud its glories?"

One circumstance contributes more than any other to prevent the English Bible from occupying the place to which it is otherwise entitled, in the school and the family—its grammatical incorrectness. The use of such forms of expression as the following, is repugnant to good taste and correct scholarship:—

"BE" for Are. "Things that be not." "We be," "They be," &c.

"WHICH" for WHO or WHOM. This is a very common fault. At the time the version was made, which, as a pronoun, represented persons.

"THEM WHICH," "THEM THAT," used for those who, is a fault of very frequent occurrence in the common version.

"HIS" for its. Often found both in the Old and the New Testament. The pronoun "its" was scarcely used when the version was made.

Adjectives are frequently used instead of adverbs. The nominative case of pronouns is used for the objective, and the objective for the nominative.

SHALL and WILL are almost uniformly confounded.

These are only a few of the grammatical inaccuracies common to the version. They would not be tolerated in a school-book, or in an ordinary reading-book. Is it wonderful that the book which abounds with them, is not more used?

What is there to hinder the Book of books, as translated into our language, from being a perfect model of idiomatic purity and grammatical accuracy? There is nothing in the original to preclude this. The fault, hitherto, has been in the translation.

XII.—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE OLD AND THE NEW TESTAMENTS OBSCURED.

Many passages in the New Testament are quotations from the Old, or distinct allusions to it; and are designed by the Holy Spirit, who indited them, to be so understood. But the faults of the common version sometimes hide this fact entirely from view. Some examples will render this clear. The common version reads thus:—

Exodus xxiv. 8.—Behold THE BLOOD OF THE COVENANT which the Lord hath made with you.

Hebrews ix. 20.—This is THE BLOOD OF THE TESTAMENT which the Lord hath enjoined unto you.

If any one could possibly imagine what "the blood of a testament," that is, a will, may be, he would hardly detect in it the allusion designed to "the blood of the covenant" spoken of in Exodus. The preliminary revision of the Bible Union removes all obscurity from the passages. No such word as "testament" appears in the whole chapter, but in every case the original term is translated "covenant," and the whole connection of the argument and all the allusions to the Old Testament or Old Covenant Scriptures, are thus rendered manifest and striking.

In a similar way the allusions to the Old Testament history in Acts vii. 45, and Hebrews iv. 8, are completely destroyed in the common version, and totally erroneous ideas conveyed, by the name JESUS being used in both cases instead of Joshua.

The remarkable coincidence in the teachings of the Old and New Testaments in very numerous passages, has never been fully brought out in an English version. No translator can do full justice to the one without being familiar with the other. They require the most careful comparison, and the faults of both must be removed to make that comparison just. Wherever the words of the original will permit, the phraseology of the translation should have the same form in both Testaments.

Hosea xi. 1, and Matthew ii. 15, might readily be made to correspond in the translation. Both could be, "Out of Egypt have I called my son," or both, "I have called my son out of Egypt." There is no necessity or propriety in having one in one form, and the other in a different form.

Hosea vi. 6.—I DESIRED mercy and not sacrifice.

Matthew ix. 13.—I WILL HAVE mercy and not sacrifice.

Here the Greek word THELO is translated WILL HAVE, instead of desire, which is a more accurate translation, and corresponds with that of the Old Testament.

Psalms xxii. 19.—AND CAST LOTS UPON MY VESTURE.

Matthew xxvii. 35.—AND UPON MY VESTURE DID THEY CAST LOTS.

There is nothing in the Greek to prevent the last quotation being rendered in accordance with the Old Testament—“And cast lots upon my vesture.”

To make this case still worse in the common version, the very same Greek words are translated in John xix. 24—AND FOR MY VESTURE DID THEY CAST LOTS.

Such discrepancies are frequent in the common version. Many pages could be filled with them. Since they are not necessary, the question naturally arises, Why should they be continued?

Nothing in reason or religion requires the perpetration of such faults, and we believe that the Lord will be pleased if His people remove them.

(To be concluded in our next.)

NO. II.

THERE are but two chapters in the universe, one of mind, the other of matter. Man partakes of both, and therefore has a body and a spirit—his body adapted to time, and his spirit to another state. Hence we have two departments in the works of God, nature and religion.

Religion has two departments; 1st, what God does for man; 2nd, what man does for himself. Each of these is sub-divided; the first into two departments, promises and fulfilment: the second into two divisions—1st, what is necessary to become a Christian—2nd, requirements of Christian life.

Christ's religion is based upon the infallible oracles of God, teaching the nature, character, and office of Jesus our Saviour, recording unparalleled love in the glorious plan of redemption—the vast ocean of God's love being moved to its lowest depths in man's salvation. The Eternal Word becoming an exile from heaven, assuming our nature, stamped with the brand of rebellion, that he might become perfect through suffering—able to sympathise with mortals—knowing the weakness and wants of the human heart—that a message of love and mercy might reach us—for had he appeared in divine or angelic nature, it would have inspired terror in the beholder—that the penalty of God's righteous condemnation might fall upon that nature; finally, that it might be established beyond controversy that this mortal should put on immortality, by a resurrection from the dead, predicated upon Christ's resurrection.

* From the Banner of the Faith.

This radical proposition in Christ's religion, the assumption of human nature by Divinity, is incontestably presented by apostolic declaration; who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. (Phil. ii. 6-8.) 1 Tim. iii. 10, “God was manifest in the flesh.”

These oracles expressly affirm the divinity of that nature, clothed unto immortality, that the law of God might be honored, and its requirements personified in the life of Jesus.

The character of Christ, as God and man, may be found as given to us by the Spirit of truth, in the following language:—“Unto us a child is born, his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace” (Isaiah ix. 6.) These lofty titles link eternity with time—God with man—elevating Jesus to unmistakable pre-eminence.

This is He that should come—He of whom Moses and the Prophets wrote—the Child of God—Christ the Lord—the chosen of God—the Anointed (Mat. xi. 3, John i. 45, Luke ix. 10-23-35, John i. 41.) Here we still find other distinctive appellations, giving us an array of truth altogether impregnable, fortifying and establishing the superlative nature of our dear Redeemer. The light is so luminous we cannot fail to see the brilliancy of that star—the star of Bethlehem—that bright and morning star, the Lamb of God and anointed Saviour.

He was that prophet that should come into the world—a teacher come from God (John vi. 14.) When witnessing the supernatural physical power of Jesus, they were compelled to admit that he must be the long expected prophet spoken of by Moses; and Nicodemus, too, coming to him by night, although familiar with the Old Testament record, and a member of the Jewish Sanhedrim, calls him a “teacher from God, for no man can do these miracles thou doest except God be with him.”

There is one mediator between God and man—the man Christ Jesus (1 Tim. ii. 5-6.) The only hope of man, since, if his mediation fails, darkness gathers around us for ever; having traversed the boisterous sea of human life, he proposes giving a chart by which the frail bark of man, freighted with a deathless spirit, may reach a home of everlasting beatitude. The Scriptures are richly freighted with divine declarations, exhibiting the lofty dignity and matchless exaltation of Jesus. He stands out in the pages of that history stereotyped for eternity as the one and only mediator between God and man. May we love him and adore him continually, since he presents the cause of the saints before God our Father, that the “elect of God” may be preserved and blessed, not suffered to sink underneath oppressive care, or accumulating woes, that they may be able to fortify themselves against the assaults of Satan, and grow like the oak of the forest, strong, by the lashings of the storm.

“Who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing” (2 Tim. iv. 1.) We look with respect upon the person dispensing justice over a limited judicial district, but here we witness the Judge of judges, before whom the countless inhabitants of the earth must stand; philosophers and peasants, infidels and saints, noble and ignoble; of every climate, colour, and condition; the ocean giving up its dead—the earth releasing man; his body comes forth at the mandate of Jesus, to be judged according to his acts, whether they be good or evil.

“He is the Lord of lords and King of kings” (Rev. xvii. 14.) The princes of earth, if they have never bowed the knee to Jesus upon earth, shall acknowledge his supremacy and yield to his divine dictation. His dominions surpass in magnitude and grandeur, the loftiest conceptions of mortal capacities, extending on to heights and depths unfathomable. Let us therefore cling to Jesus faithfully while we live, not influenced by the pretended rationalism of these days of reckless infidelity, robbing Jesus of the exclusive right to our love and adoration. May we cling to the ark of safety while sailing through this deluge of sin—not swept away by delusive doctrine, but having an anchor that holds firmly on to the rock of ages—the Divinity of Jesus.

NO. III.

All accountable beings are subjects of law, either revealed or natural. “Those having not the law, (revealed) and do by nature the things contained in the law, are a law unto themselves.” Reason, nature, and conscience combined, cannot furnish a complete system of religion, although they may give data for a single chapter correctly. They can give no just conceptions of the nature or character of God, consequently cannot make known our duty to him. The untutored Heathen has a standard of right, regulating his conduct with his fellow men. This, therefore, will be the standard by which they will be judged, and not from any error in judgment or practice in regard to the nature and requirements of God’s spiritual government: for that is beyond the revelations of nature.

Nature may be compared to the eye, and revelation to a telescope; they bring to view the same objects for a certain distance, until the telescope reaches beyond the natural vision, revealing new objects essential to happiness, invisible by the naked eye. Those having not the telescope (revelation) will be condemned or justified as they have improved or neglected the facts revealed by the natural vision. They may with the naked eye see a dangerous declivity a few feet forward, which could not be more clearly discerned with the telescope, and may go on, regardless of the fact, into inevitable ruin. So many Heathens will perish, committing many crimes known to be wrong by the rights of nature and the dictates of reason. Nature and revelation go together, like the eye and telescope. Revelation reaches far into the future, revealing new and glorious scenery, and increasing our delights as well as our responsibility. The apostle declares that the strength of sin is the law. "Sin is a transgression of the law." "Where there is no law there is no transgression."

The last quotation can be predicated of only one department of human society. The Heathens have a law by which they will be condemned or justified—the Christian has the revealed law of God. Infants only, therefore, are absolutely without the law of revelation or revealed law, and therefore, with them there is no transgression—no sin—consequently no forgiveness required—no liability to punishment. But of such (sinless beings) is the kingdom of heaven.

It is just as impossible to evade the penalty of God's laws by a mere moral change, as it is the law of the State! Principles never change, and are the same whether developed in nature or grace. Now if some father in despair severs an artery, and while life is ebbing away, looks upon helpless infancy and weeping wife, and repents sincerely of his rashness, will the Lord arrest the current of life, and make void the penalty of death attached to this disobedience of nature's laws, because of a moral change or sincere sorrow of soul? By what principle, then, can we conclude, that since death has been attached to disobedience of spiritual laws as inevitable as physical death to the violation of physical laws, that this penalty will be asserted or averted by mere moral change or sincere sorrow?

Sin is a matter of law. The strength of sin is the law. No moral change can destroy the force of law. If condemned by the law of the State to death, I cannot expect pardon by anything wrought within myself—by any change of my feelings or character. Unless pardoned by law, I must meet its penalty. The pardon, too, must be based on some correct principle, that the law may be respected by every good citizen, and be a terror to evil doers. If mere moral change was all the Governor required, it would be leaving the matter quite too loosely: for crime might then be committed with impunity, and a simple sorrow for the same being the only penalty attached, would open the doors widely to licentiousness and sin. Upon this ground the prison doors should be opened to nine-tenths of our criminals.

Sin was not merely an alienation of the hearts of the divine pair, but likewise a positive act of disobedience, which condemned them to die. "By man sin entered the world, and death by sin; so death passed upon all men, for all have sinned."

The condemnation of heaven rests upon the human race. Could we realize this, how eagerly would we seek an atoning sacrifice, did we feel the dignity and force of heaven's laws, as we do human legislation when confined, anticipating an examination. How, then, can we escape, if there is not power in human interposition—no salvation by works of supererogation? How can man escape and no principle be violated? Let us not evade the matter by denying our sinfulness, for the fountains of our hearts are too corrupt to make this allegation successfully.

Can we look to the blood of beasts? These the Scriptures tell us sanctified merely to the purifying of the flesh. "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission." There must, therefore, be a sacrifice offered up; not accidental, but deliberate! Where, we ask again, shall we look for deliverance from this condemnation? Shall we appeal to human reason, and rely upon the revenues of the human heart? "The oracle of the former is silent, and bankruptcy is inscribed upon the tablets of the latter." Can philosophers of ancient or modern times give us any aid, and have they reared an ark by which our race may reach heaven assuredly? Let us not in wild delirium declare all sinners but ourselves, and thus run recklessly on to ruin! But may we find hope, and then "be able to give a reason for the hope within us with meekness and fear." God's love furnishes the only refuge! And how, we ask, will He work out deliverance without compromising the principles of truth and justice, although loving us in condemnation? This was the problem that angels were endeavouring to solve.

This great battle-field of sin must be visited by the eternal word, that a power may be concentrated sufficient to drive back the Prince of Darkness to the domain of death, rendering it possible for the peaceable fruits of rightteousness to grow, nourished by the blood of atonement.

That we may present the grace and glory of Christ's religion with simplicity, we will try to illustrate the same, that some of the capital points may appear:—

Suppose we have in yonder gaol ten men condemned to be executed for a capital offence. Their condition is one awakening the sympathies of the human heart, and we shudder when reflecting upon their doom of death. And we ask, is it not possible for them to escape, since all are sincerely sorry, and are praying to God for mercy? Now, if we let them go, on the ground of mere moral change, and disregard the penalty of the law, we destroy its force, and completely neutralize its power. Neither can one criminal offer up his life for all—he can merely satisfy justice in his own case. One person, not condemned, might offer up his life as a legal sacrifice for one criminal, and attach his blood to an instrument of law by which one might be pardoned, and the majesty of the law maintained. Or, if we could find a person whose life and position were an equivalent to the criminals, he might, as he thought of their desolate homes and fatherless children, be willing to die for them and purchase pardon.

He dies and attaches his blood to certain conditions, affirming that through those conditions they may reach his blood and enjoy pardon—not one only, but all—the basis is broad enough for all. Now only one accepts. Does this detract from the grace of the deliverer? The condition was, that they should go through a certain door, and wear a certain dress freely furnished, but nine of them cannot see the use of putting on the dress, nor going through that door. Now, although they may enjoy pardon if they obey the conditions, yet if they do not, they make void this atonement to themselves; and although only one escapes, the love and mercy of the deliverer are as manifest as if all did, and if they should put on the dress and go out of the proper door, who would be so foolish as to affirm that these secondary matters were the basis of salvation, and be forgetful of the blood of the deliverer? But all would clearly perceive, that blood was made valid to those obeying these conditions, and no others.

That would be the channel of reception—the way of appropriation—the law of pardon—the accepting of the sacrifice—the exercising of our free agency. For the nine may rather be hung than come to this humble acknowledgment; therefore, they have his privilege without detracting from the grace and glory of the way of deliverance. They could receive pardon, and no violence be done to law in this way, and in this way only.

Now that the eternal word became incarnate, suffered and died for man, is evident. He was more than mortal, or his death would have been valid only for himself. He assumes divinity when he declares his death to be an expiation for the sins of the world. That Christ died for our sins as a legal sacrifice, is remarkably clear from Scripture authority. Rom. v. 8, "But God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." Gal. iii. 13, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." 1 Peter i. 18, "Not redeemed with corruptible things, as with silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Christ." Eph. v. 2, 1 Cor. v. 7, 1 Peter iii. 18, Isaiah v. 3, 1 Peter ii. 24, 2 Cor. v. 21.

Christ offered up himself as an atoning sacrifice for the world, rendering it possible for the world to come to his blood by obeying the conditions. Still his grace is just as glorious, if all reject the council of God against themselves. It is always presumable, when men are condemned to die, if a way is offered up for pardon, that they will accept it without using physical force to drive them into it. So Christ has offered himself, and the way of remission is prescribed that it may have the dignity of the law. "The law of the Spirit of life" makes us free from the law of sin and death. Now we reach, then, the merits of Christ's blood: if not, we can make no plea in the judgment that will avail. Faith and baptism, save only as these are the prescribed means of appropriating the merits of Christ's death, and showing to the world that we joyfully accept the sacrifice, revealing our previous condemnation. We go through in figure what Christ went through in fact. Christ, by his death, acknowledged the condemnation just; so we, by our burial, make the same acknowledgment to Jesus, as well as accept the remedy.

We will leave this theme for the present, and may we fully realize that we are saved by the grace of God, interposing when hope of aid had set in darkness—only to be dispelled by the soul-cheering oracle, "God so loved the world as to give his Son—that whosoever believeth on him might have everlasting life." W. T. HORNER.

SPIRITUAL AMENDMENT MUST BE A WORK OF TIME.

ALLOW me to exalt into the dignity of an essay the following reflections on spiritual amendment. They suit me so well that I heartily adopt them, and would commend their adoption to all your readers.

Spiritual amendment must be a work of time. Its commencement must, indeed, like our birth into the sensible world, be momentary, whether it be referred to our entrance by baptism into the church of Christ and God, or the first awakening impression of spiritual things upon the worldly-minded heart. But we may as well expect the perfect man to issue from his mother's womb, as to conceive the Christian to be completely formed in the instant of his turning his heart from the world to God. Were we to proceed with the analogy, we should conclude, inasmuch as the nobler creature is longer in arriving at maturity, and as the creature thus born admits neither of old age nor of death, that the spiritual was longer in forming than the natural. Not, however, to insist upon this, it must be borne in mind that there is a long process to be undergone, before a positive growth in spirit can be said to commence: previous affections must be weaned, passions subdued, faculties diverted from a wrong channel. And, moreover, let it be remembered, that the full measure of the gift of the Holy Spirit is not poured upon the mind at once; it is distributed by successive portions, increasing in proportion to what is already maintained, and turned to its proper account there. For, as our Lord himself says, "To him that hath shall much be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even what he hath."

Great, therefore, on every consideration, is the danger of procrastination; and even to speak of the past in the solemn phrase of lost moments never to be recovered, is to express but half the melancholy truth. For every one of these moments, however swift of foot or light of burden, has left its impression for good or for evil upon the minds according to its state, clean or unclean; just as the same outward impressions which bring health to healthy organs, but aggravate the disease of the unhealthy. There is no middle point—if we go not forward, we go backward—if we be not standing, we are falling—if we be not in health, we are in decay. Do we delay on the idea of being able to commence the work of religious amendment, and start into newness of life at will? Every consideration is opposed to an idea confessedly so absurd, and yet so commonly acted upon. It is indeed a strong proof of our sudden delusion that, with the analogy of the body before our eyes, and that body, too, often suffering for the sins of the mind, we should think to resume our moral health at pleasure; that while months, and even years of painful and cautious regimen are often necessary to re-establish the one, a few hurried days are at all times sufficient for the restoration of the other. The wound, and bruise, and putrifying sore, which for the best part of life have been cankering and eating into the mind, shall cease at once their horrid repast, upon the bare expression of our wish for health and sorrow for their origin.

The human mind, however inattentive we may be to its operations, is all along growing up towards a certain system; feelings are becoming rooted, thoughts are interlacing one with another, according to some predominant principle, which at last assuming sovereign sway, excludes all such as will not bend to the general organization which it has established. If this principle, therefore, have nothing in common with the gospel of Jesus Christ, it will admit but of partial views of that which we ought to comprehend as a whole. Languor and listlessness are the consequence, and repeated stumbling, from ignorance and carelessness, makes us disgusted with the road which has been pointed out. We are blaming in our hearts the severity of God, when we have to complain only of our want of energy ; and accusing the niggardness of light, which our earnest and sincere exertion is, according to his holy promise, assured of obtaining in satisfying fulness.

It is in perfect accordance with this narrowness of view, to sit down in idle expectation of some peculiar summons to begin upon the work of newness of life, as if all had not been summoned by their acquaintance with that gospel, in the very front of which it is written, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand ;" as if all required that palpable interference which called the Apostle of the Gentiles to his vast and extraordinary charge. But have they indeed had no call ? Has God never been challenging their attention amid the multifarious incidents which he has strewn in their daily course, and the many desires or reluctances with which he has informed their spirit ? Have they no remembrance of resolution formed from time to time — none of hours of repentance — none of hours of that holy calm which instantly overspreads the bosom when it has formed some pious determination ? All these were consequent upon some call of God, and are evidences that he has not been forgetful of them. But if they pass by such as these, in expectation of something more rousing, more special, of what nature may we reasonably conclude that to be which they await so complacently ? God's ordinary dealings with man, lead us to presume that it will come in the shape of some overwhelming visitation, which will scatter their habitual frame of thought to the winds, dis severing all their usual links, and turning them with their affections from earth, weeping and dropping blood like the fabled myrtle ; so that all, being once again disentangled, they may grow together anew, according to the new principle, which is Christ in the mind and in the heart. O ! let no one wait for such a call as this to his duty !

OUR BEING.

It is a noble thing to exist — to feel the quickening and mysterious influences of life. How deep, how high, how profoundly wonderful they are, and how strange is the love of life ! It is ennobling to feel that we have a moral and intellectual being, and that we are, though but for a short period, denizens of this beautiful world. If we measure the value of our being by the rich provision which God has made, we shall ever be prepared to praise the Eternal Name. Is it not enough to excite our love and admiration when we feel that we not only form a part, but that we occupy the highest position of all created beings in the universe of God. The heavens were made for us. The stars, those sparkling diamonds which adorn the brow and bedeck the bosom of dark old night, were made for us. Our moral sympathies rise up to them, and our intellectual powers live in the light of their splendour. The sun and the moon are our servants, which daily minister to our wants. The light and the darkness, the heat and the cold, are alike essentially necessary for the development of our mental and physical powers ; and the winds and the storms contribute to our good. All Nature speaks to us of God, and we love to listen to her deep communings, feeling while being encompassed by her beautiful fruits and flowers, and surrounded by her holy and radiant light, that she is deeply and eloquently expressive of the power and majesty of God. Is it not a glorious thing to exist, when we have but to open our eyes, and light, which travels at the rate of ninety-two thousand miles per second, falls so gently thereon that the fields of beauty and the heavens of glory are open to our view. What a splendid perspective ! Fertile plains, running streams, fruitful valleys, flowering crops, delicate flowers, trees of beauty, hills of glory, and mountains of grandeur, all bursting upon our view. And in turning our eyes towards the heavens, we tremble and adore. As we gaze, one faint ray of light, which has been travelling for millions of years, takes up its abode in this wonderful organization of our visual sense, and its tender sensibilities are excited by this faithful messenger from a distant world. How deeply the soul is indebted to the sense of seeing, and yet how short-sighted we are. Things in the distance become ill defined. It is not so with the eye of God: distance is annihilated in the presence of an all-pervading Spirit. May we ever live with a deep sense that the eye of the Eternal is upon us! How the sounds of Nature contribute to the happiness of our being! How soft and harmonious they are! Even the plaintive sighs and murmurings exercise a soft and subduing influence. The gurgling stream and dashing cataract, the gentle zephyr and the loud wind's blast, all minister to our pleasure. To exist is to live in light. It is to be a child of God—to be a link in the great chain of the universe—to be a traveller to a high and solemn destiny—a pilgrim to the holy city, or a traveller to the world of death. To exist is to be a man and a brother. For us the gates of the morning are opened, and the sun marches up the sky, the moon sends down her borrowed light, the day gives her blessings, and the night brings repose. For us the bread and the water are given—for us the birds sing, and the cattle upon a thousand hills contribute to our necessities. And when the activity of labor is over, the dark curtain falls gently upon us, and the noiseless and mysterious power of sleep closes the eyes and our spirits rest. Angels of love and mercy guard us until the dark shades disappear, when, amidst the singing of birds and the light of the morning, we awake with our bodies strengthened, and our minds prepared for the arduous exercise of the coming day.

We contemplate with pleasure and deep veneration the nature and character of man. In the first chapter of the Holy Book, we read of the great work of preparation which was made before he was created. The chaos had heard the voice of the Eternal, and that which was without form and void instantly assumed a form, and became the theatre of order and beauty. The heavens were spread out, and the water was divided from the land, and the wonderful beasts of the field, fish of the sea, and fowls of the air, by the Divine fiat were called into being. At length, when the world was fitted for his reception, man, the crowning glory of the whole, was created in the image of God. Into his nostrils was breathed the breath of life, and he became a living soul. His nature was perfect, his state sinless, his home a paradise, his father God. But he was deceived, and the dark cloud of sin overshadowed him. The divine light became almost extinct. He had eaten of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. No longer does he exclusively receive the good; the polluting streams of evil flow from the dark sources of the soul, a fearful conflict takes place, and that conflict has been continued ever since. Though he has lost his sinless purity—though his affections are chained down to sense—though in his fall he bowed down to the Prince of Darkness, and turned his feet towards the world of woe, God has not forsaken him. Heaven is still merciful. In all his wanderings he is not left alone, for the eye of God is watching over him, and before he sinks into complete despair the voice of the loving Father speaks the promise to his soul, that the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head.

And this was the first gleam of gospel light which shone athwart the gloomy pathway of him whose sin brought death into the world. It was God's love to man. It was the offended Father speaking words of comfort and promise to the offending child. The mercy and love of God, as manifested to Adam, are calculated not only to arrest the attention, but to secure the affection and admiration of all those who love in sincerity and truth. Had not God revealed himself to Adam, how dark and perplexing would have been his condition! It is true, he had the earth to live upon, and the heavens to behold; but in relation to his spiritual nature, these were all dumb and perfectly uninformative. It is true that the things visible, in the gorgeousness of their splendour, and the glory of their magnificence, might have created in his mind an indistinct idea of an all-creating power; but they would have communicated nothing of the moral attributes of the Eternal God. And they are as dumb now as they were then. They teach not the moral law, nor do they tell us of the Christ who died. In the voice of nature, the language of salvation is not heard. When Adam was pure, perhaps it was right to infer that there was a continual influx from the mind or Spirit of God to his soul, and that he did not obtain knowledge by the slow and tardy process of mental application—it was an intuition. His thoughts were with God and in God. But when he fell, he was placed in a similar position in relation to internal and external objects as is that in which we are found; and like ourselves, he was influenced by the knowledge of good and evil. In his nature there are opposing and conflicting elements. Death and life—heaven and hell are presented to his mind. Ignorance throws its dark cloud over him, and the knowledge of evil burdens his soul. But God has not forsaken him; the light of the promise glides his pathway, and he hopes for the paradise above. God still speaks to man—centuries roll away, the fearful effects of the fall accumulate in all their horrors, until darkness and sin encompass the world. God speaks to Noah, the ark is built, and the family saved. The tide of time rolls on, Moses is with God in the Mount, and God speaks to him in thunderings and lightnings, and he came down from thence with his face illumed with the divine glory. The ten commandments are full of the mind of God. They are celestial gems which show the purity of God and the sinfulness of man. What condescension was manifested in the promise which our Heavenly Father made to Abraham, and how that promise tended to enlarge the mind, and to give strong spiritual perception of the coming glory of Him in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed. That promise lifted the mind of Abraham up to heaven. It was an unveiling of the character of God—it was a fuller revelation of the Infinite Mind, and inasmuch as Abraham received the divine light, he became a better, a nobler, and a happier man. As we turn over the pages of inspired truth, we find the character of man more effectually developed, but only just in proportion as God has made himself known. The truly eloquent and noble-minded David gives us a deeper insight into the character of man. What chord of the soul has he not touched—what chamber of the mind has he not explored—what emotions has he not comprehended—what joys has he not realized—what troubles has he not passed through—what sorrow has he not encountered—what earthly glory did he not secure! He was opposed by wicked and malignant men, betrayed by his friends, derided by the ungodly; his nights were nights of fear, and all the day long was he troubled. But he put his trust in God, and in one of his beautiful Psalms he exclaims, "When I consider the heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the sun and the moon which Thou hast ordained: what is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that Thou should'st visit him! Man is made only a little lower than the angels, and is crowned with glory and honor." Here we find the exalted condition of man: he is clothed with glory and honor, he is the favored child of God, and there is no glory to be compared to his. How ennobling are the conceptions of Isaiah—how he makes all nature contribute to the glory of his theme! In speaking of the greatness of the Deliverer, he tells us of the value of those who are delivered. In so highly exalting the character of the Saviour, he tells us of the worth of the saved. In speaking of the sufferings of the crucified, he tells us of the preciousness of those for whom he suffered; and thus from his writings do we see clearer light shining on the soul of man. How the inhabitants of the world have been blessed by the revelations of the Word. To those who read it and believe it, it is a light unto their feet and a lamp unto their path—it is a light shining in a dark place. What are the patriarchs but grand old teachers? What are the prophets, but the specially sent of God, the revealers and interpreters of the Divine will? What light they scatter! What holy fires they kindle! What soul-absorbing and soul-saving truths they utter! God bows down to them, and pours His truth into their souls. Their words contain the elements of life and death. They frown, and nations tremble; they smile, and the nations hope. They utter their solemn denunciations, and the church hangs down its head; they speak with promise, and the daughters of Zion rejoice. But the prophets have done their work, and they pass away. The fulness of time comes, and the glory of the inspired seers is about to be revealed. The Heavens are moved with compassion, the Holy Spirit descends, the promised Saviour is born, the Virgin becomes a mother, a stable the palace of our God. The star shines in the East, and stands over the birth-place of our Immanuel. The shepherds listen, and they hear the holy melodies; the wise men look, and they follow the star. We see him in the manger, we listen to him in the Temple, we behold him at the Jordan, we read his holy teachings, we follow him to Gethsemane, we view him on the cross, we witness his burial, and with holy rapture gaze upon his resurrection and ascension. For us he burst asunder the bands of death—for us he is enthroned, and now hears our prayers and pleads our cause. As men the earth contributes to our wants, the dew of Hermon descends, the fruits of the trees drop down in our pathway; but as Christians God loves us, Christ has died, the truth enlightens, the Spirit blesses, death is conquered, and heaven is our home.

THE BAPTISMAL FORMULA.

WE have long since discarded the canonized formula of Rome, and England, and America, as read in King James' Version, and as practiced in all the denominations of existing Protestantism, in the administration of the primary ordinance of the Christian institution. "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," is unqualified Popery. It is a palpable mistranslation and misrepresentation of the Apostolic mission and commission; and, still worse, it is subversive of the crown, and position, and authority of the divinely-ordained absolute Potentate of heaven and earth. It is a formal and positive repudiation and rejection of the headship and absolute sovereignty of the divinely-constituted Sovereign of the universe.

While we say it is a formal and positive repudiation and rejection of the headship or the lordship of Jesus of Nazareth over heaven and earth, we do not regard it, and would not represent it as wilful and perverse. We would rather regard it and represent it as the result or fruit of ignorance and inattention, or of simple unbelief. It was, indeed, the all-prominent and most patent oracle enunciated in the first speech of that Apostle to whom Jesus the Christ vouchsafed the keys of the kingdom of heaven; a fact which, I am sorry to say, I have never heard enunciated outside of the current Reformation. The origin of Christ's reign or kingdom, so far as my reading or hearing has extended, has not been the subject of a single speech or sermon in any pulpit outside of the current Reformation. Pædobaptists of all creeds, so far as my reading or hearing has extended, are accustomed to look back to Abraham or Moses, as the founders of the church of God. So have my opponents, the Rev. John Walker, the Rev. Wm. L. McCalla, and the Rev. Nathan L. Rice, in their public discussions with me on the claims of Infant Baptism. Indeed, the most accomplished of these three, maintained in his discussion with me, A.D. 1843, "that the church was organized in the days and in the family of Abraham." Such is the stand-point, and such is the version of the Presbyterian Rabbis of the nineteenth century!

With us, the founder—yes, the Author and the Founder of the Christian church, was born 1859 years ago. And during his whole life, his standing theme was:—"The reign," or "kingdom of heaven" (or of the heavens) was coming, was at hand. In reason's ear or eye, how could a kingdom or a reign commence until the coronation of its sovereign? Do we date the reign of a king from his birth, or from his coronation, his inauguration?

The oracles of Peter—the proclamation made on the first Pentecost, in Jerusalem, the fiftieth day after the feast of the Passover—the day of the presentation of the fruits of the harvest—the day commemorative of the giving of the Law in Mount Sinai, on the fiftieth day after their departure from Egypt—the present Whitsuntide of Papal Rome, commemorative of the sensible and manifest descent of the Holy Spirit on the Apostles;—I say this memorable and holy day of Pentecost was the day of the proclamation of the coronation of the hero of man's redemption, then invested with all authority in the entire area of the whole creation, and also the birthday of the Christian church.

There is an ominous, a fearful neglect or want of appreciation in denominational Christianity of the solemnities, the significance, and the grandeur of this day — this memorable day, this twice memorable day—first memorable in the destruction by the sword of steel of three thousand Jews in one day, by the command of Moses (Exodus xxxii. 28); and now most felicitously memorable in the salvation of three thousand Jews by the sword of the Spirit — the Word of the Lord—the Gospel of his grace.

The commencement of the Christian kingdom, of the conquests of the cross, of the triumphs of the Gospel in anti-thesis with the commencement of the legal dispensation, how superlatively grand, and gracious, and glorious!

Peter's sermon—his opening speech—to contrast with the promulgation of the Sinaic and legal dispensation, and the concomitant fruits and effects of both, how antithetic in every point of comparison. Law reigns through sin unto death. Grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life. We lose a temporal life through Adam the first — we gain an eternal life through Adam the second. We lose the present earth by Adam the first—we gain new heavens and a new earth by Adam the second. We lose the mixed and contaminating society of men in the flesh—we gain the pure and immaculate society of all the great, and good, and noble, not of earth and time only, but of all the realms, and dominions, and principalities, and estates in the area of the unmeasured and unmeasurable universe of God. If heirs of the riches of Christ, we are heirs of God, joint-heirs with his Son; consequently, all things that he possesses are ours.

In our immersion into Christ, much more is signified than is commonly appreciated, and much more would be enjoyed than is usually enjoyed, did those who are baptized into the name of all the persons of the Godhead, duly appreciate the imports of these sublime names and relations, and of our change of position towards them, consummated in this most sublime and significant institution. But here we shall lay this subject upon our table till the next moon.
